Not only in Old, but also in New Testament times, the practice of appealing to the lot is mentioned. Thus in the election of an apostle to fill the place of Judas, it is said, Acts i. 26, "And they gave forth their lots; and the lot fell upon Matthias; and he was numbered with the eleven apostles." Even at this day, as travellers inform us, the casting of lots is practised in the East in doubtful matters which it may be difficult otherwise to decide. Among the Moravians, also, in questions of importance recourse is had to the lot. This, however, is never resorted to but after mature deliberation and fervent prayer; nor is anything submitted to its decision which does not, after being thoroughly weighed, appear to the assembly eligible in itself.

LOTUS-WORSHIP. This flower, the Nymphaea Lotus of Linnaeus, and the Sacred Lily of the Egyptians, is an object of veneration in various heathen countries. The gods are frequently represented sitting on the flower of a lotus. Sir J. G. Wilkinson informs us, that Elhôn, the Egyptian god of day, is thus represented on the monuments. "He is then," says he, "supposed to signify the sun in the winter solstice, or the rising sun; and the crook and flagellum, the emblems of Osiris, which he sometimes carries, may be intended to indicate the influence he is about to exercise upon mankind. The vase from which the plant grows is a lake of water, and the usual initial of the word ma or mo, water. 'They do indeed,' says Plutarch, 'characterize the rising sun as though it sprang every day afresh out of the lotus plant; but this implies, that to moisture we owe the first kindling of this luminary.'" With respect to the lotus plant on which the deity is represented seated, Sir John Gardner Wilkinson, remarks, that "it is always the Nymphaea Lotus, and in no instance the Nelumbo. And though this last is mentioned by several ancient authors among the plants of Egypt, it is never introduced into the sculptures as a sacred emblem, nor indeed as a production of the country; a fact which goes far to disprove one of the supposed analogies of the Egyptian and Indian objects of veneration. With regard to the common lotus, so frequently represented as a favourite flower in the hands of the Egyptians, (as the rose or others might be in the hands of any modern people,) there is no evidence of its having been sacred, much less an object of worship."

Among the Hindus the lotus has been generally recognized as the symbol of Brahma, the creator of the world, who, poised upon a lotus leaf, floated upon the waters, and all that he was able to discern with his eight eyes, for he had four heads, was water and darkness. The lotus, accordingly, continues to be revered in the temples of the Hindus, as well as among the Buddhists of Thibet and Nepal; and a Nepalese bowed reverently before this plant as he noticed it in entering the study of Sir William Jones. The lotus is the emblem of the generative power of nature, and hence it is found accompanying the images of all the Hindu gods, who personify the idea of creation or generation. The symbol of the lotus has been carried by Buddhism from India into China, and even into Japan, where the god CANON (which see) is represented sitting upon a lotus.

LOVE (FAMILY OF). See FAMILISTS.

LOVE-FEASTS. These feasts, as they were practised among the primitive Christians, have been fully described in the article AGAPÆ (which see). Imitations of the custom are found in a few modern churches. Thus the Moravians have from time to time meetings of the Brethren, at which refreshments are handed round, while addresses are delivered upon religious subjects, varied with singing hymns, and reading the Scriptures. Love-feasts are held among the Wesleyan Methodists quarterly, to which persons are admitted by ticket or a note from the superintendent. The meeting begins with singing and prayer; afterwards small pieces of bread or plain cake with water are distributed, and all present eat and drink together in token of brotherly love. After a few addresses, a collection is made for the poor, and the meeting is closed with prayer.

LOW CHURCHMEN, a name often given to the Evangelical party in the Church of England, who are generally understood to hold and to teach the pure doctrines of the Protestant Reformation. They disavow all sympathy with the Tractarian or Romanizing party. (See ANGLO-CATHOLICS.) A party existed in the reign of Queen Anne, bearing the name of Low Churchmen. They were understood, however, to be latitudinarian in their sentiments, and their doctrinal teaching had a tendency towards Socinianism. But the Low Churchmen of the present day have received their name in consequence of the low views which they are believed to entertain on the subject of the authority of the church, and the apostolical dignity of the clergy. Their theological views are generally considered to be more strictly Calvinistic than either the High or the Broad Church party. The Low Churchmen are at present a minority in the Church of England, but occupy a high place in public estimation. Their zeal and activity in the support of missions both at home and abroad, are shown in the warm support which they lend to the Church Missionary and Pastoral Aid Societies, as well as to religious and benevolent institutions generally. "The Evangelical party in the Church of England," says Mr. Marsden, "claims to represent, both in Church polity and doctrinal theology, the principles of the Reformation, as the Reformation was understood and practised, down to nearly the close of the reign of James I. Amongst them are to be found some who hold the Divine right of episcopacy and the necessity of an apostolical succession; but these are the exceptions. In general they maintain, rather, that episcopacy is a wise and ancient form of government than that it is essential to the constitution of a church. They do not hesitate to recognize Presbyterian Churches, nor do they deny the claims of orthodox dissenters. Orders may be valid, though irregular, and churches may be defective in many points and yet possess all that is essential to constitute a church. The unity of a church consists in the spiritual dependence and vital union which each member of it possesses with Christ, the church's head. In doctrine, the Low Church party place justification by faith only, in the foreground; they preach the total fall of man in Adam, and the necessity of the new birth; and they differ from High Churchmen in asserting that this new birth, or regeneration, does not of necessity take place in baptism, and they deny that it is inseparable from it. Of both the sacraments, indeed, they hold that they do not necessarily convey grace; but only to those who partake of them aright. In their ministrations the doctrines of redemption are made prominent. They have occasionally been charged with neglecting to inculcate the ordinary duties of life; but Antinomianism, which would be the result of such neglect, seldom makes its appearance in their flocks. The party is often termed Calvinistic; but the word is not very accurately employed. Many are Evangelical Arminians, and not a few, who are content to accept the name of Calvinists, hold, in fact, the disputed points nearly as Arminius held them. It is singular, perhaps, that amongst the evangelical clergy the writings of Calvin should be little read, and, indeed, scarcely known. A society was formed within the last few years for the publication of Calvin's works; it met with little encouragement, and entailed, we have understood, a heavy loss on its projectors. About the same time the Parker Society was instituted, for republishing the divines of the English Reformation, and met with complete success."

LOW SUNDAY, the octave of the first Sunday after Easter-day, as being a festival, though of a lower degree. It is called in the Roman church the Dominica in Albis.

LOXIAS, a surname of Apollo as the interpreter of Zeus.

LOXO, a surname of the Grecian goddess Artemis.

LOYOLA (IGNATIUS). See JESUITS.

LUA, one of the ancient Italian goddesses, to whom the arms of a conquered enemy were dedicated and burnt as a sacrifice in her honour.

LUCAR, CYRIL, (CONFESSION OF), a remarkable Confession of Faith drawn up by Cyril Lucar, patriarch of Constantinople, and published at Geneva in 1630, in the Latin language. It is divided into separate articles, with Scripture proofs appended to each. Lucar had firmly resisted the project of uniting the Greek with the Latin church, and his design in publishing the Confession appears to have been to bring about, if possible, a union of the Greek with the Reformed church. It agrees in almost every point with the doctrine and discipline of Calvin, and shows evidently, on the part of the author, a strong desire to bring about a reformation of the Greek church. The Greeks to this day strenuously deny the authenticity of Lucar's Confession, but there is a mass of positive testimony in its favour, which places it beyond a doubt. A second edition was published by the author, with some additions and improvements, during the year 1633. Various editions appeared also after his death, particularly in Holland, where it attracted much notice.

LUCERIA, a surname of Juno, as the giver of light, the name being derived from Lat. lux, light.

LUCERIUS, a surname of Jupiter among the ancient Romans.

LUCERNARIUM (from Lat. lucerna, a lamp), a name given to the evening service, in the early Christian Church, because it commonly began when darkness came on, and it was necessary to light up the apartment.

LUCIA'S (ST.) DAY, a festival observed by the Church of Rome on the 13th of December.

LUCIANISTS, the followers of Lucian, a presbyter of Antioch, in the beginning of the fourth century, who held opinions in regard to the Person of Christ akin to those which were afterwards maintained by the Semi-Arians. The school which he founded at Antioch became famous, and amongst his scholars were several of the heads of the Arian party, particularly Eusebius of Nicomedia, Maris, and Theognis. It is doubtful whether Lucian himself held Arian opinions, but historically speaking, Dr. Newman thinks that he may almost be considered as the author of Arianism. Epiphanius says, that he considered the Word in the Person of Christ as the substitute for a human soul; and although he suffered martyrdom at the hands of heathen persecutors, A. D. 311, there is too much reason for believing, that his theological views were far from being orthodox, as there is clear evidence that he was under excommunication during three successive patriarchs. It is pleasing, however, to know that ten or fifteen years before his martyrdom he was reconciled to the church, and in all probability at that time he would renounce the heretical sentiments he may have previously entertained. Chrysostom's panegyric on the festival of his martyrdom is still extant, and both Rufinus and Jerome speak of him in terms of high eulogium. But whatever may have been the character of the man, it is an undoubted fact, that the Semi-Arians adopted his creed, which is extant. During the interval which elapsed between the Nicene council in 325 and the death of Constantius in 361, Antioch was the metropolis of the heretical, as Alexandria was of the orthodox party. From Antioch originated the attack upon the church after the decision of the council of Nice. In Antioch the heresy first showed itself in the shape of Semi-Arianism when Lucian's creed was produced. There, too, in this and subsequent councils, negotiations on Arianism were conducted with the Western church. At Antioch lastly, and at Tyre, a suffragan see, the sentence of condemnation was pronounced upon Athanasius. The Lucianists, therefore, may well be considered as having exercised an influence which long survived the death of their leader.

LUCIFERIAN, the followers of the famous Lucifer, bishop of Cagliari in Sardinia, in the fourth century. The first appearance which this keen and, indeed, somewhat intemperate opponent of the Arians makes in ecclesiastical history, is as legate along with Eusebius of Vercelli, from Pope Liberius to the great council of Milan, which was held in 355. The Emperor Constantius presided, and so offensive to the Arian emperor was the violence of Lucifer, that he was first cast into prison, and then driven from place to place as an exile. The many hardships and cruelties, however, to which he was exposed, had little or no effect in subduing his fiery and irascible temper, which at length alienated from him both the eastern and western clergy, and even Athanasius himself, whose cause he had so warmly espoused. His followers, who received the name of Luciferians, were few in number, but they regarded themselves as constituting the only pure church on earth. A rooted aversion to Arianism was the one prevailing sentiment which bound them together as a body. They held that no Arian bishop, and no bishop who had in any measure yielded to the Arians, even although he repented and confessed his errors, could enter the bosom of the church without forfeiting his ecclesiastical rank, and that all bishops and others who admitted the claims of such persons to a full restoration of their privileges, ought to be regarded as outcasts from the Christian communion.

LUCINA, the goddess among the ancient Romans who presided over childbearing, and in this character, also, a surname of Juno and Diana. On the occasion of the birth of a son in families of rank, it was not unusual to have a Lectisternium, in honour of Juno Lucina.

LUCRINA, a surname of Venus derived from the Lucrine lake, near which stood a temple to her honour.

LUDI APOLLINARES. See APOLLINARES LUDI.

LUDI FUNEBRES (Lat. funeral games), celebrated at the funeral pyre of distinguished persons among the ancient Greeks and Romans. They were private entertainments given by survivors in honour of their deceased friends, and were sometimes continued for two or three days. See FUNERAL RITES.

LUDI LIBERALES. See DIONYSIA.

LUDI MAGNI. See CIRCENSIAN GAMES.

LUDI MARTIALES (Lat. martial games), celebrated every year among the ancient Romans, in the circus, on the 1st of August, in honour of Mars, the god of war.

LUKE'S (St.) DAY, a Romish festival held on the 18th of October in honour of Luke the Evangelist. It is observed in the Greek church on the same day.

LUNA, the moon, worshipped both among the ancient Greeks and Romans. The latter are said to have received this mode of worship from the Sabines, in the time of Romulus. Servius Tullius built a temple in honour of this goddess on the Aventine hill, which was followed afterwards by another on the Capitoline, and a third on the Palatine hill. See MOON-WORSHIP.

LUPERCA, a goddess among the ancient Italians, who was said to have nursed Romulus and Remus in the form of a she-wolf. She was the wife of Lupercus, and has sometimes been identified with ACCA LARENTIA (which see).

LUPERCALIA, one of the most ancient festivals celebrated by the Romans on the 15th of February every year in honour of Lupercus, the god of fertility, or as various writers, both Greek and Roman, allege, in honour of Pan. Plutarch calls it the feast of wolves, and declares it to have been of a lustral or ceremonially purifying character. He adds that it was the generally received opinion, that the Arcadians, at the period of their immigration into Italy under the conduct of Evander, introduced it among the natives. But in whatever way it may have first come among the Romans, it was in some way or other connected with the well-known legend that Romulus and Remus, the first founders of Rome, were suckled by a she-wolf, and, accordingly, the rites of the Lupercalia were observed in the Luperical, which was supposed to have been the place where this strange nursing was carried on. On the appointed day of the festival, the LUPERCI (which see), assembled and offered sacrifices of goats and young dogs. The ceremony which followed was of a peculiar kind, and difficult of explanation. Two youths of high rank were led forward to the Luperci, who, having dipped a sword in the blood of one of the victims which had been sacrificed, touched their foreheads with it; after which some of the other priests advanced forward and wiped off the blood with a piece of woollen rag which had been dipped in milk. The youths now burst into a fit of laughter, and forthwith the general merriment which characterized this festival began. The priests having feasted themselves, and indulged freely in wine, covered their bodies over with the skins of the goats which they had sacrificed. Thus fantastically dressed they ran up and down the streets brandishing thongs of goat-skin leather, with which they struck all they met, particularly women, who hailed the infliction of the sacred lash as a species of ceremonial lustration. This festival was long observed in commemoration of the founding of Rome, but having been neglected in the time of Julius Cæsar, it was revived by Augustus, and continued to be celebrated until the reign of the Emperor Anastasius.

LUPERCI, the most ancient order of priests among the Romans. They were sacred to Pan, the god of the country, and particularly of shepherds, whose flocks he guarded. Plutarch derives the name from lupa, a she-wolf, and traces the origin of their institution to the fabulous she-wolf which suckled Romulus and Remus. They formed originally a college, consisting of two classes, the Fabii or Fabiani, and the Quinctilii or Quinctiliani. In regard to their precise number originally, we have no certain information. It is most probable that their office was not for life, but only for a certain time. They were held in great honour among the people. Julius Cæsar instituted a third class of Luperci under the name of Julii or Juliani, endowing them with certain revenues, of which, however, they were afterwards deprived. At first the Luperci were taken from the higher classes of society, but in course of time the whole order fell into disrepute.

LUPERCUS, an ancient Italian god, worshipped by shepherds, under the idea that he protected their flocks from wolves, and also rendered the sheep more fruitful. He has not unfrequently been identified with the god Pan. In honour of Lupercus, the ancient festival LUPERCALIA (which see), was annually celebrated.

LUSTRATION, purification from ceremonial defilement. This was effected from very early times by ABLUTION (which see) in water. Among the ancient Greeks and Romans, sacrifices were generally accompanied by lustrations, which were performed by sprinkling water by means of a branch of laurel or olive, or by means of the aspergillum, as it was called among the Romans, or chernips among the Greeks. Individuals, cities, and even states underwent solemn lustration when defiled by crime, or, as was often done, with a view to call down the blessing of the gods. Fields were lustrated at the AMBARVALIA (which see), and sheep at the PALILIA (which see). The armies of the Romans were lustrated before taking the field, and their fleets before setting sail. On all these occasions sacrifices were offered, and the victims cut into pieces were carried three times round the object to be lustrated; prayers being all the while offered to the gods. Whenever Rome itself, or any other city in the empire, was visited with any calamity, the uniform practice was forthwith to subject it to lustration. The whole Roman people, indeed, underwent lustration every five years, when sacrifices called Suovetaurilia were offered, consisting of a pig, a sheep, and an ox. The people assembled on the occasion in the Campus Martius, and sacrifices having been offered, the victims were carried thrice round the multitude. This ceremony was called a lustrum, and being a quinquennial rite, the word was often used to denote the space of five years.

LUTEI (Lat. earthy), a term of reproach applied by the Ori-genists to the orthodox in the ancient Christian church.

LUTHER (MARTIN). This illustrious Reformer was born at Eisleben in Saxony, on the 10th November 1483, and on the following day he was baptized by the name of Martin, in honour of the saint on whose festival he was born. His parents were at that time in humble circumstances, but of industrious habits, and correct moral character. Martin was sent to school at a very early age. His father was a man of warm unaffected piety, and might often be heard praying beside the bedside of his son, that the Lord would make him partaker of his grace, and fit him for usefulness in propagating the pure doctrine of Christ. To his dying hour Luther spoke with the greatest respect of his parents, but at the same time he was wont frequently to say that they had acted towards him with too much severity in his childhood. "My parents," he confesses, "treated me with so much strictness, that I became perfectly spirit-broken, ran away to a monastery, and became a monk; their intentions were good, but they knew not how to apportion the punishment to the offence." He remained under his father's roof till he had attained his fourteenth year, when he was sent to Magdeburg to prosecute his studies. Here he remained only a year when he removed to Eisenach, where his mother's relatives resided. In this place he became connected with a choral school, at which the sons of indigent persons were received and instructed gratis, while in return they were expected to sing during Divine worship in the churches, and also from house to house when they solicited contributions, and thus aided the funds of the institution. Such a mode of earning his bread was sufficiently humiliating to young Luther, and it gave him no small relief, therefore, when a pious woman of the name of Cotta took him into her house, where he was enabled to apply to his studies without being distracted by anxiety about his worldly support. In his eighteenth year, in 1501, Martin Luther went to study at the University of Erfurt, where his father, whose circumstances had before this time undergone considerable improvement, supported him, though with great personal exertion and sacrifice. Having studied philosophy with diligence and success, he began to turn his attention to the subject of jurisprudence. While thus engaged in the acquisition of useful knowledge, he met with a Latin Bible in the library at Erfurt, which on careful examination he found to be a treasure of divine knowledge. His attention was particularly attracted by the history of Hannah and her son Samuel, which he read with peculiar delight. This perhaps tended to give him a relish for the Word of God, and an earnest desire to be more fully acquainted with its precious contents.

Luther now devoted himself to the study of scholastic divinity, in which every educated man of that time was expected to be versed. Nor was this to him an unprofitable acquisition, preparing him as it did for fighting all the more successfully the battles of the Reformation. His health, however, was not a little injured by the assiduity with which he prosecuted his researches into the doctrines of the schoolmen. In consequence of excessive mental exertion, a deep shade of melancholy settled upon his spirits, and rendered his youthful days unhappy. Struggling against this painful depression, he persevered in his studies, and obtained from the university the degree, first of Bachelor, and then of Doctor of Philosophy. He now began to give public lectures on various subjects, particularly on the physics and morals of Aristotle. While thus immersed in secular pursuits, a singular and awful event occurred which suddenly gave a new direction to his whole future life. This was the sudden death of his intimate friend Alexius, who, while standing by his side, was killed in a moment by a flash of lightning. An event of this kind produced a powerful effect upon the susceptible mind of Luther. He resolved to assume the monastic profession, and accordingly, he was enrolled in a monastery of Augustine friars. The motives by which he was actuated in taking this apparently precipitate step, he thus explained sixteen years later:—"I was never in heart a monk, nor was it to mortify the lust of fleshly appetites, but tormented with horror and the fear of death, I took a forced and constrained vow." The order which Luther joined was marked for its discipline and regularity. His ardent wish in becoming a monk was to obtain peace with God by religious exercises, but in this he was disappointed, and he sought in vain amid profound darkness to obtain the light of life. His formal entry into the convent took place in 1506. He continued a few years in the monastery, where all his time which was not spent in exercises of devotion or penance was employed in ardent study. At this period Luther perused with diligence the writings of Augustine. The strictness and abstemiousness of his monastic life undermined his naturally strong constitution. Fits of depression frequently came over him. Once on an occasion of this kind, he locked himself into his cell for several days, refusing to admit any one; and at last his door being broken open, he was found in a state of insensibility, from which he was recovered by means of music, of which he was passionately fond, and which was his sole recreation.

In 1508, Luther was invited to occupy a chair of philosophy at Wittenberg; but although he accepted this office, he still retained his monastic connection, and accordingly, he took up his residence in a house of the same order in Wittenberg. His lectures both on physics and moral philosophy were much admired and well attended. In a short time, however, after he had taken up his residence at the university, he was called by the senate to fill the office of preacher, which, though he shrunk from it at first on account of its heavy responsibility, he was at length prevailed upon to accept. With great diffidence he first made trial of his powers in the monastery, then in the private chapel of the castle, and publicly in the parish church. His pulpit addresses, which were characterized by much unction, and very frequent appeals to the Word of God, were received with unusual approbation. Not long after this he was invested with the honourable title of Bachelor of Theology, and at the same time he acquired the right to give theological lectures. This was the position best suited to his inclinations and peculiar gifts. He now felt himself in his proper sphere, and therefore, he devoted his whole energies to the high duties of his sacred calling. He gave lectures on the Old and New Testaments, which displayed so minute an acquaintance with the Word of God, as well as with the writings of the Fathers, that he speedily earned for himself a high reputation as a theological lecturer.

The estimation in which Luther was held among the Augustinian monks led Staupitz, the vicar-general of the order in Germany, to select him as a suitable person to undertake a mission to Rome. The object of this mission, according to some writers, was the settlement of disputes which had arisen in his order; according to others, to obtain permission for invalid brethren to eat meat in cases of great bodily weakness. Whatever may have been his errand, he set out for Rome in 1510. His feelings on coming in sight of the great city he thus describes: "When I first beheld Rome, I fell prostrate to the earth, and raising my hands, exclaimed, God save thee Rome, thou seat of the Holy One; yea, thrice holy from the blood of the sainted martyrs, which has been shed within thy walls." The veneration, however, with which he first looked upon the city, speedily gave place to very different feelings. The frivolity and corruption of the lower grades of the clergy, and the infamous lives of the superior orders, awakened in his mind the utmost indignation, and even contempt. Yet in spite of all these enormities, he still considered Rome a place of extraordinary sanctity, and he returned home to Germany a firm believer in the Holy Father. As an acknowledgment of Luther's merit as a lecturer, as well as on account of the skilful execution of his Roman mission, the title of Doctor of Divinity was conferred on him at the instigation of Staupitz. In Wittenberg, his popularity and influence daily increased. Such was the confidence reposed in him, that he was intrusted with the superintendence and visitation of about forty monasteries, which were subject to the jurisdiction of the vicar-general. This office afforded him ample opportunity of becoming acquainted with the vices and defects of a monastic life, and thus tended to prepare and qualify him for afterwards undertaking the responsible duties of a Reformer. The different offices, both secular and spiritual, which he was now called upon to discharge, formed also an admirable training for his future sphere of action. Meanwhile, he was a most devoted son of the Romish Church, and firm believer in the infallibility of the Pope.

Till the year 1517, Luther had continued quietly to prosecute his work as a preacher of the gospel, and a lecturer on Theology, to the edification of many, who eagerly longed for a clear and intimate acquaintance with Divine truth. An event, however, occurred at this time, which opened up for him an entirely new career. The Papal treasury had become well nigh exhausted, and the sale of indulgences was resorted to with the view of opening new resources. John Tetzel, a Dominican friar, was selected as an active agent in carrying on this lucrative trade. Travelling through Germany, this unscrupulous monk had reached Jüterbock, in the neighbourhood of Wittenberg, when Luther, disgusted at the shameless traffic in indulgences, preached against them as tending openly to encourage immorality, and he even published a sermon on the subject. He had now entered the field against the abuses of the Church of Rome, and on the 31st of October 1517, he took a still bolder step by affixing to the church of the castle of Wittenberg, ninety-five Theses or sentences on the sale of indulgences, challenging any man to a public disputation on the point. "This," says Pflzer, "was the first electric flash from the torch that was kindled at the martyred Huss's funeral pile, and, reaching the remotest corner of the land, gave the signal of mighty future events." "In less than fourteen days," writes a contemporary, "these Theses were read through every part of Germany; and ere four weeks had elapsed, they had overspread the whole of Christendom, as if the angels of heaven had been the messengers to exhibit them to universal gaze." The wonderful effect produced by the publication of Luther's Theses moved Tetzel to attempt a reply. He issued accordingly, at Frankfort on the Oder, a series of one hundred and six propositions, designed to establish the authority of the Pope, as well as of all the clergy deputed by him, to forgive sins. In this production of the Dominican monk, the Propositions of Luther were one and all condemned as an accursed heresy.

In the beginning of the year 1518, a meeting of Augustine monks took place at Heidelberg, at which Luther, according to invitation, attended. Here, before a large assembly, he disputed against five doctors of divinity upon twenty-eight theological and twelve philosophical Propositions, and the argumentative power, as well as scriptural research, which he brought to bear upon the traditionary dogmas of the church, showed him to be a polemic of no common order. On his return to Wittenberg, he wrote, in answer to Tetzel's Counter-Propositions, his Resolutions or explanations of his Theses, a treatise in which he brought prominently forward the truth that no man could be justified but by faith; and defending himself with great ability against the charge of heresy, he declared his intention of keeping to the Holy Scriptures, the resolutions of Councils and the Papal decrees. This publication he sent to the Pope, Leo X., accompanied by a very humble letter, dated 30th May 1518. The enemies of Luther now assailed him on every side, but he stood his ground with intrepid manfulness. At the conclusion of one of the pamphlets, which he published at this time, he breaks forth in these impassioned words: "Now, farewell, thou blasphemous, corrupt, unholy Rome! At length the wrath of God is coming over thee, as thou hast deserved; because, notwithstanding the many prayers that have been so continually offered for thee, it has been thy unceasing endeavour to become more abominable. We would have healed Babylon, but she is not healed; forsake her, that she may become the habitation of devils, and the hold of every foul spirit, and a cage of every unclean and hateful bird; wild beasts of the desert shall be there; their houses shall be full of doleful creatures, and owls shall dwell there, and satyrs shall dance there, and the cormorant and bittern shall possess it; and let the line of confusion be stretched out upon it, that it may remain full of idolaters, perjurers, apostates, and murderers! Beloved reader, fare thee well! forgive that warmth, with which grief and indignation of heart have filled my speech."

The keenness with which the controversy was maintained on both sides, awakened so wide an interest among all classes of the people, that the Emperor Maximilian wrote a letter to the Pope claiming his interference, and offering to secure the thorough execution of his decree whatever it might be. Leo, however, though seated in the Pontifical chair, was too indifferent to all that regarded religion to take any active concern in what he considered as a mere monkish quarrel. At the instigation of others, he called upon the Elector of Saxony to withdraw his protection from Luther, and as a proof of his obedience to the papal chair, to deliver the heretical monk to the Cardinal legate Thomas Cajetan, to whom his Holiness had given the following explicit instructions:—"The Cardinal shall immediately summon Luther, who is to be regarded as a confirmed heretic, and compel him to appear before him, and in case of need to call in the assistance of the civil power. When in Rome, he shall be kept in safe custody, till further orders are given to bring him before the Apostolic chair. But if he shall humble himself, and give true signs of repentance before the Cardinal, and freely and spontaneously beg forgiveness, the Cardinal is empowered to receive him again into the bosom of the church. Should he however persist in obstinacy, and the legate not succeed in seizing his person, he is commanded to declare him, and all who adhere to and follow him, heretics, excommunicated, and accursed. All the members of the empire are commanded, under pain of anathema and interdict, to lend assistance to the legate, in the execution of his commission."

Luther was forthwith summoned to Rome to answer to a charge of heresy, but he refused to obey the summons, declaring his readiness, however, to appear and to defend his cause before pious, impartial, and learned judges in Germany. The university of Wittenberg, and others friendly to him, interceded with the Pope, and accordingly the citation to Rome was changed into a summons to Augsburg, which Luther declared his intention to obey. Some kind friends, concerned for the safety of his valuable life, attempted to dissuade him from his purpose, but regardless of danger, and confiding in the protection of heaven, he set out for Augsburg, which he reached unharmed, and took up his lodgings in an Augustine convent. He had three interviews with the Cardinal Cajetan, the Pope's legate, at each of which he used all the arguments he could command to induce Luther to renounce his heresies; but all was unavailing. That nothing might be left undone to effect a settlement of the dispute, Luther addressed two letters to the Cardinal, offering to remain silent on the controverted points, provided equal silence were imposed upon his adversaries. But to neither of his letters did he obtain a reply; and accordingly, he quitted Augsburg. The legate complained bitterly to the Elector of Luther's sudden departure, and entreated Frederic either to send Luther to Rome, or to expel him from his dominions. Finding that the prince, who had so generously thrown the shield of his protection over him, might now on his account be brought into collision with the Pope, he resolved that rather than bring the Elector into trouble, he would leave his territories, and commit his way unto the Lord. This determination, however, was changed, and the Elector rejected the Cardinal's proposal to expel him from his dominions.

Notwithstanding the urgent representations of Cajetan, the Pope took no active steps against Luther, but contented himself with issuing a general decree, in which the Papal doctrine respecting indulgences was confirmed, and every tenet to the contrary was forbidden under pain of excommunication. Leo finding that Cajetan had failed in accomplishing the object of his instructions, dispatched a new agent in the person of Charles John Miltitz, Papal Nuncio and Privy Councillor, with general instructions to adopt whatever steps he might consider best fitted to put an end to the dispute. This papal emissary arrived in Saxony towards the close of 1518, bringing with him the Golden Rose, as a present from the Pope to the Elector Frederic. Miltitz had the sagacity to perceive that matters were in a very different state in Germany from what had been represented at Rome. He soon saw the general popularity of Luther's cause, and the necessity therefore of adopting conciliatory measures. He solicited a meeting with him therefore at Altenburg. The Elector consented to this arrangement, and Luther appeared on the day appointed. The nuncio was favourably impressed with the aspect and address of the Reformer, conversed with him with the utmost apparent candour, and was seemingly affected even to tears. Luther declared his readiness to listen to the proposals of the nuncio, and at his suggestion he addressed a letter to Pope Leo, promising to be silent on the subject of indulgences, if silence were likewise imposed on his adversaries, and declaring that he would admonish the people zealously to honour the Roman church.

Thus the controversy seemed on the point of being amicably terminated, but an event occurred almost immediately after, which rendered Luther's reconciliation with Rome almost hopeless. Dr. Eck, the author of the Obelisk, had challenged Carlstadt to a public disputation on the contested points of theology, and in thirteen Theses which he had written in preparation for the discussion, he attacked Luther's declaration on indulgences. Luther opposed these by thirteen other Theses, in which he declared that the assumption of the Church of Rome to be the head of all other churches is contradicted by the approved histories of eleven hundred years, by the text of the Holy Scriptures, and by the resolutions of the council of Nice. A public discussion, accordingly, was held in Leipsic, between Eck on the one side, and Carlstadt and Luther on the other. The first week the dispute was between Eck and Carlstadt on the subject of Free-Will; and on the second week the discussion was between Eck and Luther on the primacy of the Pope. In the third week, Eck again disputed with Luther on repentance, purgatory, indulgences, and the power of the priesthood to forgive sins. The last three days were spent in discussions between Eck and Carlstadt. The universities of Paris and Erfurt were proposed and accepted as arbiters in the dispute, but Luther reserved to himself the power of appeal from the universities to a council. In the course of the debate, the Reformer made a concession of which he afterwards repented, acknowledging the Pope as Lord of the church by human consent. He had said enough, however, to rouse the anger of his opponents, who lost no time in laying before the Elector of Saxony serious complaints respecting Luther's heresies. This led to a counter declaration on the part of Luther and Carlstadt; and besides, Luther was called to publish a reply to the Franciscans, who charged him with having written fifteen heretical propositions. While thus engaged in sharp contention, and harassed by opposition from many quarters, the heart of the Reformer was cheered by learning that his conduct in the Leipsic disputation was warmly approved, and that his writings had been very favourably received both in Italy and France. The Hussites of Bohemia addressed to him letters of congratulation on the noble stand which he had made against the corruptions of the church. Thus encouraged to proceed in the work of Reformation, Luther published several treatises on points of theology, which attracted great attention, and increased his popularity. Among these may be mentioned a Sermon on the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of our Lord, with a frontispiece representing the sacramental cup. In this production the Romish doctrine of the efficacy of the sacraments ex opere operato was assailed with great ability, and the necessity of faith on the part of the communicant was clearly proved from Scripture. In regard to the denial of the cup to the laity, Luther maintained that the Bohemian church was guilty of no heresy in administering the sacrament in both kinds, and that it was by all means desirable to celebrate the sacrament exactly as Christ had instituted it when on earth. The publication of this sermon caused a great sensation, not only in Saxony, but in various other parts of Germany, and particularly in Bohemia, where it was the means of adding no fewer than six thousand persons to the body of the reformed.

Miltitz, the Papal nuncio, was exceedingly anxious to bring to a satisfactory settlement the dispute between Luther and the Pope. To effect if possible this object, he had frequent interviews with the Reformer, but without success. Towards the end of August 1520, the Augustines held a general chapter in Eisleben, at which the nuncio attended, and prevailed upon them to use their influence with Luther to induce him to make formal submission to the Pope. A bull of excommunication was daily expected from Rome, and more especially as Eck, the violent enemy of Luther, had proceeded thither a few months before. The enemies of the Reformer were unwearied in their attempts to injure him, by propagating calumnies and misrepresentations in regard both to his motives and sentiments. To obviate the evil influence of these rumours upon the minds of rulers and men of power, he addressed explanatory letters to several, and among others to Charles V., who had been shortly before chosen Emperor of Germany.

About this time, Luther published a Treatise on Good Works, in which he set forth Faith in contradistinction to Works, as the sole ground of man's justification before God. This of course struck at the root of the Romish doctrine on the subject of justification, and placed Luther in an attitude of complete antagonism to the creed of the church. He was induced by Miltitz, however, to take one more step to bring about a reconciliation, by addressing a letter to the Pope, along with a short Essay which he had written on Christian Liberty. His letter to Leo X. breathed so strong a spirit of independence, that the only result which was likely to flow from it was, that matters must ere long come to a crisis. "Although I have been compelled," says the bold and intrepid Reformer, "by some of your unchristian flatterers, who have utterly without provocation assailed me, to appeal to a free and Christian council; I have still never suffered my mind to be so far estranged from you, as not from my inmost heart to have wished the best things for you and the Papal chair, and made them the subject of my earnest daily prayer to God. I supplicate you, Holy Father Leo, to accept my apology, and believe me to be a man, who would be far from any attempt to be undutiful towards your person, and be assured that I am rather filled with the warmest sentiments of regard and veneration. To every man I am prepared to give way in all things, but the word of God I dare neither abandon nor deny. Yet it is true I have handled the Romish court rather roughly, but neither you, nor any man on earth, can deny it to be viler and more abominable than ever was Sodom, Gomorrah, or Babylon; and so far as I can perceive, its wickedness is neither to be reformed nor rooted out, but is practised so shamefully in the face of day, that the Romish church, in former times so holy, is now become a den filled with every crime, a sink of all iniquity, the metropolis and empire of sin, death, and everlasting destruction. While you, most Holy Father Leo, sit like a lamb among wolves, and like Daniel among the lions, or Ezekiel among the scorpions, what can you, who are but an individual, do against such a host of monsters? And although you might chance to have the countenance of three or four learned and pious Cardinals, what are they amidst so great a host? Sooner would you fall by poison, than succeed in checking so vile a pestilence. The glory of the Pontificate is departed. The wrath of God is come upon it for ever. Hostile to a general council, unwilling to receive correction, or submit to be reformed; still a violent unchristian demeanour will not prevent the fulfilment of what has been declared respecting the mother of harlots the ancient Babylon. 'We would have healed Babylon, but she is not healed, forsake her.'—Jer. li. Therefore it has always grieved me, Oh, pious Leo, that you have become Pope in such a time as this. You were worthy to have been Pope in better days. The Romish chair is unworthy of you, the Evil Spirit should rather be chosen to fill it, for he assuredly has more influence in Babylon than you."

Before this letter was written, a bull of excommunication against Luther, containing a formal condemnation of his writings, had been despatched from Rome by the hands of Eck, and the language of the letter just cited was not likely to induce its recall. The Papal bull met with little encouragement in Germany, and independently of the nature of the document, great offence was taken that the personal enemy of Luther was chosen as its bearer. The Reformer now drew up an appeal from the Pope to a council; and in a letter to Spalatin, he says, "I despise it, and pull it in pieces as a wicked, lying, and infamous bull." The people in some places now began to burn the writings of Luther, and in return he caused the papal decretals to be committed to the flames in the presence of a crowd of doctors, masters of arts, and students; and throwing the bull of excommunication into the fire with his own hands, he exclaimed, "Because thou hast grieved the saints of the Lord, so mayest thou be grieved and condemned by the everlasting fire." After this decisive step by which he openly threw off the Papal yoke, he published a declaration vindicating his conduct.

Luther now felt as if entirely set at liberty, the tie which had so long bound him to Rome being finally and for ever severed. From this time he assumed the attitude of an open and uncompromising foe of the Pope and all his emissaries. Not that he was insensible of, or indifferent to, the danger of his position, but he was so firmly impressed with the belief that the truth of God was on his side, that he felt no inclination to shrink from the responsible work which he had undertaken. He acquired fresh stimulus by the issuing of a bull from the Pope. With indefatigable industry he wrote pamphlet after pamphlet, exposing the errors both in doctrine and practice of the Church of Rome. His enemies were enraged, and such was the madness of their resentment, that had not a special Providence watched over his valuable life, it would have been sacrificed without remorse.

About the middle of the year 1520, Luther published an address to the Christian nobles of Germany, containing proposals for a comprehensive reform of the church, and exhibiting a lively portraiture of the abuses which in the course of time had crept into its constitution and government. When Luther wrote this address, he did not regard a total breach with the Pope and the church as necessary, but trusted, or at least hoped, that a complete reformation of abuses might yet be effected. But on the 3d of January 1521, the Papal bull of excommunication against him was repeated, and the previous conditional sentence was converted into an unconditional decree. The young Emperor of Germany, Charles V., was to preside at the Diet of Worms, which was at hand, and he requested the Elector of Saxony to send Luther thither, promising to have him examined by wise and learned men, and to permit no injury to befall him. The Elector, however, in his anxiety to preserve Luther from danger, declined the Emperor's proposal, but at the same time requested to have the opinion of Luther on the point. The reply of the Reformer was firm and decided: "If I am summoned," said he, "I will go even though I must needs be carried there in my bed, for I cannot doubt that the Emperor's call is likewise God's call." He received a formal citation to appear at the Diet, along with an Imperial safe conduct, and accordingly, he travelled to Worms in the beginning of April 1521. Many were the attempts made by his friends to dissuade him from prosecuting this journey, but remaining proof alike against the anxiety of his friends, and the threats of his enemies, he replied, "If they were to make a fire between Wittenberg and Worms, which would reach to the heavens, I would still appear in the name of the Lord, and enter the jaws of Behemoth, and treading between his great teeth, confess Christ, and leave him to do all his pleasure;" and when his anxious friend Spalatin sent a messenger to urge him not to come to Worms, he answered, "If there were as many devils in Worms as there are tiles on the roofs I would still enter it."

Luther reached Worms on the 16th April 1521. Many of the nobility went to meet him, and as he entered the city, more than two thousand people accompanied him to his lodgings. There he was visited by many persons of great rank, who admired his calmness and undaunted courage. The day after his arrival he was summoned to appear before the Diet, and having committed himself and his cause to God in secret prayer, he proceeded to the place of meeting. As he passed into the hall, many of the members addressed to him words of comfort and encouragement. His writings having been produced, the question was put to him whether he acknowledged them to be his, whereupon Luther immediately replied in the affirmative. He was next asked if he would recant their contents, and in reply to this question he craved time for reflection, and the Emperor having granted him a day for consideration, the assembly broke up. The following day he was again entreated to recant, but he plainly and firmly refused to do so, adding that he could not retract his opinion unless he were convinced of their falsehood; nor could he consent to their being tried by any other rule than the Word of God. Finding the Reformer inexorable, his enemies called upon the Emperor to violate the safe-conduct, and thus imitate the conduct of the council of Constance in the case of John Huss. Charles, however, firmly refused to act so treacherous a part, and Luther was permitted to depart in safety. A few days after he left the city, a severe edict was published in name of the Emperor, and by authority of the Diet, depriving him of all the privileges which rightly belonged to him as a subject of the empire, forbidding any prince to harbour or protect him, and requiring all to concur in seizing his person as soon as the term specified in his safe-conduct was expired.

This Edict of Worms, rigorous though it was, led to no evil consequences in so far as Luther was concerned. It proved indeed a dead letter. But the sudden disappearance of the Reformer occasioned no small anxiety to his friends, and triumph to his enemies. The Elector of Saxony, who had ever proved his warm and steady friend, no sooner heard that he had left Worms, and was in danger of falling into the hands of his enemies, than he bethought himself of adopting a prudent precaution to secure his safety. The plan to which the Elector resorted is thus described by Dr. Robertson in his History of the Reign of Charles V.: "As Luther, on his return from Worms, was passing near Altenstein in Thuringia, a number of horsemen in masks rushed suddenly out of a wood, where the Elector had appointed them to lie in wait for him, and surrounding his company, carried him, after dismissing all his attendants, to Wartburg, a strong castle not far distant. There the Elector ordered him to be supplied with every thing necessary or agreeable, but the place of his retreat was carefully concealed, until the fury of the present storm against him began to abate, upon a change in the political situation of Europe. In this solitude, where he remained nine months, and which he frequently called his Patmos, after the name of that island to which the Apostle John was banished, he exerted his usual vigour and industry in defence of his doctrines, or in confutation of his adversaries, publishing several treatises, which revived the spirit of his followers, astonished to a great degree, and disheartened, at the sudden disappearance of their leader."

During his residence in the Wartburg, Luther was frequently visited with severe attacks of bodily illness and mental distress. "Believe me," he says, in a letter to a friend, "I am delivered over to a thousand imps of Satan in this solitude; and it is much easier to contend with incarnate fiends, that is, men, than with spiritual wickedness in high places." His distresses, however, were not wholly of a personal nature; he was deeply concerned for the degraded state of the church and clergy. "I sit here the whole day," he writes to Melancthon, "picturing to myself the state of the church, and repeating from the eighty-ninth Psalm, 'Wherefore, O Lord, hast thou made all men in vain?' O Lord God, what a frightful glass of divine wrath, is the cursed kingdom of the Roman antichrist, and I curse my hardness of heart, that I am not melted to tears, and my eyes become fountains of tears, to weep for the destruction of my people; but there is no one who will arise, and stand in the breach against God, or make himself as a wall for the house of Israel, in these last days of divine wrath. Do thou therefore hold out to the end, as a servant of the Lord, and build up the walls and towers of Jerusalem, until they attack thee. Thou knowest thy calling, and thy gifts; I pray for thee, and for thee alone; if my prayers, which indeed I do not doubt, avail aught, do thou the same for me, and so we will jointly bear the burden. We alone stood together on the arena, and they will seek for thee after me."

During his confinement the opinions of Luther continued to gain ground in almost every city of Saxony, but more particularly in Wittenberg, where his doctrines had taken deep root; and there accordingly the first step was taken towards an alteration in the established forms of worship, by abolishing the celebration of private masses, and by doing away with the celebration of the communion in only one kind. But to avail ourselves of the clear and accurate statements of Dr. Robertson: "Whatever consolation the courage and success of his disciples, or the progress of his doctrines in his own country, afforded Luther in his retreat, he there received information of two events which considerably damped his joy, as they seemed to lay insuperable obstacles in the way of propagating his principles in the two most powerful kingdoms of Europe. One was, a solemn decree, condemning his opinions, published by the university of Paris, the most ancient, and, at that time, the most respectable of the learned societies in Europe. The other was the answer written to his book concerning the Babylonish captivity by Henry VIII. of England. That monarch, having been educated under the eye of a suspicious father, who, in order to prevent his attending to business, kept him occupied in the study of literature, still retained a greater love of learning, and stronger habits of application to it, than are common among princes of so active a disposition, and such violent passions. Being ambitious of acquiring glory of every kind, as well as zealously attached to the Romish church, and highly exasperated against Luther, who had treated Thomas Aquinas, his favourite author, with great contempt, Henry did not think it enough to exert his royal authority in opposing the opinions of the Reformer, but resolved likewise to combat them with scholastic weapons. With this view he published his treatise on the Seven Sacraments, which, though forgotten at present, as books of controversy always are, when the occasion that produced them is past, is not destitute of polemical ingenuity and acuteness, and was represented by the flattery of his courtiers to be a work of such wonderful science and learning, as exalted him no less above other authors in merit, than he was distinguished among them by his rank. The Pope, to whom it was presented with the greatest formality in full consistory, spoke of it in such terms, as if it had been dictated by immediate inspiration; and, as a testimony of the gratitude of the church for his extraordinary zeal, conferred on him the title of Defender of the Faith, an appellation which Henry soon forfeited in the opinion of those from whom he derived it, and which is still retained by his successors, though the avowed enemies of those opinions, by contending for which he merited that honourable distinction. Luther, who was not overawed, either by the authority of the university, or the dignity of the monarch, soon published his animadversions on both, in a style no less vehement and severe, than he would have used in confuting his meanest antagonist. This indecent boldness, instead of shocking his contemporaries, was considered by them as a new proof of his undaunted spirit. A controversy managed by disputants so illustrious, drew universal attention; and such was the contagion of the spirit of innovation, diffused through Europe in that age, and so powerful the evidence which accompanied the doctrines of the Reformers on their first publication, that, in spite both of the civil and ecclesiastical powers combined against them, they daily gained converts both in France and in England."

The residence of Luther in the solitary castle of the Wartburg tended more, perhaps, than almost any other event of his history, to mature his views as to the nature and extent of the reforms which the condition of the Romish church required. It was in this retirement also that he commenced the greatest and the most useful of all his works—the translation of the Bible into the German language. In his Parnassus, as he was wont to call it, he actually finished the New Testament. But though thus usefully employed, the bold and restless spirit of the Reformer longed to be at liberty, and to return to active duty. This wish became all the stronger when he learned the unhappy excesses to which the Anabaptists or new prophets, as they called themselves, were pushing his doctrines respecting gospel liberty. In their extravagant enthusiasm, these men were busily propagating the notion that Luther's attempt at reformation was neither sufficiently extensive nor radical. They rejected infant baptism, and boasted of being favoured with immediate revelations from heaven. Under the influence of fanatical zeal, they were exciting tumults, and had succeeded in gaining over to their side Luther's old friend and colleague Carlstadt.

The excesses and disorders introduced by the Anabaptists were far from being favourable to the progress of the Reformed cause, and Luther's fears were strongly aroused lest, on the contrary, the work which he had so much at heart might be thereby seriously imperilled. Unable, therefore, any longer to endure the solitariness of his retreat, he left Wartburg on the 3d of March 1522, resolved to take his place once more in the arena of active warfare. The return of the intrepid German monk excited the greatest rejoicings in Wittenberg, and produced an immediate restoration of tranquillity. He addressed a letter to the Elector, explaining the reasons of his return, and without delay set himself to an exposure of the Zwickan prophets, and the extravagancies of Carlstadt. Nor were his attempts to allay the tumults of the public mind wholly unsuccessful; by his means peace and order were restored at Wittenberg.

Leo X., who had long and ably filled the papal chair, died on the 1st of December 1521, and his successor Adrian VI., who professed a strong desire to bring about a reformation of the church, awakened such bitter feelings of enmity against himself in Rome, that his death, which occurred in September 1523, has been attributed to poison. The pontifical chair was next occupied by Clement VII., who was devoted to the French party, and to some extent favourable to the Reformation. In the meantime, Luther and his fellow-labourers, especially Melancthon, were scattering the seed of the new doctrine in all directions, and in a short time reformed principles pervaded the whole Electorate of Saxony. A new Elector succeeded to the government in 1525, and under his authority, Luther was permitted to introduce the new and simple mode of worship in the chapel of the castle at Wittenberg. The Reformation now began to exercise its due practical influence. The cloisters in various places were abandoned by the monks and nuns. In 1523, Luther mentions, in a letter to Spalatin, the escape of nine nuns from their convents, among whom he mentions the name of Catharine von Bora, who afterwards became his wife.

The estates of Germany assembled in Diet at Nuremberg in 1524, and declared their desire to comply with the edict of Worms, as far as possible, at the same time urging the necessity for a general council. Towards the end of the following year, a new Diet was held at Augsburg, and afterwards removed to Spire. The object of this Diet was declared by the emperor to be the extirpation of the Lutheran heresy, and the execution of the edict of Worms. Such was the opposition, however, offered by the evangelical princes, that the Nuremberg decree alone was renewed in Augsburg, and the estates were recommended to take steps for having the Word of God, according to the true meaning and doctrine of the Universal Church, taught throughout their lands without innovation or tumult.

In the Diet at Spire, which was a prolongation of that at Augsburg, the reform party so far prevailed, that the emperor's demand for the enforcement of the edict of Worms was rejected; and the resolution was adopted to send an embassy to the emperor, requesting him to come to Germany and call a council, and that, in the meantime, each government was to conduct the affairs of religion as they could answer to God and the emperor. In 1529, a Diet was held at Spire, when it was decided by a majority that he should once more be requested to summon within a year either a general council or a national synod, and himself to preside. Those states of the empire, which had hitherto obeyed the edict of Worms, were enjoined to persevere in the observation of it, and the other states were prohibited from attempting any further innovations in religion, particularly from abolishing the mass before the meeting of a general council. The favourers of the new doctrine entered a solemn protest against this decree, as unjust and impious. From this circumstance they received the name of Protestants. "Not satisfied with this declaration of their dissent," says Robertson, "from the decree of the Diet, the Protestants sent ambassadors into Italy, to lay their grievances before the emperor, from whom they met with the most discouraging reception. Charles was at that time in close union with the Pope, and solicitous to attach him inviolably to his interest. During their long residence at Bologna, they held many consultations concerning the most effectual means of extirpating the heresies which had sprung up in Germany. Clement, whose cautious and timid mind the proposal of a general council filled with horror, even beyond what Popes, the constant enemies of such assemblies, usually feel, employed every argument to dissuade the emperor from consenting to that measure. He represented general councils as factious, ungovernable, presumptuous, formidable to civil authority, and too slow in their operations to remedy disorders which required an immediate cure. Experience, he said, had now taught both the emperor and himself, that forbearance and lenity, instead of soothing the spirit of innovation, had rendered it more enterprising and presumptuous; it was necessary, therefore, to have recourse to the rigorous methods which such a desperate case required; Leo's sentence of excommunication, together with the decree of the Diet at Worms, was to be carried into execution, and it was incumbent on the emperor to employ his whole power, in order to overawe those on whom the reverence due either to ecclesiastical or civil authority had no longer any influence. Charles, whose views were very different from the Pope's, and who became daily more sensible how obstinate and deep-rooted the evil was, thought of reconciling the Protestants by means less violent, and considered the convocation of a council as no improper expedient for that purpose; but promised, if gentler arts failed of success, that then he would exert himself with rigour to reduce to the obedience of the Holy See those stubborn enemies of the Catholic faith."

The emperor caused himself to be crowned by the Pope in 1529, and summoned a Diet to be held the following year at Augsburg. The Reformation had already obtained many supporters, and various petty princes of the German states had declared themselves its decided partizans. It had found its way also into Denmark and Sweden. In Switzerland (see HELVETIC REFORMED CHURCHES), under the guidance of Zwingli, it had, before this time, made very extensive progress. The Swiss and German Reformers, however, differed widely from each other on the subject of the presence of Christ in the Lord's Supper. Several attempts were made, but in vain, by private individuals, to reconcile the two parties, but the landgrave, Philip of Hesse, influenced by political motives, proposed a religious conference to be held at Marburg between Luther and Zwingli. The discussion, accordingly, took place, and while both parties, as is usual in such cases, claimed the victory, articles were drawn up and published, in which the Swiss conformed generally to the Lutheran views, excepting on the subject of the sacrament.

The man who, more than any other, had influenced the mind of Zwingli, was Erasmus, who had done enough in the cause of the Reformation to irritate and offend the partizans of Rome, but was too timid to appreciate the warm and impassioned zeal of Luther. These two men, each distinguished in his own sphere, were, nevertheless, widely different from each other. D'Aubigné justly says, "Erasmus and Luther are the representatives of two great ideas relative to a Reformation,—of two great parties in their age and in all ages. The one class are men of a timid prudence; the other those of active courage and resolution. These two great bodies of men existed at this period, and they were personified in these two illustrious heads. The former thought that the cultivation of theological science would lead gradually and without violence to the Reformation of the Church. The more active class thought that the spread of more correct ideas among the learned would not put an end to the gross superstitions of the people, and that to reform such or such an abuse was of little importance, so long as the life of the Church was not thoroughly renovated." The same eloquent writer well depicts the character of Erasmus: "Erasmus was deficient in courage. But courage is as necessary to effect a reformation as to capture a city. There was much timidity in his character. From his youth he trembled at the mention of death. He took the most extraordinary care of his health. He would avoid, at any sacrifice, a place where contagion prevailed. His relish for the comforts of life surpassed even his vanity, and this was his reason for declining more than one brilliant offer. Thus it was that he did not pretend to the part of a Reformer. 'If the corrupted morals of the court of Rome require a great and speedy remedy,' said he, 'it is not for me, or such as me, to effect it.' He had none of that strength of faith which animated Luther. Whilst the latter was ever ready to lay down his life for the truth, Erasmus, with great ingenuousness, could say, 'Let others affect martyrdom; for my part, I think myself unworthy of that honour. I fear, if a tumult arose, I should be like Peter in his fall.'

"Erasmus, by his writings and his discourses, had, more than any other person, hastened the Reformation; and yet he trembled when he saw the tempest he had raised approaching. He would have given every thing to restore the former calm, even with its heavy vapours. But it was too late,—the dam was broken down. It was no longer possible to stay the violence of the torrent that was at once to cleanse and fertilise the world. Erasmus was powerful, so long as he was an instrument in God's hands. When he ceased to be that, he was nothing." No wonder that Luther wrote concerning him: "I fear he follows Christ with a divided heart, and is ignorant of the grace of God. Carnal feelings are stronger in him than spiritual influences. Though reluctant to judge him, I still feel it my duty to warn you, not to read and receive all without due discrimination. For these are dangerous times; and I clearly see that a man is not necessarily a good Christian, because he is a good Greek or Hebrew scholar. But I anxiously keep this opinion secret, lest I should encourage his enemies. The Lord may, peradventure, reveal himself to him in his own time." Erasmus continued to halt between two opinions, to the great annoyance of Luther, and at length showed himself the enemy of the Reformation, although at an earlier period of his life he had powerfully contributed to its triumph.

Luther had quitted the monastery, and laid aside the monk's cowl towards the end of the year 1524, and in June of the following year, he married Catherine de Bora, one of the nuns, to whom we have already referred, as having with his assistance escaped from the convent of Nimptschen. As a husband and a father Luther was most exemplary, and in his domestic relations he was blessed with much happiness.

The far-famed Diet of Augsburg was held in 1530, and although it was not deemed safe or expedient that the Reformer should be present in person, his protector, the elector of Saxony, having been specially urged by the emperor to attend, proceeded thither with a numerous retinue. The emperor entered the city on the evening of the 15th June, being the day preceding the festival of Corpus Christi. The Protestants received an imperial command to join the religious procession on the following day, but they firmly refused to comply. The Diet was opened on the 20th with the saying of mass, in which the evangelical princes would take no share. At the commencement of the business, four electors and forty princes were present. The Romish party declined making any declaration of their faith, and avowed their intention to abide by the edict of Worms. The Protestants were ordered by the emperor to produce the articles of their creed against a certain day. These had been drawn up by Melancthon, and submitted to the examination of Luther, who had declared his unqualified approbation of them as a faithful exhibition of Protestant doctrine. On the appointed day this Confession of Faith was read, and produced a very favourable impression, and after some discussion, it was agreed to submit the Confession, in the first instance, to the examination of the Romish divines, and to await their answer. In the course of a few days they handed in a refutation of the Protestant Confession, but it was couched in language so bitter and reproachful, that the emperor refused to accept it, and ordered it to be drawn up anew. The second document penned by the Romish divines was produced and read in less than a month after the rejection of the first; and the emperor expressed himself so pleased with this revised refutation, that he insisted that the elector and his adherents should immediately and unceremoniously adopt and abide by it. This request, however, though accompanied with threats, had no effect in subduing the firmness of the Protestant party. Melancthon immediately commenced a detailed refutation of the Reply which had been made to the Protestant Confession, and this able Apology for the AUGSBURG CONFESSION (which see), is inserted among the symbolical books of the Lutheran Church.

Various attempts were made by the emperor to bring about an adjustment of the differences between the two parties, but these attempts were wholly unsuccessful, and the Protestants demanded a general council. The Diet had sat for six months, and the emperor was impatient to bring its proceedings to a close. He inveighed against, and even threatened the elector of Saxony, but the good man was inflexible, and left Augsburg indignant at the conduct of his imperial majesty. The Diet still continued its sittings, after several of the Protestant members had left, and at length, on the 19th of November, published a resolution, which in plain terms condemned the doctrines and regulations of the Protestants; commanded whatever had been altered to be restored to its former state; and further determined that the emperor and the estates should risk their lives and influence in protection of the ancient constitution of the church, and summon the refractory before the supreme court of judicature. At the same time a promise was given that a council should be summoned within six months. Throughout the important proceedings of the Diet of Augsburg, Luther was residing at Cobourg, watching the course of events, and carrying on an active correspondence with the elector of Saxony, Melancthon, and others, who were present at the Diet as guardians of the Protestant interest. In his letters to Melancthon, he evinces the warmest regard for the man, but declares his decided disapproval of the attempts at compromise with the Romanists, perceiving, as he did, that the opposition both in principle and spirit between the two parties was too great to expect anything like a solid reconciliation. We learn from Pizer that "Luther had drawn up during the Diet, a regular statement respecting the disputed points; marking out how far concession could, or ought to be carried: declaring first, that if the opposite party persisted, as hitherto, in refusing all compliance, there was no possibility of treating with them at all; but, as the emperor had desired to know in how far the Protestants could concede, he would go through the individual points:—First, as regarded their doctrine, which their opponents had in no ways been able to invalidate, they could yield nothing; but were ready to afford explanation of individual expressions respecting faith as the sole ground of justification, and respecting satisfaction, and merit. In the Article respecting abuses, the sentiment that the withholding the cup from the laity might be regarded as indifferent, could not be agreed to; neither could they at all consent, that marriage should be prohibited to any order of society: and equally inadmissible was the re-establishment of private masses, and the canon law. With regard to the monasteries, it might be conceded, that the present inmates should continue to enjoy the benefit they afford, but without adhering to the celebration of the mass, or other rules of their order; and alluding to the jurisdiction of the bishops, he declared thus: 'Assuredly, if they will suffer our doctrine, and cease to persecute it, we will in no ways interfere with their jurisdiction or dignity, or what you may please to term it; for we, assuredly, do not desire to be either bishops or cardinals, but only good Christians, who are, and should be poor.'"

Though absent from the Augsburg Diet, Luther, by his letters to the chief members, was the controlling spirit of the Protestant party in that celebrated assembly. With the half measures of Melancthon he was much dissatisfied, and only on one point did he agree with his concessions—the continuation of the papal power as a human establishment. On this point alone did the stern German Reformer appear ready to enter into a compromise. In all other matters the beneficial influence of his masculine mind was seen in the determined perseverance which the elector and the other Protestants manifested pending the negotiation, as well as in afterwards opposing the demands and threats of the emperor.

A political arrangement was about this time entered into by Charles V. which it was feared would prove seriously detrimental to the interests of Protestantism. This was the nomination of his brother Ferdinand to be chosen as his successor; and that prince, who had been previously invested with the government of the German hereditary states and duchy of Wirtemberg, being well known to be decidedly hostile to the new opinions, his proposed exaltation to the imperial throne was viewed by the Protestant princes and people with the utmost anxiety and alarm. Steps were immediately taken to effect a closer union among themselves, and for this purpose a treaty of defensive alliance was entered into at Smalcald on the 29th March 1531, the provisions of the treaty having been drawn up by Luther. (See ARTICLES OF SMALCALD.) When the treaty was subscribed by the Protestants, Melancthon still maintained his former sentiments, which were now renounced by Luther, as to the lawfulness of a Pope, provided he rested his claims solely on expediency and the consent of the church. An article embodying the opinions of Melancthon on this point was appended to the Articles.

The league of Smalcald, though at first limited to Protestant electors, princes, and states, was afterwards extended so as to include those who, whatever might be their religious sentiments, were opposed to the Emperor, and protested against the election of Ferdinand. In this view it was joined by the dukes of Bavaria, and also by the kings of France and England. By this accession to their political strength, the Protestants were enabled to occupy a high vantage ground in their negotiations with the Emperor for peace. These negotiations led at length to the treaty of Nuremberg, which was finally ratified at the Diet of Ratisbon in 1532. The conditions were, that none should commence hostilities on account of their belief, or any other cause; but in case of violence being offered, they should render mutual assistance, and all should conduct themselves with true Christian love till the next council should meet. A difficulty, however, arose as to the interpretation of the conditions, whether they applied to all who should hereafter subscribe the Augsburg Confession, or must be limited to such as now professed its tenets. The Protestant deputies at first insisted on the extended interpretation; but the Elector, persuaded by Luther, insisted on the limited view of the treaty, while, contrary to the advice of Luther, he persevered in his opposition to the election of Ferdinand.

None of the deputies at first approved of the conditions of peace, and more especially the Landgrave of Hesse insisted on those being included who might subsequently express a wish to join their league. He wrote a letter to the Elector censuring him in strong language for separating from the rest of the Protestant party. In the meantime the good Elector died, and his successor John Frederic, surnamed the Generous, replied to the letter of the Landgrave with considerable rudeness, and proposed to settle their disputes by arbitration. The arbiters advised a mutual reconciliation, and as all the other Protestants were of the same opinion, the Landgrave had no other alternative but to accept the terms of peace.

Pope Clement VII. died in 1534, but his successor Paul III. continued the negotiations about the long-expected council. With this view he dispatched his own ambassador, Paul Vergerius, to hold an interview with Luther. The interview took place, and a council was proposed to be held under the authority of the Pope at Mantua. The Elector, however, and the Smalcald confederates refused to assent to the proposed council, and resolved to raise a formidable army. But the Pope summoned the council to meet at Mantua in May 1537; and one object of its being assembled was stated to be, the entire rooting up of the poisonous and pestilential Lutheran heresy. After such a declaration, the Protestants could expect no justice in such a council, and they, therefore, refused to countenance or attend it. During this time, Luther drew up the Articles of Smalcald, which were afterwards received among the symbolical writings of the Lutherans. The Protestant confederacy was every day receiving fresh accessions to its members, and the Romanists in 1538 formed a defensive league, called the holy league for the preservation of the holy religion. This movement on the part of their opponents led the Protestants to renew the league of Smalcald till the year 1547.

The policy of the Emperor in regard to the Protestants seemed to have now assumed a peaceful tendency, and with the view of bringing about, if possible, a common understanding on religious matters, he proposed a conference to be held at Spires in June 1540. It took place however at Hagenau, Spires being at that time visited with the plague; but neither the chiefs of the Protestant confederacy, nor the master spirits of the Reformation were present, Melancthon being ill, and Luther having no inclination to enter into negotiations of peace with Rome. The meeting was fruitless, and the discussion was adjourned for some months. It was renewed in January 1541, but after a controversy for four days on Original Sin, an order arrived from the Emperor to terminate the proceedings, and defer any further steps till the Diet of Ratisbon, which was near at hand. At this Diet rapid approaches were made towards a settlement, and in thirteen days four Articles had been agreed upon, but at this stage the conference was abandoned.

A deputation, with the knowledge and concurrence of the Emperor, now waited upon Luther, and urged upon him the necessity of his being satisfied with the adoption of the doctrine of justification by faith on the part of the Diet of Ratisbon, at the same time assuring him of their earnest hope that the other abuses would of themselves disappear when this fundamental article was once established. To this representation, Luther replied, that while he was gratified to learn that the four articles had been finally settled, he firmly believed that unless the Emperor could bring their opponents to a serious and honest arrangement on all the other points included in the Augsburg Confession, the whole attempt at a reconciliation between the Protestants and Romanists would be in vain. This determination to adhere strictly to the Confession, was declared by the Elector of Saxony to the other princes of the Diet, and he declined at the same time to sanction the Four Articles. Thus the whole fruit of the negotiations was destroyed.

At the next Diet at Spires in 1542, the Protestants took a more decided position. The Elector of Saxony charged his ambassador to enter into no negotiations for a settlement in religion, and to consent to no council summoned by the Pope, nor show him any mark of honour. Trent was proposed as the place of meeting, and meanwhile peace was guaranteed for five years. The Romish party accepted the proposal of the Pope to hold a council at Trent, but the Protestants handed in a written protest against it. The Emperor held a new Diet at Ratisbon in regard to the affairs of the church, but after an angry discussion it was broken off without any result. The council met at Trent in 1545, without the slightest countenance from the Protestants, and drew up a lengthened series of canons and decrees, which, along with the creed of Pope Pius IV. founded on them, forms a very important part of the symbolical books of the Church of Rome.

The days of the Great Reformer were now near a close. On the 23d January 1546, he left Wittenberg for Eisenach, to use his influence in procuring an amicable arrangement between the dukes of Mansfeld, who had quarrelled about some property. He had only been about three weeks in this place, where he had been born and baptized, when, after a very brief illness, he was summoned to his eternal reward on the 18th February 1546. At the special request of the Elector of Saxony, the body of Luther was removed to Wittenberg, and buried in the castle chapel; and the Elector took under his care the widow and family.

Thus terminated the useful career of one of the greatest and noblest heroes this world has ever seen, one who manfully defended the rights of conscience, asserted the grand principles of civil and religious liberty, contended earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints, and one of whom it may well be said, many generations have arisen, and are yet destined to arise, who shall call him blessed.

LUTHERAN CHURCHES. After the death of Luther, a religious war broke out in Germany. The Emperor Charles V. saw that all his attempts to produce a reconciliation of the Protestants and Romanists were utterly fruitless, and that the associates of the Smalcald League persevered in refusing to acknowledge the council of Trent; he resolved, therefore, as a last resource, to have recourse to arms. In a short time he was so successful that he issued an imperial edict, which is generally known by the name of the Augsburg Interim, granting certain seeming concessions to the Protestants until a council should be called for a settlement of the controversy. This edict led to the preparation of an Interim, which though it proved satisfactory to neither party, was drawn up chiefly by Philip Melancthon, who succeeded Luther as the head and leader of the Lutheran party. It was designed to point out the Adiaphora or things indifferent, which might be admitted to please the Emperor, and at his command. As soon as this document was promulgated, Maurice, Elector of Saxony, appointed a conference of the divines of Wittenberg and Leipsic in the latter city, with Melancthon at their head, in order to ascertain how far in their opinion the Interim ought to be enforced. After long deliberation, they came to the conclusion, that in things indifferent obedience ought to be rendered to the imperial edict. This ambiguous conclusion was arrived at chiefly through the influence of Melancthon. Hence arose the Adiaphoristic controversy, which raged in Germany for many years; and which gave rise to other and perhaps more important controversies. Among the chief of these was a contest, which lasted for some time, respecting the necessity of good works to salvation. Major, a divine of Wittenberg, adopting the views of Melancthon, maintained the affirmative, while Nicholas Amsdorf, defending the old Lutheran theology, maintained the negative. The discussion was carried on until 1579, when it was terminated by the publication of the Book of Torgau or Form of Concord.

Another controversy which arose out of the differences in opinion between Melancthon and Luther, is commonly known by the name of the Synergistic controversy, which discusses the question whether or not man co-operates with God in the work of conversion. The leading parties in this dispute were Victorin Strigel on the one side, and Matthias Flacius on the other. The latter, who was appointed Professor of Theology at Jena in 1557, was a stern and uncompromising defender of the opinions of Luther, more especially on those points in which he was opposed to Melancthon and his followers, the Philippists, as they were called. But in the excess of his zeal, Flacius argued so intemperately against Strigel in the Synergistic controversy, that he broached the strange opinion bordering on Manicheism, that original sin is of the very substance of a man. This notion was keenly opposed by the great majority of the divines of the Lutheran church, while it was espoused and ably defended by a few.

Another class of controversies which agitated the Lutheran church, soon after the death of its illustrious founder, rose out of the heretical views propagated by Andrew Osiander. This man held the singular notion that the second Person of the Trinity was that image of God after which man was fashioned; that the Son of God would have become incarnate even although man had not sinned; and that repentance consisted in abhorrence of sin and forsaking it, without faith in the gospel. He confounded justification and sanctification, alleging the former to be not a forensic act on the part of God, acquitting the believer from a charge of sin and liability to punishment, but a gracious Divine operation in the soul, which conferred personal holiness. Justification in the eye of law, through the imputed righteousness of Christ, he denominated redemption, and this he supposed always preceded what he called justification. The mode of justification was in his view by the indwelling of Christ in the soul, producing there a moral change. These confused sentiments held by Osiander were strenuously opposed by Melancthon and the principal divines of the Lutheran church; and after his death, which happened in 1552, the controversy came to an end.

One of the keenest opponents of Osiander was Francis Stancar, professor of Hebrew at Königsberg, who, in arguing against the doctrines held by his colleague, fell into equally flagrant errors of an opposite kind. He maintained that the divine nature of Christ took no part in the work of man's redemption, and that it was his human nature alone which made the atonement. So violently were the opinions of Stancar controverted by the Lutheran theologians, that he deemed it prudent to leave Germany and retire to Poland, where he died in 1574.

It was chiefly during the life of Melancthon that these different disputes agitated the Lutheran church. On the death, however, of this timid and somewhat undecided Reformer, a prospect was opened up of an end being put to these unseemly contests. A conference was held accordingly at Altenburg in 1568, but unhappily it was attended with no good results. Another mode was now adopted, and with better success, for healing the divisions of the Lutheran church, namely, the preparation of a book in which all the various controversies which had arisen since the death of Luther should be fully and satisfactorily handled. This task was committed to Andreas, a Professor at Tubingen, who produced in 1579 the Book of Torgau or Form of Concord. (See CONCORD, FORM OF.) Through the influence of the Elector of Saxony, this new Confession was adopted by the churches in all parts of his territories, and the example was followed gradually in other districts of Germany. Several Lutheran churches, however, refused to acknowledge this document, and Frederic II. of Denmark, on receiving a copy of it, flung it unceremoniously into the fire. Never did a formula, which was designed to heal dissensions, tend more effectually to foment them; and accordingly, it has never been universally adopted by the Lutheran churches, though some regard it as one of the standards of their faith. This Formula put an end to all prospect of union between the Lutheran and Reformed churches, who only differed from each other at that time on the presence of Christ in the Lord's Supper, and on the Person of Christ. In regard to the first point, the Lutheran church maintained firmly the opinions of Luther, who rejected the Romish dogma of Transubstantiation, but held the almost equally unintelligible dogma of Consubstantiation. The doctrine relating to the Person of Christ, however, was not viewed in the same way by all the Lutheran divines. Luther never maintained that the man Christ Jesus was always and everywhere present, but merely that he could be present whenever the execution of his mediatorial office and the fulfilment of his promise required, and of course at the celebration of the Lord's Supper. In this view he was followed by the divines of Upper and Lower Saxony. But the theologians of Swabia and Alsace maintained the absolute omnipresence of Christ's human nature; and this view of the subject was embodied in the Form of Concord, though not to the entire exclusion of that held by Luther. Thus the points of controversy between the Lutheran and Reformed churches were increased, and their hostility to each other was rendered more bitter by the publication of the very document which professed to promote their union.

The prosperity of the Lutheran church in Germany was not a little affected by the secession, first of Maurice, landgrave of Hesse, and then, of John Sigismund, elector of Brandenburg, both of whom went over to the Reformed communion. The contentions of the two churches excited an earnest desire in the minds of many excellent men on both sides, to look about for some means of bringing about a union. The first public attempt to accomplish this most desirable object was that of James I., king of England, who for this purpose made use of Peter du Moulin, a distinguished divine of the French Reformed Church. The next was the decree of the synod of Charenton A. D. 1631. In the same year certain Saxon theologians held a conference at Leipsic with certain Hessian and Brandenburg divines. The discussion included all the articles of the Augsburg Confession, to which the Reformed were ready to subscribe, and they even drew up a formula of union, but such was the feeling of jealousy which arose in the minds of both parties, that the disputants separated without accomplishing anything. And another conference having the same object in view, was held at Thorn in 1645, under the auspices of Uladislaus IV., king of Poland, which was likewise unsuccessful, more especially as it sought to comprehend in the proposed union, not only the Lutheran and Reformed churches, but the Romish church also. With more success a conference was held at Cassel in 1661, but though a friendly spirit was manifested by the disputants themselves, it failed to extend itself to the two rival Protestant churches. Various individuals on both sides made strenuous and persevering efforts to bring about a reconciliation, but in vain. The polemical spirit, and dogmatic exclusiveness of the seventeenth century, defeated all attempts to realize the unity of evangelical Protestantism. In the eighteenth century, particularly the latter part of it, the controversy between the Lutherans and the Reformed was completely lost sight of in the flood of indifferentism and infidelity which overran the whole Continent of Europe. The efforts which have been made towards a union during the first half of the nineteenth century have been already noticed in the article GERMAN UNITED EVANGELICAL CHURCH.

Lutheranism is the prevailing form of the Protestant faith in Saxony, Prussia, Wirtemberg, Hanover, and great part of Northern Germany, as well as in Denmark, Sweden, and Norway. There are also Lutheran churches in Holland, Russia, Poland, Hungary, and the United States of America, but of all the Protestant universities in Germany and Switzerland, very few are Lutheran. The symbolical books of the Lutheran church are the Augsburg Confession, with Melancthon's Apology, the articles of Smalcald and the Larger and Smaller Catechisms. These standards, however, are regarded as strictly subordinate to the Holy Scriptures, which are declared by Lutherans to be the only rule of faith and practice. The only point of importance in which they differ from the Reformed is the real presence of Christ in the eucharist.

The constitution of the Lutheran church is simple, and approaches very nearly to Presbyterianism, there being no hierarchy, and bishops not being recognized, except in Denmark and Sweden, as an order in the church. The archbishop of Upsal, who's primate of Sweden, is the only Lutheran archbishop. Lutherans acknowledge the head of the state as the supreme visible ruler of the church. The supreme direction of ecclesiastical affairs is vested in councils or boards generally appointed by the sovereign, and termed consistories, consisting of both clergymen and laymen. The Lutheran established churches are usually interwoven with the state, and entirely dependent on it, and are almost destitute of discipline, while in some places, as in Sweden, they altogether exclude dissent. "The congregations," says Dr. Schaaf, "remained almost as passive as in the Roman church. They have in Europe not even the right of electing their pastor. They are exclusively ruled by their ministers, as these are ruled by their provincial consistories, always presided over by a layman, the provincial consistories by a central consistory, or oberkirchenrath, and this again by the minister of worship and public instruction, who is the immediate executive organ of the ecclesiastical supremacy of the crown."

Various liturgies are in use among the Lutheran churches, each state generally having one of its own. Festivals or saints' days are seldom much attended to. The festivals which commemorate the nativity, death, resurrection, and ascension of our Lord, and the day of Pentecost, are deemed sacred in the Lutheran churches. In regard to rites and ceremonies, the Lutherans, in opposition to the Reformed, hold the lawfulness, if not the usefulness, of images in churches, the distinguishing vestments of the clergy, the private confession of sins, the use of wafers in the administration of the Lord's Supper, the form of exorcism in the celebration of baptism, and other ceremonies of the same kind. They have removed, however, the sacrifice of the mass, and the idolatrous invocation of saints, while they have popularized the services of public worship, by celebrating them in the vernacular language, and giving to the sermon a central and conspicuous place.

The modern Lutherans have widely departed in theological doctrine from their great founder; and instead of insisting, as he did, on justification by faith alone, as the grand article of a standing or a falling church, they have degenerated, in too many cases, into a cold Arminianism. It was not long, indeed, after the death of Luther, before his simple theology gave place to a system of obscure metaphysical theories. Among these may be mentioned the doctrines of the SYNCRETISTS or CALIXTINS (which see). In opposition to these mystical philosophical divines arose the school of the Pietists, headed by Spener, which, amid much extravagance it may be, were, nevertheless, instrumental in reviving vital religion in Germany towards the end of the seventeenth and beginning of the eighteenth centuries. The Lutherans have since that time had to struggle with infidelity, rationalism, and utter indifference to all religion. The present state of practical piety among the German Lutherans is thus noticed by Dr. Schaaf: "Lutheran piety has its peculiar charm, the charm of Mary, who 'sat at Jesus' feet and heard his word.' If it is deficient in outward activity and practical zeal, and may learn much in this respect from the Reformed communion, it makes up for it by a rich inward life. It excels in honesty, kindness, affection, cheerfulness, and that Gemüthlichkeit, for which other nations have not even a name. The Lutheran church meditated over the deepest mysteries of divine grace, and brought to light many treasures of knowledge from the mines of revelation. She can point to an unbroken succession of learned divines, who devoted their whole life to the investigation of saving truth. She numbers her mystics who bathed in the ocean of infinite love. She has sung the most fervent hymns to the Saviour, and holds sweet, child-like intercourse with the heavenly Father."

Lutheranism prevails in great strength in Sweden and Denmark. In the latter country almost the whole population, amounting to 2,000,000, with the exception of less than 20,000 Dissenters, is Lutheran. The people of Sweden, numbering more than 3,000,000, are, with a few exceptions, also Lutheran. In France there are about 250 Lutheran congregations. In the Protestant states of Germany, Lutheranism prevails, though, through the exertions of the present king of Prussia, a union has been effected between the Lutheran and Reformed churches, under the name of the United Evangelical Church.

LUTHERANS (OLD), a sect of Dissenters from the Evangelical Church of Prussia, which took its rise in opposition to the union of the Lutheran and Reformed churches in 1817. They adhere to all the tenets of the Lutheran symbolical books with the most scrupulous tenacity, and they look upon the Reformed churches as essentially heretical and rationalistic, while they have a still more intense hatred at the United Evangelical Church. The members of this sect are found in greatest numbers in Silesia, Saxony, and Pomerania. They were at first fined, imprisoned, and persecuted in various ways under Frederick William III. Several of their leading ministers emigrated with their people to the United States. All persecution against these seceders ceased on the accession of the present king of Prussia; and by a decree of 23d July 1845, they were formally recognized as a dissenting sect, with full liberty of worship. Their number amounts to from 20,000 to 30,000 souls. Their largest congregations are in Breslau and in Berlin. The Old Lutherans in America, like those in Germany, hold strictly by the whole Lutheran symbolical books but more especially the Form of Concord, to which they attach peculiar value. They are divided into two parties, the synod of Missouri and the synod of Buffalo, which are bitterly opposed to each other in their views of the clerical office; the one holding the common Protestant view, which makes the clerical office only the organ of the general priesthood; the other holding the Romanising doctrine of a separate clerical office, resting on ordination, and specifically different from the general priesthood of the baptized. The Pennsylvania synod of the Old Lutherans stands by the Angsburg Confession, and the smaller Catechism of Luther. Within the territory of the Pennsylvania synod there are an East Pennsylvania and a West Pennsylvania synod divided on the subject of new measures. The Old Lutherans in America have a liturgical altar-service, even with crucifixes and candles burning in the daytime. In all such matters they cleave to historical tradition.

LYÆUS, a surname of Bacchus, the god of wine. This was also a surname of Zeus.

LYCEA, a festival among the Arcadians, celebrated in honour of Zeus Lyceus. It is said to have been instituted by Lycaon, the son of Pelagus, who sacrificed a child on the occasion, and sprinkled the altar with its blood. It is not unlikely that human sacrifices were offered by the Arcadians to Zeus Lyceus down to a late period. Plutarch says, that the Lyceæ were celebrated in somewhat the same manner as the Roman Lupercalia.

LYCEGENES, a surname of Apollo, probably from his being born in Lycia.

LYCEIA, a surname of Artemis.

LYCEIUS, a surname of Apollo, supposed to be derived from Gr. lukos, a wolf, because his mother Latona came to Delos in the form of a she-wolf, and was conducted by wolves to the river Xanthus.

LYCOATIS, a surname of Artemis, on account of her having been worshipped at Lycoa in Arcadia.

LYCOREUS, a surname of Apollo, because he was worshipped at Lycoreia, on Mount Parnassus.

LYSIUS, a surname of Dionysus, under which he was worshipped at Corinth, and also at Sicyon.

LYSIZONA, a surname under which the people of Athens worshipped Artemis and Eileithyia.

LYTERIUS, a surname of Pan, under which he was worshipped at Troezen, because he had revealed the best mode of curing the plague.

MA, a name applied to Rhea by the Lydians, who sacrificed bulls to her as the fruitful mother of all.

MACARIANS, the followers of two contemporary monks of the fourth century, who exercised a great influence on the monastic life of the period, and were held in high veneration. The one was called Macarius the Egyptian, and the other Macarius of Alexandria. Both dwelt in the Libyan desert, and were remarkable for the extent of their asceticism, in which, of course, they regarded Christian perfection as consisting. The Egyptian, who is sometimes termed the Great or the Elder Macarius, lived to a very advanced age, and he has been canonized both by the Greek and Latin churches, the former holding his festival on the 19th, the latter on the 15th January. The Alexandrian Macarius is said to have surpassed the other in austere practices. The Macarians were remarkable for the rigidity and strictness of their monastic habits.

MACARIANS, the followers of Macarius, who was patriarch of Antioch in the seventh century, and who held the opinions of the MONOTHELITES (which see). He attended the sixth general council held at Constantinople A. D. 680, where he boldly avowed his peculiar opinions, asserting that Christ's will was that of a God-man; and persevering in the maintenance of this heretical sentiment, he was deposed and banished. He published an Ecthesis, or Confession of Faith, adherence to which was maintained by his followers as a test of orthodoxy.

MACCABEES. See ASMONEANS.

MACCABEES (FEAST OF), a festival celebrated annually in the ancient Christian church, in honour of the seven Maccabees, who signalized themselves by their opposition to the tyrant Antiochus Epiphanes, and who died in defence of the Jewish Law. This feast is mentioned particularly in the fourth century. Chrysostom has three homilies prepared for the occasion, in which he speaks of the festival of the Maccabees being celebrated at Antioch. Augustin says that the Christians had a church in that city called by the name of the Maccabees, and he himself has two sermons upon their festival, in which he shows they were regarded as Christian martyrs. This feast appears to have been observed in the African churches, for Augustin begins his first homily with these words: "This day is made a festival to us by the glory of the Maccabees." Gregory Nazianzen has a sermon upon the same occasion; and others are found in the writings of different authors, from which it appears evident that the festival in question was celebrated throughout the whole church. The reason of its observance is given by Gregory Nazianzen, who alleges that the Maccabees were really admirable in their actions; yea, more admirable in one respect than the martyrs that came after Christ. "For," says he, "if they suffered martyrdom so bravely before Christ's coming, what would they not have done had they lived after him, and had the death of Christ for their example." It is not certain on what day the festival was held, but the Roman martyrology places it on the 1st of August.

MACEDONIANS, a heretical sect which arose in the fourth century, deriving its origin from Macedonius, patriarch of Constantinople. During the Arian controversy, a vacancy in the patriarchate of Constantinople usually gave rise to bitter contention between the Orthodox and the Arian parties. It was amid the tumult of a disputed election that the Arians chose Macedonius to the office of patriarch of Constantinople, A. D. 342. He retained quiet possession of this see till A. D. 348, when Constantius prevailed upon Constantius to deprive him of his ecclesiastical dignity. In the course of two years, however, he was restored to his office, and commenced a vigorous persecution of his opponents, banishing or torturing them, sometimes even to death. Accordingly, when the orthodox obtained the ascendancy, these individuals who had been persecuted by the Arians were looked upon as martyrs, and their memory is still revered both by the Greek and Latin churches; by the Greeks on the 30th of March, and by the Latins on the 25th of October. The harshness and severity with which Macedonius treated the opposite party, brought him into no slight odium with men of both parties, and this feeling of hostility which his cruel conduct had awakened, was much increased by an event which occurred about the same time. He had removed the body of Constantine the Great from the Church of the Apostles in which it had been buried, and such was the superstition of the people, that a serious tumult arose, in which many persons were killed. Constantius was deeply offended with the conduct of Macedonius in this matter. At the council of Seleucia A. D. 359, a split took place between the Acacian or pure Arian, and the semi-Arian parties, and it was fully expected that some accusations would have been publicly lodged against Macedonius. No steps, however, were taken against him on that occasion, but in the course of the following year a council was held at Constantinople, he was deposed by the Acacians, and from that time he united himself with the Semi-Arians.

The term Macedonians was at first used to denote the Semi-Arians, who held that the Son was homoiouios, or of like substance with the Father. Their opinions on this mysterious subject gradually underwent a change, and at length many of the party approached nearer to the Nicene creed, in regard to the nature and dignity of the Son, until, in A. D. 367, several of their bishops drew up a confession in which they admitted that the Son was homoousios, of the same substance with the Father. The opinions, however, of the Macedonians on the Holy Spirit were decidedly heterodox. They denied the divinity of the Holy Spirit, on account of which they received from the Greeks the title of Pneumatomachi, Contenders against the Holy Spirit. This heresy was formally condemned by the second general or first Constantinopolitan council, which met A. D. 381. The heresy of the Macedonians assumed a variety of different shades. Some affirmed that the Holy Spirit was not a person in the Godhead, that he was not what the Father and the Son are, and therefore no divine honours were due to him. Some held the Holy Spirit to be a creature, and therefore did not deny his personality. Others denied his personality, and regarded him as a mere attribute of God. In condemning the Macedonian heresy, the council of Constantinople found it necessary to make an addition to the article in the Nicene Creed, which says, "I believe in the Holy Ghost," expanding it thus, "I believe in the Holy Ghost, the Lord, the Author of life, who proceeds from the Father." The Nicene Creed thus modified, which is commonly known by the name of the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed, was received by the Catholic church; and the council of Ephesus afterwards decreed that no addition should be made to it.

The members of the Macedonian sect were generally upright and honourable in their lives, and, by the favour which they showed for the monastic life, they acquired a high distinction for piety. After their separation from the Arians, they attempted to effect a union with the orthodox party, but this being found impracticable, they spread themselves throughout various parts, especially in Thrace, along the Hellespont, and in Phrygia. None of them were found in the western provinces. At Constantinople they had their own churches and bishops. But when their opinions were formally condemned by the church, they were visited also with civil penalties. In the statutes of the elder Theodosius they are mentioned by name, and in those of the younger Theodosius their worship is only tolerated in the principal cities. The persecution to which they were thus exposed soon succeeded in exterminating the sect.

MACHAZOR (Heb. a cycle), a collection of prayers used among the Jews in their great solemnities. The prayers are in verse, and very concise. There are many copies of this Book printed in Italy, Germany, and Poland.

MACTATIO (Lat. macto, to kill), the act of killing the victim in Roman sacrifices. This in most cases was done not by the priests, but by an officer called papa, who struck the animal with a hammer before the knife was used. See SACRIFICE.

MADAGASCAR (RELIGION OF). Madagascar, one of the largest islands of the world, is situated in the Indian Ocean, on the eastern coast of Africa, from which it is separated by the Mozambique Channel. Comparatively little was known until within the last twenty years about this island. The Malagasy, as the native inhabitants are called, seem to consist of different tribes under independent chieftains; but both in language and in general manners there is an obvious resemblance among those tribes, which indicates that they are to a certain extent related to one another. Circumcision, for example, is universally prevalent in the island, though the ceremonies attending it vary considerably in different localities. Divination is practised too among all the tribes though under different forms. The religion of this singular people consists in a great measure of the use of charms or ody, as they call them, by which they believe that the will of some superior power is ascertained. It is thus that the art of the diviner is exercised on all occasions. To begin with their treatment of children, on this subject Mr. Ellis, in his 'History of Madagascar,' relates the following curious facts, chiefly in regard to the welcome of the little stranger: "After the birth of an infant, the relatives and friends of the mother visit her, and offer their congratulations. The infant also receives salutations, in form resembling the following: 'Saluted be the offspring given of God!—may the child live long!—may the child be favoured so as to possess wealth!' Presents are also made to the attendants in the household, and sometimes a bullock is killed on the occasion, and distributed among the members of the family. Presents of poultry, fuel, money, &c., are at times also sent by friends to the mother. A piece of meat is usually cut into thin slices, and suspended at some distance from the floor, by a cord attached to the ceiling or roof of the house. This is called the Kitoza, and is intended for the mother. A fire is kept in the room, day and night, frequently for a week after the birth of the child. At the expiration of that period, the infant, arrayed in the best clothing that can be obtained, is carried out of the house by some person whose parents are both still living, and then taken back to the mother. In being carried out and in, the child must be twice carefully lifted over the fire, which is placed near the door. Should the infant be a boy, the axe, large knife, and spear, generally used in the family, must be taken out at the same time, with any implements of building that may be in the house: silver chains, of native manufacture, are also given as presents, or used in these ceremonies, for which no particular reason is assigned. The implements are perhaps used chiefly as emblems of the occupations in which it is expected the infant will engage when it arrives at maturer years; and the whole may be regarded as expressing the hopes cherished of his activity, wealth, and enjoyments."

One of the first acts of the father, or a near relation, is to report the birth of the child to the native astrologers, who pretend, by peculiar ceremonies, to ascertain its destiny; and should that be declared to be favourable, the child is reared with the utmost care and attention. When the child has reached its second or third month, on a lucky day, a ceremony takes place, which Mr. Ellis thus describes under the name of 'Scrambling:.' "The friends and relatives of the child assemble; a portion of the fat taken from the hump on the back of an ox is minced in a rice-pan, cooked, and mixed up with a quantity of rice, milk, honey, and a sort of grass called voampamoa; a lock of the infant's hair is also cast into the above mélange; and the whole being thoroughly well mixed in a rice-pan, which is held by the youngest female of the family, a general rush is made towards the pan, and a scramble for its contents takes place, especially by the women, as it is supposed that those who are fortunate enough to obtain a portion may confidently cherish the hope of becoming mothers. Bananas, lemons, and sugar-cane are also scrambled for, under the belief that a similar result may be anticipated. The ceremony of scrambling, however, only takes place with a first-born child. The head of the mother is decorated, during the ceremonial, with silver chains, while the father carries the infant, if a boy, and some ripe bananas, on his back. The rice-pan used on the occasion becomes, in their estimation, sacred by the service, and must not be taken out of the house during three subsequent days, otherwise the virtue of those observances is supposed to be lost."

Should the destiny of the child be declared by the sikidy, or astrologer, to be evil, the poor helpless babe is doomed to destruction. The practice of infanticide has been long prevalent in Madagascar; and although during the reign of Radama it was abolished, since the death of that king the inhuman custom has again revived.

The Malagasy believe in God, without however attaching any definite, intelligible meaning to the word. The terms by which they designate the Supreme Being are Andria-manitra and Zanahary, the former being generally regarded as the male god, and the latter the female. Whatever is great, whatever is new, useful, and extraordinary, is called god. Silk is regarded as god in the highest degree. Rice, money, thunder and lightning, their ancestors both when alive and dead, all are dignified with this exalted title. Some believe in a number of spirits, each of whom is intrusted with the care of a single individual, or an entire class of men. Equally vague and indistinct are their views of the soul of man and its future destiny. "They have no knowledge," says Mr. Ellis, "of the doctrine of the soul as a separate, immaterial, immortal principle in man, nor has their language any word to express such an idea. They speak of the saina, but mean by this the intellectual powers. They speak also of the fanahy, the nearest term found to express spirit; but it seems, in their use of it, to imply principally the moral qualities or dispositions. In almost the same breath, a Malagasy will express his belief that when he dies he ceases altogether to exist, dying like the brute, and being conscious no more, and yet confess the fact, that he is in the habit of praying to his ancestors! If asked, were his ancestors not human beings like himself, and did they not cease altogether to exist when they died—how then can it be consistent to pray to them when they have no longer any being? he will answer, True, but there is their matoatoa, their ghost; and this is supposed to be hovering about the tomb when the body is interred. And there is also the ambiroa, or apparition, supposed to announce death, to visit a person when about dying, and to intimate to him, and sometimes to others, his approaching dissolution, an idea by no means peculiar to Madagascar, as it corresponds with the popular superstition of most European countries, that the funeral, or apparition of a person still living, is permitted to be seen as a supernatural intimation of his approaching death."

The religion of Madagascar, in its heathen condition, has always been essentially idolatrous. In the neighbourhood of Tananarivo, there are twelve or fifteen idols which are held in great veneration by the people. Four of these are looked upon as public and national objects of worship; the others belong to particular clans or tribes. Mr. Ellis gives the following account of one of the most noted idols worshipped in the island, and renounced on the introduction of Christianity: "Amongst the idols thus renounced, was one which had belonged to several clans or families who resided about six miles from the capital; it was considered as the more immediate property of the head-man, or chief of the district, in whose family it had been kept for many generations; but most of the people in the neighbourhood were its votaries and united in providing the bullocks and sheep that were sacrificed to it, or the money given to its keepers. "The idol is a most unmeaning object, consisting of a number of small pieces of wood, ornaments of ivory, of silver, and brass, and beads, fastened together with silver wire, and decorated with a number of silver rings. The central piece of wood is circular, about seven inches high, and three quarters of an inch in diameter. This central piece is surrounded by six short pieces of wood, and six hollow silver ornaments, called crocodile's teeth, from their resemblance to the teeth of that animal. Three pieces of wood are placed on one side of the central piece of wood, and three on the side opposite, the intervening space being filled up by the three silver and brazen ornaments. These ornaments are hollow, and those of brass were occasionally anointed with what was regarded as sacred oil, or other unguents, which were much used in the consecration of charms and other emblems of native superstition. The silver ornaments were detached from the idol, filled with small pieces of consecrated wood, and worn upon the persons of the keepers when going to war, or passing through a fever district, as a means of preservation. Besides the pieces of wood in the crocodile's tooth, small pieces of a dark, close-grained wood cut nearly square, or oblong, and about half an inch long, were strung like beads on a cord, and attached to the idol, or worn on the person of those who carried the silver ornaments. The chief of the district, who had the custody of the idol, had two sons, officers in the army. To one of these, with another individual, he delegated the authority to sell these small pieces of consecrated wood, which were supposed to be pervaded with the power of the idol, and to preserve its possessors from peril or death, in seasons of war, or regions of pestilence. This was a source of great emolument, for such was the reputed virtue or potency of the charm, that a couple of bullocks, the same number of sheep, of goats, fowls, and dollars, besides articles of smaller value, were frequently given for one or two of the small pieces of wood attached to the idol."

Every household has its charm or fetish, corresponding with the Teraphim of the Old Testament, or the Lares and Penates of the ancient heathens. Every individual, indeed, has his ody or charm, and sometimes one individual has many, and wears them about his person. Crocodile's teeth are frequently worn as charms. A few villages scattered up and down throughout the island are esteemed by the people Masina, or sacred, because there an idol is kept in some ordinary house, without any priesthood or worshippers. The man in whose house the idol is kept issues its pretended orders, and answers all questions which are put to it. It is acknowledged as a principle among the Malagasy that the idols are under the sovereign's special support. To the sovereign the keepers apply for new velvet in which to fold the idol, for bullocks to sacrifice to it, and for whatever is required for it. Snakes or serpents, which abound in the island, are supposed to be the special agents of the idols, and are, therefore, viewed with superstitious fear by the people. The sick apply to the idols for a cure, the healthy for charms and the knowledge of future events. To sanctify the idol, in order to prepare it for the prayers of the worshippers, its keeper secretly takes it from the case in which it is kept, and pours castor oil upon it. The public idols are usually small images wrapped in a red cloth, but most of the household gods are literally blocks, without any pretensions to a human shape. Instead of the people going to the idol to worship it, the idol is brought to the people. The idols are also carried about publicly at occasional, not fixed periods, in order to drive away diseases, to protect the people against storms and lightnings, and to give virtue to springs and fountains. They are also carried to the wars in order to inspire the soldiers with courage.

There are many occasions on which the idols are publicly exhibited, and on some of these the ceremony of sprinkling the people is followed, either to avert calamity, or to obtain some public blessing. "On one of these occasions," Mr. Ellis informs us, "the assembly consisted of at least six thousand people. They were ordered to squat on the ground in such a way as to admit those bearing the idol to pass to and fro throughout the assembly, and all were especially commanded to sit with their shoulders uncovered. The idol was then carried through the multitude in different directions, followed by a man bearing a horn of honey and water. As they proceeded, the man sprinkled the people on each side of him by shaking his wisp of straw towards them, after it had been dipped in the liquor. A blessing was at the same time pronounced by the bearer of the idol, in words, which, given by a native writer, may be thus translated :— Cheer up and fear not, for it is I who am the defence of your lives, and I will not let disease approach. Cheer up, therefore, on account of your children and wives, your property, and your own persons, for ye possess me.”

The utmost importance in all the affairs of life is attached by the Malagasy to the sikidy, or divination by means of beans, rice, straw, sand, or any other object that can be easily counted or divided. It is a process as regular as a game of chess, and is supposed to have been communicated supernaturally to their ancestors. The object for which the sikidy is worked, is to ascertain what must be done in cases of real or imaginary, present or apprehended evils. The occult science of casting nativities prevails among the Malagasy. Trial by ordeal is also extensively in use, and is practised in various ways, such as passing a red-hot iron over the tongue, or plunging the naked arm into a large earthen or iron pot full of boiling water, and picking out a pebble thrown in for the special purpose of the trial; and, in either case, to sustain no injury is viewed as a demonstration of innocence. But the practice which has obtained most generally, is that of drinking the Tangena, a powerful poison. It is calculated that upwards of 3,000 persons annually perish by this barbarous practice. Mamosary or witchcraft is looked upon as the cause of all crime, from the idea which universally obtains in Madagascar, that no one could perpetrate such deeds, unless he were really bewitched. Ancestor worship is practised also among the natives.

Missionary operations were commenced in this island by the London Missionary Society in 1818, and, during the first fifteen years of the mission, the whole Bible was translated, corrected, and printed in the native language. About one hundred schools were established with 4,000 scholars; and during that period 10,000 to 15,000 had received the benefit of instruction in these schools. Two printing-presses were established, and a Malagasy and English Dictionary was published in two volumes. Two large congregations were formed at the capital, and nearly 200 persons applied for admission to the church. Christianity had evidently taken root in the island, and a most beneficial change was gradually taking place in the habits and customs of the people. The government, however, looked upon the labours of the missionaries with jealousy and suspicion, and the queen, more especially, was strongly prepossessed in favour of the idolatrous party. In a short time, accordingly, a bitter persecution was commenced against the Christians, and for seventeen years the most oppressive policy was pursued. Many hundreds were degraded and impoverished; hundreds more doomed to slavery; not less than one hundred have been put to death, and a large number are still suffering exile, bonds, and degradation. Yet, in a most emphatic sense, it is true of Madagascar, that the blood of the martyrs has proved the seed of the church. Notwithstanding the persecuting measures of the queen and the government, the numbers of the Christian converts are annually on the increase, and among them are included some of the most intelligent and respectable men in the community. The young prince, who is heir to the throne, and his wife, are both members of the Christian church, and devoted friends of the persecuted flock, whom they assist with their advice and their money on all occasions. The hostility of the queen and her ministers continues unabated, but Christianity is secretly making extensive progress in many parts of the island.

MADHAVIS, an order of Hindu mendicants, founded by Madho, an ascetic. They travel up and down the country soliciting alms, and playing on stringed instruments. Their peculiar doctrines are not known.

MADHWACHARIS, a division of the Vaishnava sect of the Hindus. It is altogether unknown in Gangetic Hindustan; but in the peninsula it is most extensively to be found. Its founder was Madhwá-charya, a Brahman, who was born A. D. 1199, in Tuluva; he is believed by his followers to have been an incarnation of Váyu or the god of air, who took upon him the human form by desire of Náráyana, and who had been previously incarnate. He wrote a commentary on the Bhagawat Gítá, and he erected and consecrated a temple at Udipi, where he deposited an image of Krishna. This place has continued ever since to be the headquarters of the sect. After this he established eight additional temples, in which he placed images of different forms of Vishnu. These establishments still exist, and in accordance with the regulations laid down by the founder, each of eight Sanyásis in turn officiates as superior of the chief station at Udipi for two years or two years and a half. The whole expenses of the establishment devolve on the superior for the time being, and as the expenses generally exceed the income, the Sanyásis travel from place to place levying contributions on their votaries. The appearance and doctrines of the members of the sect are thus described by Professor H. H. Wilson: “The ascetic professors of Madhwácharya’s school, adopt the external appearance of Dandis, laying aside the Brahmanical cord, carrying a staff and a water pot, going bare-headed, and wearing a single wrapper stained of an orange colour with an ochry clay: they are usually adopted into the order from their boyhood, and acknowledge no social affinities nor interests. The marks common to them, and the lay votaries of the order, are the impress of the symbols of Vishnu, upon their shoulders and breasts, stamped with a hot iron, and the frontal mark, which consists of two perpendicular lines made with Gopichandana, and joined at the root of the nose like that of the Sri Vaishnavas; but instead of a red line down the centre, the Mādhvachāris make a straight black line, with the charcoal from incense offered to Narayana, terminating in a round mark made with turnerick.

"The essential dogma of this sect, like that of the Vaishnavas in general, is the identification of Vishnu with the Supreme Spirit, as the pre-existent cause of the universe, from whose substance the world was made. This primeval Vishnu, they also affirm to be endowed with real attributes, most excellent, although indefinable and independent. As there is one independent, however, there is also one dependent, and this doctrine is the characteristic dogma of the sect, distinguishing its professors from the followers of Rāmānuja as well as Sankara, or those who maintain the qualified or absolute unity of the deity. The creed of the Madhvas, is Dvaita, or duality. It is not, however, that they discriminate between the principles of good and evil, or even the difference between spirit and matter, which is the duality known to other sects of the Hindus. Their distinction is of a more subtle character, and separates the Jivatma from the Paramatma, or the principle of life from the Supreme Being. Life, they say, is one and eternal, dependent upon the Supreme, and indissolubly connected with, but not the same with him. An important consequence of this doctrine is the denial of Moksha, in its more generally received sense, or that of absorption into the universal spirit, and loss of independent existence after death."

The different modes in which this sect express devotion to Vishnu, are marking the body with his symbols, especially with a hot iron, giving his names to children and other objects of interest, and the practice of virtue, in word, act, and thought. Their sacred writings consist, besides the works of their founder, of the four Vedas, the Mahābhārat, the Pancharātra, and the genuine or original Rāmāyana.

MADONNA (Ital. My Lady), a name given to representations of the Virgin Mary in Roman Catholic countries. See MARIOLATRY.

MADRASSES, colleges in Mohammedan countries where priests are trained who are to officiate in the mosques.

MADUWA, the place in which the Bana or sacred books of the Buddhists are publicly read. It is usually a temporary erection, the roof having several breaks or compartments gradually decreasing in size as they approach the top, in the form of a pagoda, or of a pyramid, composed of successive platforms.

There is one of these erections in the precincts of nearly all the VIHARAS (which see). In the centre of the interior area is an elevated platform for the convenience of the priests, and the people sit around it upon mats spread on the ground. The platform is sometimes occupied by several priests at the same time, one of whom reads a portion of one of the sacred books in a tone between singing and reading. "Upon some occasions," as we learn from Mr. Spence Hardy, "one priest reads the original Pali, and another interprets what is read in the vernacular Singhalese; but this method is not very frequently adopted. It is the more usual course to read the Pali alone, so that the people understand not a word that is said; and were the advices of even the most excellent description in themselves, they would be delivered without profit to the people assembled. A great proportion of the attendants fall asleep, as they commonly remain during the whole night; whilst others are seen chewing their favourite betle. As might be supposed, there are evidences of unconcern in that which ought to be the principal object of the festival; but there is none of that rudeness which would be exhibited in a promiscuous assemblage of people in some countries that are much higher in the scale of civilization. Near the reading-hall there are booths and stalls, in which rice-cakes, fruits, and other provisions, and occasionally cloth and earthenware, are sold; and the blind and the lame are there, with their stringed instruments, sitting by the wayside to receive alms; so that the festival is regarded as an opportunity for amusement, as well as for acquiring merit, and answers the general purpose of a wake or fair. Whenever the name of Budha is repeated by the officiating priest, the people call out simultaneously, 'sādhu!' the noise of which may be heard at a great distance; and the effect is no doubt pleasing to those who have not been taught that it is in vain for the unlearned to say Amen, when they know not the meaning of that which is spoken. The readings are most numerous attended upon the night of the full moon, when a light is thrown upon the landscape in Ceylon that seems to silver all things visible, from the tiny leaflet to the towering mountain, and a stillness sleeps in the air that seems too deep to be earthly; and were the voices of the multitude that now come forth at intervals other than from atheist lips, the spirit might drink in a rich profusion of the thoughts that come so pleasantly, we can scarcely tell whether the waking dream be a reality, or a vision of some brighter land."

The Maduwa is used for other purposes besides reading the sacred books. In it there is a labyrinth made of withs ornamented with the cocoa-nut leaf; and the people amuse themselves by finding their way through its intricate mazes. In some instances, lines are drawn upon the ground in an open space, and these lines are regarded as the limits of the regions assigned to particular demons, the last being appropriated to Budha. A few dancers are now inroduced, one of whom advancing towards the first limit, calls out, in a defiant tone, the name of the demon to whom the region belongs. and, using the most insulting language, threatens to cross the limit, and invade the demon's territory. He then passes the limit with the utmost boldness, and goes through the same process with the other demons, until he approaches the limit of Budha's region; but the moment he attempts to cross this limit he falls down as if dead, it being supposed that he is suffering the punishment of his intrusion on the realms of Budha, and the spectators applaud his boldness.

MAGDALENS, an order of nuns in the Romish church, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene. They consist chiefly of penitent courtezans. The Religious of St. Magdalene in Rome were established by Pope Leo X., and a revenue was settled on them by Clement VIII., who ordered that the effects of all prostitutes who died intestate should fall to this order, and that the testaments of all others should be invalid unless a fifth part of their effects were bequeathed to them.

MAGDEBURG CENTURIES. See CENTURIES (MAGDEBURG).

MAGI, the ancient priests of the Persians and Medians. The word is rendered in Mat. ii. 1, "wise men." The country from which these wise men or Magi came is not precisely pointed out by the Evangelist, but only described in general terms as eastward of Palestine, and in all probability was either Persia or Mesopotamia.

MAGIANS, a sect of ancient philosophers which arose in the East at a very early period, devoting much of their attention to the study of the heavenly bodies. They were the learned men of their time, and we find Daniel the prophet promoted to be head of this sect in Chaldea, and chief governor over all the wise men of Babylon. The Magians were in complete antagonism to the Tsabians, who worshipped the heavenly hosts; and they seem to have worshipped the Deity under the emblem of fire. In all their temples, as well as in their private houses, they had fire continually burning upon their altars. They held in the greatest abhorrence the worship of images, which prevailed among other nations, and they held fire in the highest veneration as being the purest symbol of the Divine Being. The great mass of the Persian worshippers, however, adored the altar-fires themselves without rising to the Great Being whom they symbolized. The Magian sect was in danger of passing into utter extinction in the reign of Darius Hystaspes, had it not been revived and reformed by Zoroaster in the sixth century, the abstract principles of whose system have been already noticed in the article ABESTA. In spite of the violent opposition of the Tsabians, Zoroaster succeeded in bringing over Darius to a firm belief in his reformed system, and from that time Magianism became the national religion of the country, until it was supplanted by that of Mohammed. Remnants of this sect are still found in Persia under the name of Guebres, and in India under that of Parsees.

MAGIC, a science supposed to depend on the influence of evil spirits, or the spirits of the dead. Balaam seems to have been a pretender to skill in this art; and in Jer. xxxix. 3, we read of the rab may or chief of the magicians. In early times all who engaged in the study of natural phenomena were accounted magicians, the term being thus used in a good sense, nearly equivalent to the word philosophers. Magic has been divided into natural, which consists in the application of natural causes to produce wonderful phenomena; planetary, which assigns either to the planets or to spirits residing in them an influence over the affairs of men; and diabolical, which invokes the aid of demons to accomplish supernatural effects. All practices of this kind were forbidden by the Law of Moses as being connected with idolatry; yet in every period individuals were found among the Israelites who were strongly addicted to magical arts. Magicians are frequently mentioned in the Old Testament in connection with Egypt. Thus it is said in Exod. vii. 11, "Then Pharaoh also called the wise men and the sorcerers: now the magicians of Egypt, they also did in like manner with their enchantments." "Now we find in Egyptian antiquity," says Hengstenberg, "an order of persons, to whom this is entirely appropriate, which is here ascribed to the magicians. The priests had a double office, the practical worship of the gods, and the pursuit of that which in Egypt was accounted as wisdom. The first belonged to the so-called prophets, the second to the holy scribes. These last were the learned men of the nation; as in the Pentateuch, they are called wise men, so the classical writers named them sages. These men were applied to for explanation and aid in all things which lay beyond the circle of common knowledge and action. Thus, in severe cases of sickness for example, along with the physician a holy scribe was called, who, from a book, and astrological signs, determined whether recovery was possible. The interpretation of dreams, and also divination, belonged to the order of the holy scribes. In times of pestilence, they applied themselves to magic arts to avert the disease. A passage in Lucian furnishes a peculiarly interesting parallel to the accounts of the Pentateuch concerning the practice of magic arts: 'There was with us in the vessel, a man of Memphis, one of the holy scribes, wonderful in wisdom and skilled in all sorts of Egyptian knowledge. It was said of him, that he had lived twenty-three years in subterranean sanctuaries, and that he had been there instructed in magic by Isis.'" 2 H

Both in Egypt and in Babylon the office of magician belonged to the priestly caste. In the later periods of Jewish history, many pretended to skill in the occult science of magic, using incantations of various kinds, and professing even to evoke the spirits of the dead, with the view of drawing forth from them secrets otherwise unattainable. Sorcerers and magicians are mentioned by Josephus as abounding in his time, and exercising great influence over the people. The Jews called magicians, Masters of the Name, the Shemhamphorash, or ineffable name of God, that is, Jehovah, by the true pronunciation of which wonders could be accomplished. They allege that this was the secret by which our Saviour performed his miracles while on earth. In the Sepher Toldath Jeshu a strange story is related of the manner in which Jesus became possessed of the ineffable name. It mentions that the name was found by David, engraved on a stone, when digging the foundations of the temple, and that he deposited it in the sanctuary; and lest curious young men should learn this name, and bring devastation upon the world by the miracles it would enable them to perform, the wise men of the time made, by magical arts, two brazen lions, which they stationed before the entrance of the Holy of Holies, on each side; so that, if any one entered the sacred place, and learned the ineffable Name, the lions roared at him so fiercely when he came forth, that, in his fright, he entirely forgot it. But they say that our Lord, by magical arts and incantations, entered the sanctuary undiscovered by the priests, saw the sacred Name, copied it on parchment, which, having made an incision in his body, he slipped under his skin. The roaring of the lions when he came out caused him to forget the name, but the parchment under his skin enabled him to recover it, and thenceforward to refresh his memory when needful; and by the power of this name it was that all his miracles were performed.

Josephus also represents the Jews as effecting wonderful cures by invoking the name of Solomon. In the Talmud a curious legend is related concerning a signet-ring, by which he ruled the spirits, and which came down from heaven to him in a cloud, having the name Jehovah engraved upon it. By the magic influence of this signet-ring, he summoned both good and evil spirits to aid him in building the temple. Various different modes of incantation are mentioned by Josephus as having been used by Solomon. The magical art is well known to have been extensively practised by the ancient heathens; and Pythagoras, as well as other Greek philosophers, made it a subject of study. Ephesus was particularly famed for the number and the skill of its magicians, and when the apostle had preached in that city the pure doctrines of the gospel of Christ, the effect is thus stated Acts xix. 19. "Many of them also which used curious arts brought their books together, and burned them before all men: and they counted the price of them, and found it fifty thousand pieces of silver." So celebrated was Ephesus for the magic art, that certain amulets with strange characters inscribed on them, which were worn about the person, received the name of Ephesian letters. On the same principle were formed the magical letters called ABRACADABRA (which see), which were invented by the Basilidians. It is stated by Augustine, as having been generally believed by the heathen, that our blessed Lord was the author of several books on magic, which he wrote for the use of his disciples. Celsus and others pretend that our Saviour studied magic in Egypt, and Suetonius calls the Christians the men of the magical superstition.

The practice of magical arts was viewed by the early Christians as sinful, and no sooner did any one, who had acquired a knowledge of these mysteries, embrace Christianity, than without hesitation he burned the books on magic, which happened to be in his possession. By the Theodosian Code, all magicians are branded as malefici, or evil-doers, and if detected they are appointed to be put to death. The laws of the church were very severe against all who were guilty of indulging in magical practices. The council of Laodicea condemns them to be cast out of the church. The council of Ancyra prescribes five years' penance for any one that receives a magician into his house. Tertullian goes the length of saying, that there never was a magician or enchanter allowed to escape unpunished in the church.

MAGISTER DISCIPLINÆ (Lat. Master of Discipline), an officer in the church of Spain in the end of the fifth century. At that time it was customary for parents to dedicate their children, while yet very young, to the service of the church; in which case they were taken into the bishop's family, and educated under him by a presbyter selected for the purpose, called Magister Disciplina, because his chief business was to watch over their moral conduct, and to instruct them in the rules and discipline of the church.

MAGLANTE, a god worshipped in the Philippine Islands as the deity who hurds the thunder.

MAGNA MATER. See RHEA.

MAGNIFICAT, the hymn of the Virgin Mary. "My soul doth magnify the Lord, my spirit doth rejoice in God my Saviour," &c. It is first mentioned in the sixth century as having been publicly used in the French churches. In the rubric of the Church of England, it is appointed to be said or sung in English after the first lesson at evening prayer, unless the ninetyeth Psalm, called Cantate Domino, "Sing ye to the Lord," is used.

MAGUSIANS, a sect of the ancient Zoroastrians, which considered absolute DUALISM (which see), as the starting point of the system, or the original mode in which Deity manifested himself.

MAHABHARATA, the second great Sanskrit epic of the Hindus. It celebrates the wars of the two rival families known as the Pandus and the Kurus, a tale of the Lunar dynasties of kings.

MAHA BRAHMA, the rules of a superior celestial world, according to the system of Buddhism.

MAHAN-ATMA, the Great Soul, a name applied to BRAHM (which see).

MAHANT, the superior of a Hindu monastery or Mat'h, of which he has the entire control. He is usually elected from the senior and more proficient of the ascetics. In some instances where the Mahant has a family, the office descends in the line of his posterity, but where an election is to be made, it is conducted with great solemnity. Professor H. Wilson gives an account of the mode of election: "The Mat'hs of various districts look up to some one of their own order as chief, and they all refer to that connected with their founder, as the common head: under the presidency, therefore, of the Mahant of that establishment, wherever practicable, and in his absence, of some other of acknowledged pre-eminence, the Mahants of the different Mat'hs assemble, upon the decease of one of their brethren, to elect a successor. For this purpose they regularly examine the Chêlas, or disciples of the deceased, the ablest of whom is raised to the vacant situation: should none of them be qualified, they choose a Mahant from the pupils of some other teacher, but this is rarely necessary, and unless necessary, is never had recourse to. The new Mahant is then regularly installed, and is formally invested with the cap, the rosary, the frontal mark, or Tika, or any other monastic insignia, by the president of the assembly. Under the native government, whether Mohammedan or Hindu—the election of the superior of one of these establishments was considered as a matter of sufficient moment, to demand the attention of the governor of the province, who, accordingly, in person, or by his deputy, presided at the election: at present, no interference is exercised by the ruling authorities, and rarely by any lay character, although occasionally a Raja or a Zemindar, to whose liberality the Mat'h is indebted, or in whose lands it is situated, assumes the right of assisting and presiding at the election. The Mahants of the sect, in which the election takes place, are generally assisted by those of the sects connected with them: each is attended by a train of disciples, and individuals of various mendicant tribes repair to the meeting; so that an assemblage of many hundreds, and sometimes of thousands, occurs: as far as the resources of the Mat'h, where they are assembled, extend, they are maintained at its expense; when those fail, they must shift for themselves; the election is usually a business of ten or twelve days, and during the period of its continuance, various points of polity or doctrine are discussed in the assembly."

MAHASOOR, the chief of the Asouras or Rak-chasas, malignant spirits among the Hindus.

MAHA YUG, an age of the gods in Hindu chronology, including 12,000 years of the gods, each of which comprehends 360 solar years. Thus the entire duration of a maha-yug is equal to 4,320,000 years of mortals.

MAHDI (Arab. the director or guide), a title given to the last Imam of the race of Ali. See IMAMS (TWELVE).

MAHESA, one of the names of the Hindu god SHIVA (which see).

MAHOMET. See MOHAMMED.

MAHOMETANS. See MOHAMMEDANS.

MAHUZZIM, the god of forces, as the word is translated in Dan. xi. 38, "But in his estate shall he honour the God of forces: and a god whom his fathers knew not shall he honour with gold, and silver, and with precious stones, and pleasant things." Commentators have been much perplexed to explain who this deity is. The Greek text of Theodotion's version, and also the Vulgate, give the word Mahuzzim without interpreting it. Some understand it as referring to the Antichrist, and others to Antiochus, the great enemy of the Jews. Nicholas de Lyra, Bellarmine, and some others, regard it as the name of the idol and demon which they think is to be served by Antichrist. Theodoret believes it to be the name which Antichrist will assume. Grotius supposes it to be the Baalshamin of the Phœnicians, and that Antiochus Epiphanes ordered this idol to be worshipped. Some understand the word Mahuzzim to be mediating spirits between God and man. Jurieu thinks that it denotes the Roman eagles, or Roman Empire, to which Antiochus would do homage, the Roman eagles being a kind of deities, before which the soldiers bowed down.

MAIA, an ancient Roman goddess often associated with Vulcan, and sometimes spoken of as his spouse. A sacrifice was offered to her on the first of May, which has been supposed to have derived its name from this divinity. She has been identified also with the BONA DEA (which see).

MAJOLI, ST., (REGULAR CLERKS OF). See CLERKS (REGULAR) OF ST. MAJOLI.

MAJORES, a title by which the Jewish ministers are frequently designated in the Theodosian Code. The same title is also applied by Augustin to the ministers of the CÆLICOLE (which see), a sect which is supposed to have been composed of apostates from the Jewish religion.

MAJORES (DII), the twelve superior gods of the ancient Romans, who were believed to have a principal share in the government of the world. They were styled the Dii Selecti, the select gods, of whom twelve were admitted into the councils of Jupiter, and hence denominated CONSENTES (which see). These twelve deities, who presided over the twelve months of the year and the twelve signs of the zodiac, were Jupiter, Juno, Vesta, Minerva, Ceres, Diana, Mars, Mercury, Neptune, Apollo, and Vulcan. To these twelve, who were consentes, must be added Janus, Saturn, Genius, Sol, Pluto, Bacchus, Terra, and Luna, and thus we find that the Dii Majores amount to twenty, who are usually classified from their place of residence, as Celestial, Terrestrial, Marine, and Infernal gods.

MAKOS, a god of the ancient Slavonians, who was represented partly as a man, partly as a fish. At a later period, he presided over rain, and was invoked when the fields were in want of water.

MALACHIBEL, a god of the ancient Syrians, the king of the earth.

MALAKANES, one of the most remarkable sects of dissenters from the Russo-Greek Church, who are thus named in derision from the Russian word malako, milk, because they use milk as an article of food on fast-days. The name which they themselves adopt is Istinneeje Christians, true Christians. Nothing is known as to their origin; but the following circumstances brought them into notice about the middle of the last century. A non-commissioned Prussian officer, who happened to be a prisoner of war in Russia, settled in a village of the government of Kharkow. Being a man of great piety, and animated by an earnest desire to do good among the peasantry, he went from house to house reading and expounding the Word of God, and continued to follow this practice till his death. No further particulars have been ascertained in regard to the history of this excellent and devoted man; and the only thing which is known is, that he resided in a village inhabited by the Malakanes. A community holding similar principles was discovered about the same time in the government of Tambof. This sect is not numerous. About 3,000 of its members, however, are settled in the government of the Crimea, where they were visited in 1843 by Baron Haxthausen, who gives the following description of their creed: "They acknowledge the Bible as the Word of God, and the unity of God in three persons. This triune God, uncreated, self-existent, the cause of all things, is an eternal, immutable, and invisible Spirit. God dwells in a pure world; He sees all, He knows all, He governs all; all is filled with Him. He has created all things. In the beginning, all that was created by God was good and perfect. Adam's soul, but not his body, was created after the image of God. This created immortal soul of Adam was endowed with heavenly reason and purity, and a clear knowledge of God. Evil was unknown to Adam, who possessed a holy freedom, tending towards God the Creator. They admit the dogma of the fall of Adam, the birth, death, and resurrection of Christ, in the same manner as other Christians, and expound the ten commandments in the following manner:—'The first and second forbid idolatry; therefore no images are to be worshipped. The third shows that it is sinful to take an oath. The fourth is to be observed by spending Sundays and other festivals in prayer, singing praises to God, and reading the Bible. The fifth, by ordering to honour parents, enjoins to be obedient to every authority. The sixth prohibits two kinds of murder,—first, the bodily, by a weapon, poison, &c., which is a sin, except in case of war, when it is not sinful to kill in defence of the Czar and the country; and, second, the spiritual murder, which is committed by seducing others from the truth with deceitful words, or enticing them by bad example into sin, which leads them to everlasting perdition. They also consider it murder when one injures, persecutes, or hates his neighbour: according to the words of St. John, "He who hates his brother is a murderer." With regard to the seventh commandment, they consider as a spiritual adultery even a too great fondness of this world and its transient pleasures; and, therefore, not only unchastity, but also drunkenness, gluttony, and bad company, should be avoided. By the eighth they consider every violence and deceit as theft. By the ninth commandment, every insult, mockery, flattery, and lie, is considered as false witness. By the tenth, they understand the mortification of all lusts and passions.' They conclude their confession of faith by the following words:—'We believe that whoever will fulfil the whole of the ten commandments of God will be saved. But we also believe that since the fall of Adam no man is capable of fulfilling these ten commandments by his own strength. We believe that man, in order to become able to perform good works, and to keep the commandments of God, must believe in Jesus Christ, the only-begotten Son of God. This true faith, necessary for our salvation, we cannot find any where else but in the Word of God alone. We believe that the Word of God creates in us that faith which makes us capable of receiving the grace of God.' With regard to the sacrament of baptism, they say,—'Although we know that Christ was baptized by John in the river Jordan, and that the apostles have baptized others, namely, as Philip did with the eunuch,—yet we understand by baptism, not the earthly water, which only cleanses the body but not the soul, but the spiritual living water, which is faith in the triune God, without contradiction, and in submission to his holy Word; because the Saviour says, "Whosoever believeth in me, from his body streams of living water will flow;" and John the Baptist says, "A man can take nothing which is not given him from heaven;" and Paul says, "Christ has not sent me to baptize, but to preach." We therefore understand by the sacrament of baptism, the spiritual cleansing of our soul from sin through faith, and the death of the old man with his works in us, in order to be newly clad by a pure and holy life. Although, after the birth of a child, we cleanse with real water the impurities of his body, we do not consider it as baptism. With regard to the Lord's Supper, it was a commemoration of Christ; but the words of the gospel are the spiritual bread of life. Man lives not by bread alone, but by every word of God. The Spirit gives life; flesh is of no use. The receiving of the earthly bread and wine is therefore unnecessary."

This peculiar sect, which resembles somewhat in principle the Society of Friends, is composed chiefly of Russian peasants, most of them quite illiterate, but characterized by remarkably devout, pious dispositions and character. Their favourite author is the German Mystic, Jung Stilling, whose writings have been translated into the Russian language. The Malakanes, who dwell with great delight on the prospect of the Millennium, were roused to a state of great excitement in 1833, by an attempt, on the part of one of their ministers, to convince them that the Millennium was near at hand. Count Krasinski thus relates the details of this singular movement: "Terentius Belioreff began to preach repentance, announcing that the millennium should begin in thirty months, and ordered that all business, and all kinds of work, except the most indispensable, should be abandoned; but that people should spend their whole time in prayer and singing. He declared himself to be the prophet Elias, sent to announce the coming of the Lord, whilst his companion Enoch was sent with the same mission to the west. He announced the day when he was to ascend to heaven, in the presence of all. Several thousands of Malakanes assembled from different parts of Russia. On the appointed day, he appeared on a cart, ordered the assembled crowd to pray on their knees, and then, spreading his arms, he jumped from the cart, and fell on the ground. The disappointed Malakanes delivered the poor enthusiast to the local police as an impostor. He was imprisoned, but having for some time remained in confinement, he spoke no more of his being the prophet Elias, but continued to preach the millennium in prison, and after his release, till his death. He left a considerable number of followers, who often assemble to spend days and nights in continual prayer and singing. They introduced the community of goods, and emigrated, with the permission of the government, to Georgia, where they settled in sight of Mount Ararat, waiting for the millennium, and where a colony of Lutherans from Wurtemberg had settled before, for the same purpose." The strange vagaries of this fanatic, however, ought not to be charged upon the Malakanes, whose spiritual principles and regard for the truths of the Bible entitle them to the respect of all good men. The principal seat of this sect is the Crimea, though they are found scattered through different parts of Russia. They resemble the Duchobortzi (which see) in maintaining the spirituality of God's worship and ordinances, but they differ from them in admitting the atoning work of Christ, holding the lawfulness of a stated ministry, and observing the Christian Sabbath as a day set apart for the worship of God. The better to prepare for the sacred duties of the Lord's Day, they hold meetings for prayer on the Saturday evenings.

MALEATES, a surname of Apollo, derived from Malea, a cape in Laconia. Under this name he was worshipped at Sparta.

MALEC, the principal angel who, according to the Mohammedans, presides over hell. In the Koran, it is said, "And they," meaning the unbelievers, "shall cry aloud, saying, O Malec, intercede for us, that the Lord would end us by annihilation. And he shall answer, Verily, ye shall remain here for ever. We brought you the truth heretofore, and ye abhorred the truth." Some Mohammedan doctors allege that the answer of Malec shall not be given till after a thousand years have expired.

MALEKITES, the third of the orthodox Mohammedan sects in importance, but the second in the order of time. It was originated by Malec-ebn-Ans, a native of Medina, in the days of Harún-al-Raschid. The doctrines of this sect, which prevail chiefly in Barbary and some other parts of Africa, proceed on the literal acceptance of the prohibitory precepts.

MALUK DASIS, a subdivision of the Ramanandi Vaishnavas of Hindustan, and a sect of comparatively uncertain origin and limited importance. The founder of the sect is supposed to have lived in the reign of Akbar the Great in the sixteenth century. The modifications which Maluk Dás introduced into the Vaishnava doctrines were trifling, amounting to little more than the adoption of his name by the sect, and a shorter streak of red upon the forehead, while their teachers are of the secular order. Vishnu, in his character as Rama, is the object of their practical adoration, and their principles partake of the spirit of quietism which pervades the sects of the Ramanandi school. Their chief authority is the Bhagavat Gita. The adherents of the sect are said to be numerous, especially among the servile and trading classes, to the latter of which Maluk Das belonged. The principal establishment of this Vaishnava sect is at Kara Manikpur, the birth-place of the founder, and still occupied by his descendants; and besides this establishment they have six other Mat's at Allababad, Benares, Bindraban, Ayudhya, Lucknow, and Jagunnath, which last is of great repute as rendered sacred by the death of Maluk Dás.

MALUMIGISTS, a sect of Mohammedans, according to Ricault, who teach that God may be known perfectly in this world by the knowledge which men have of themselves.

MAMACOCIA, a deity worshipped by the ancient Peruvians.

MAMAKURS, a kind of bracelets worn by the natives of the Moluccas or Spice Islands, particularly Amboyna, and which the women regard as preservatives against all enchantments.

MAMERS, the Oscan name of the ancient heathen god Mars. By Varro, however, it is regarded as the Sabine name of the same deity. Mamers again was a rural deity among the Romans. Among the Greeks also Mamertus was sometimes used as a surname of Ares.

MAMMILLARIANS, a sect of ANABAPTISTS

(which see), which arose at Haarlem in Holland in the sixteenth century.

MANA, an ancient Italian divinity, supposed to be identical with MANIA (which see).

MANABOSHIO, a deity worshipped by the Chipewewa Indians of North America. Various strange legendary tales are related concerning this god. It is said that his mother having been killed by her own husband, Manaboshio, to avenge his mother's death, made war upon his father, and so assailed him with black stones, that he was glad to sue for peace, and in order to appease the anger of his son, he promised him a place in heaven, on condition, however, that he would destroy the monsters or giants called Windigos, who devoured men. His first battle was with the king of the fishes, whom he slew. His next engagement was with the serpents and their queen, who made him pay dear for his victory by letting forth the waters of the deluge upon him. He found refuge on a tree, commanded the waters to subside, and created the world anew, assisted by certain animals, who at his order plunged into the billows until a beaver or a musk-rat recovered a small portion of the earth. In this legend Manaboshio is the same as the Litotlane of the Bechuanas, and the whole story may be considered as an obscure tradition of the deluge.

MANAGARM, a formidable giant mentioned in the Scandinavian Prose Edda, as destined to be filled with the life-blood of men who draw near their end, and will swallow up the moon, and stain the heaven and the earth with blood. Then shall the sun grow dim, and the winds howl tumultuously.

MANAH, the tutelary god of the Hodhail and other tribes of ancient Arabia, occupying the country between Mecca and Medina. The idol was a large stone, the worship of which consisted of the slaughter of camels and other animals. Though the idol was destroyed by order of Mohammed, the rite is continued as a part of Islam, at Manah, on the way to Mecca.

MANDRÆ, a name often applied to monasteries in the East, whence originated the term Archimandrite, used to denote the abbot or superior of a Greek convent.

MANDYAS, a vestment worn by a Greek archimandrite, which somewhat resembles the cope of the Romanists, but is fastened in front, and has bells at the lower edge like the garment of the Jewish high-priest.

MANES, a term used among the ancient Romans, to denote the souls of the departed. Sacrifices were offered in honour of the Manes at certain seasons, and an annual festival called FERALIA (which see), dedicated specially to the Manes, was celebrated on the 19th of February.

MANGO-CAPAC, the founder of the ancient Peruvian Empire, who was after his death worshipped as a god, altars being reared to his honour. Both he and his wife were regarded as children of the Sun, who had been sent from heaven to earth that they might found a kingdom. The Peruvians held Mango-Capac in so great veneration, that they paid a kind of worship to the city of Cuzco, because it was erected by this great monarch, who had taught them the worship of the sun, the moon, and other heavenly bodies.

MAN-HO-PA, the Great Spirit worshipped by the North American Indians, whom they propitiate by presents, and by fasting, and lamentation, during the space of from three to five days. This Great Being they acknowledge as the disposer of all good, their supreme guide and protector. They believe him to be possessed, like themselves, of corporeal form, though endowed with a nature infinitely more excellent than theirs, and which will endure for ever without change. They have a tradition, that the great waters divide the residence of the Great Spirit from the temporary abodes of his red children; but a very general belief prevails, that the Great Spirit resides on the western side of the Rocky Mountains.

MANI, the name given to the moon among the ancient Scandinavians. The following account is found in the Prose Edda of this mythological being: "There was formerly a man, named Mundilfari, who had two children so lovely and graceful, that he called the male, Máni (moon), and the female, Sól (sun), who espoused the man named Glenur. But the gods being incensed at Mundilfari's presumption took his children and placed them in the heavens, and let Sól drive the horses that draw the car of the sun, which the gods had made to give light to the world out of the sparks that flew from Muspellheim. These horses are called Arvak and Alsvid, and under their withers the gods placed two skins filled with air to cool and refresh them, or, according to some ancient traditions, a refrigerant substance called isarukul. Máni was set to guide the moon in his course, and regulate his increasing and waning aspect. One day he carried off from the earth two children, named Bil and Hjuki, as they were returning from the spring called Byrgir, carrying between them the bucket called Siegr, on the pole Simul. Vidfinn was the father of these children, who always follow Máni (the moon), as we may easily observe even from the earth."

MANIA, a goddess among the ancient Etruscans, who belonged to the infernal divinities, and was said to be the mother of the Manes. We learn from Macrobius that images of Mania were hung up at the house doors to ward off danger. At the festival of the COMPITALIA (which see), boys are said to have been sacrificed to this goddess. The barbarous practice of offering up human sacrifices on this occasion was at length abolished, and offerings of garlic and poppy heads substituted in place of them.

MANIÆ, certain ancient divinities, believed to be the same with the EUMENIDES (which see).

MANICHEANS, a heretical sect which arose towards the close of the third century, originating in an attempt on the part of the Persian Mani or Manes, to combine Christianity with the Oriental Pagan religions. The system of doctrines thus formed was strictly dualistic. It supposed two original and absolutely opposite principles; the one being God, the source of all good; the other evil, the source of all confusion, disorder, and destruction. The two kingdoms thus at antagonism were at first wholly separate from one another. In connection with the Supreme God, and emanating from him, were certain Æons, who, in strict subordination to the Great Source of light and goodness, diffused these precious blessings among all other beings. The powers of darkness are engaged in a struggle among themselves, until approaching the kingdom of light they are subdued by intermingling with it, and at length are rendered utterly powerless. From the Supreme Being, who rules over the kingdom of light, issues the Æon, mother of light, who generates the primitive man with a view to oppose to him the powers of darkness. The primitive man, in conjunction with the five pure elements of physical nature, enters into the conflict, but feeling his position to be critical and dangerous, he asks for, and obtains, the living spirit by which he is raised once more to the kingdom of light. A process of purification is now commenced by the same living spirit, which goes on in the physical as well as in the moral world, both of them indeed being confounded in the Manichean system. "As the religious system of the Persians," to use the language of Neander, "assigned an important place to the sun and moon, in the conflict in the physical and spiritual world between Ormuzd and Ahriman, and in carrying forward the universal process of development and purification; so was it also in the system of Mani. Very nearly the same that the system of Zoroaster taught concerning Mithras, as the Genius (Ized) of the Sun, Mani transferred to his Christ,—the pure soul sending forth its influence from the sun and from the moon. Representing the soul as having sprung from the primitive man, he interpreted in this sense the biblical name, 'Son of Man,' and distinguishing between the pure and free soul enthroned in the sun, and its kindred soul diffused throughout nature, and corrupted by its mixture with matter. So, too, he distinguished a son of man superior to all contact with matter, and incapable of suffering, from a son of man crucified, so to speak, and suffering, in matter. Wherever the scattered seed pushed upward out of the dark bosom of the earth and unfolded itself in a plant, in its blossom and its fruit, Mani beheld the triumphant evolution of the principle of light, gradually working its way onward to freedom from the bondage of matter; he beheld how the living soul, which had been imprisoned in the members of the Prince of Darkness, loosens itself from the confinement, rises in freedom, and mingles with its congenial element the pure air, where the souls completely purified ascend to those ships of light (the sun and moon) which are ready to transport them to their native country. But whatever still bears upon it various blemishes and stains, is attracted to them gradually, and in portions, by the force of heat, and incorporates itself with all trees, with whatever is planted and sown."

Man is now created, the image, in this world of darkness, of the primitive man, and destined to exercise dominion over nature. In him are seen united the powers of the kingdom of darkness and of light, a mirror in which are exhibited the powers of heaven and of earth. His soul is derived from the kingdom of light, and his body from the kingdom of darkness. The two maintain a constant struggle with each other, and to deliver the soul from the power of darkness, giving it a complete victory over the evil principle, the spirit of the sun, which purifies all nature, must become incarnate, not uniting himself to a material body, with which he could have no communion, but clothing himself in a shadowy, sensible form, and thus the death of Christ was not a real, but only a seeming crucifixion.

The aim of the whole Divine arrangements, according to the theory of the Manicheans, was to effect a total separation of the light from the darkness, and the reduction of the darkness to utter powerlessness. They held that the highest, most authoritative, and only infallible system of truth, was that which was taught by the Paraclete or Mani, and by which all doctrines, wherever found, were to be tested. To these the Holy Scriptures of truth were subordinated, and they held that it was by the teachings of Mani, the true was distinguished from the false, in the New Testament. They refused to admit, for example, that Jesus was born of a woman; that he was circumcised as a Jew, that he was meanly baptized, led into the wilderness, and miserably tempted of the devil. Mani claimed to be a divinely authorized church-reformer. He held that the Manichean was the only true Christian church; and that within it there were two distinct orders of members,—the exoterics, called Auditors, who were permitted to read the writings of Mani, and to hear his doctrines stated in their mythical form, without, however, receiving any explanation of their hidden meaning; and the esoterics, called the Elect or Perfect, who were the priestly order of the church, and formed the connecting link between the earth and the kingdom of light. The latter class were forbidden to hold property, and required to lead a life of contemplation, to abstain from marriage, from all intoxicating drinks, and even from animal food. They must not kill, nor even injure an animal, nor must they pull up an herb, or pluck a fruit or a flower. The Auditors were ordered to pay them all due reverence as superior beings, and to provide them with suitable means of support; they were to look upon them also as mediators between them and the kingdom of light. From this body of the Elect were chosen the presiding officers of the church, who, like the apostles, were twelve in number, and under the name of Magistri were the rulers of the sect. To these twelve was added a thirteenth, who, representing Mani, presided over the rest. Subordinate to these superior officers were sixty-two bishops, under whom were presbyters, deacons, and finally travelling preachers. The Lord's Supper was strictly limited to the Elect, and it is generally admitted, that they used wine in the ordinance.

The Sun being the Christ of the Manicheans, they observed Sunday as a festival in honour of him; and on a particular day in the month of March, they celebrated a festival in commemoration of the martyrdom of Mani, when a splendidly adorned pulpit, ascended by five steps, was erected, and before it all the Manicheans prostrated themselves. At its first origin the members of the sect were persecuted by the Roman government. The Emperor Dioclesian, A. D. 296, issued a decree, that the leaders of the Manicheans should be burned at the stake, and their followers subjected to decapitation, and the confiscation of their property. Notwithstanding this severe enactment, the sect made rapid progress, and in the fourth century it ensnared many, including even Augustine for a time. In the year 372, Valentinian the elder forbade their holding meetings, and laid their ministers under heavy penalties. In the year 381, Theodosius the Great pronounced them infamous, and deprived them of the rights of citizens. To escape the severity of these laws, the Manicheans endeavoured to shelter themselves under a variety of different names. From the affinity of the doctrines of Mani to those of Zoroaster, in no country did the Manichean heresy find a firmer footing than in Persia; and in the sixth century it became so powerful in that country as to seduce the son of Cabadas the monarch; and the consequence was, that, by royal command, many of them were slaughtered. In the East generally, from the Oriental character of their system, the Manicheans made rapid progress for several centuries, though often subjected to penal enactments of the most oppressive kind. Towards the ninth century the sect became merged in the PAULICIANS (which see).

Ecclesiastical historians generally have recognized the Oriental character of the Manichean system; but the work of Dr. Baur, published at Tübingen in 1831, has traced, in the most satisfactory manner, the close relationship which exists between the doctrines of Mani and those of Budha. Neander, pursuing the same train of thought, has pointed out some very striking analogies between the two systems. Thus he remarks: "It is in the highest degree probable, that in the public appearances of Mani two epochs are to be distinguished,—and this view of the matter is also confirmed by indications in the historical notices,—the first when his aim was simply to reconcile and blend together Parsism and Christianity; the second, after he had become acquainted in his travels with Buddhism, from which a new light arose within him, and he supposed that he first attained, from this new position, to a better understanding of the truth in all the three religions. Dualism, with him, must now gradually pass over more completely into pantheistic Monoism. For we cannot help considering Buddhism, although the fact has been denied by many in modern times, as one phase of the appearance of Pantheism; since indeed we must consider as such every doctrine which does not recognize God as a self-conscious, free causality of existence, acting with a view to certain purposes or ends. The Dualism of the Buddha system is of altogether another kind from that of the Parsic. It is not a positive kingdom of evil that stands opposed to the kingdom of good, and with a corrupting influence mixes into its creation; but by Dualism here nothing else is expressed than that the Divine Being is under the necessity of passing out of itself, and over into manifestation;—and the problem then is, how to return back from this manifestation into pure being. There are two factors, the Spirit-God, and nature, or matter. When the spirit passes out from itself into nature, then springs into existence the phenomenal world, the world of appearance, of Samsara—the Maya. The Spirit becomes ever more coagulated in nature, more completely estranged from itself, even to entire unconsciousness. In man, it returns back through various stages of development and purification once more to itself; till, wholly released from the bonds of natural force, after being stripped of all limited, individual existence, it becomes conscious of its oneness with the primal Spirit, from which all life has flowed, and passes over into the same. This is becoming Nirwana. The antithesis is obvious—the Spirit, in its estrangement from itself, the world of manifestation or of appearance (Samsara, Maya; and the pure being of the Spirit (the Nirwana). It is a characteristic mark of the Buddhist mode of contemplation, and an evidence of the Monoism lying at the root of this Dualism, when we find it described as the highest stage of perfection, that the Samsara and the Nirwana become one for consciousness; the Spirit is no longer affected at all by the appearance, can energize freely in connection with it, and amidst the world of appearance, recognizing this as appearance and in its necessity, holds fast only the pure being—the entire oneness of the world on this side, and the world beyond time. Thus Buddha lets himself down to the world of Samsara for the redemption of the souls therein confined, and both are one to him."

The Manichean heresy appears to have been a combination of different systems, but more especially those of the Christians, the Parses, and the Buddhists, all of which develop themselves more strongly in this than in any other system of doctrines which ecclesiastical history contains.

MANIPA, a goddess worshipped by the Mongol Tartars. She is represented by an idol with nine heads, which form a kind of pyramid. She is likewise represented under a human shape, and thought to delight in murder.

MANIPLE, a portion of the dress of a Romish priest in celebrating mass, worn upon the left arm. It was originally a narrow strip of linen suspended from the left arm; in course of time it was embellished, bordered with a fringe, and decorated with needle-work. The Greek priests have two maniples, called epimanicia, one for the right hand, and another for the left. The patriarch alone is allowed to wear both. No maniple is worn by the clergy of the Church of England.

MANITO, a name used among the North American Indians to denote a spirit, hence the Great Spirit is called in various tribes Kûchi-Manito, and the Evil Spirit, Matchi-Manito. When used simply without any epithet prefixed, the title Manito is restricted to a minor emanation from the Great Spirit, which the American Indian conceives to be communicated to some well-known bird or beast or other object, fitting it to be his guardian deity, his councillor, protector, and friend. But while thus reposing with confidence on the assistance of his own Manito, he is constantly visited with painful apprehensions, lest his neighbour's Manito may prove more powerful than his own, and may, perhaps, assault and injure him. The world, they imagine, is governed by Manitoes, both good and evil, who are ever conflicting together, and thus give rise to the moral confusion and disorder which every where prevail. The constant dread of these powerful spirits haunts the North American savage of the woods, until, by death or transmigration, he passes beyond their reach. When they go to battle or the chase, the image of their tutelary spirit is carried with them as an indispensable part of their equipment. When they perform a solemn sacrifice, they put upon a pole the head of a man carved in wood, which they place in the middle of the house. A smaller image of the same kind is carried about with them suspended round their necks. "Every savage," says Chateaubriand, "has his Manito, as every Negro has his Fetish: it is either a bird, a fish, a quadruped, a reptile, a stone, a piece of wood, a bit of cloth, any coloured object, or a European or American ornament." One Indian, as the Moravian missionaries inform us, has, in a dream, received the sun as his tutelary spirit; another the moon; a third, the owl; a fourth, the buffalo.

MANNUS, a god worshipped by the ancient Germans. He was the son of TUISCO.

MANSIONARI. See OSTIARI.

MANTEIS (Gr. prophets), seers connected with the ancient oracles of Greece and Rome. They were believed to foretell future events under the influence of the gods, particularly of Apollo. This privilege was in some cases supposed to belong to particular families, who handed it down from father to son. The manteis made their revelations on any great emergency, when consulted by others, or when they themselves considered it to be for the public advantage, to make known the will of the gods. These interpreters of the will of heaven were publicly protected and honoured by the Athenian government, and their presence was deemed important in all assemblies of the people. See ARUSPICES, AUGURS, DIVINATION, ORACLES.

MANTELUM (MONASTICUM), (Lat. a monk's mantle). See MANDYAS.

MANTIS (THE PRAYING), an insect said to have been formerly worshipped by the Hottentots. It derives the peculiar name it bears from the erect position and motion it assumes when alarmed. Considerable doubt exists whether this particular form of idolatry was ever practised among the Hottentot tribes at any time. All that is known with certainty is, that the insect in question was regarded by the more superstitious of the people as a creature of bad omen, and to kill, or even to injure it, was looked upon as in the highest degree unlucky, and sure to be followed by some great misfortune.

MANTRA, a secret, the communication of which forms the chief ceremony of initiation in all Hindu sects. It generally consists of the name of some deity, or a short address to him; it is conveyed by the teacher to the disciple in a whisper, and when once known, it is carefully concealed from all the uninitiated. Professor H. Wilson says, that Hindus above prejudices in other respects, find it so difficult to get over that of communicating the Mantra, that even when they profess to impart it, their sincerity can scarcely be admitted without a doubt.—The word Mantra is also employed generally to denote a spell or enchantment, and also a hymn or a prayer.

MANU (CODE OF), the authoritative Law-Book of the Hindu Brahmans. This production is of later origin than the UPANISHADS (which see), but teaches the same religious doctrine and precepts, with various important additions, the whole being divided into eighteen books. The Code was compiled by Manu, the son of Brahma, and other sacred personages—detailing all manner of duties connected with the worship of God, and all the possible relations that can subsist between man and man.

MANUS, a legendary race of monarchs in the system of Hinduism, who lived about 2,000,000,000 of years ago. The first of them came down with his spouse from one of the higher heavens to rule over the earth. The entire line of Manus amounted to fourteen, each of them, with his posterity of sons and grandsons, is supposed to have been invested with the sovereignty of the earth during a MANWANTARA (which see), or a cycle of time.

MANWANTARA, a grand period of time in Hindu chronology, including seventy-one maha-yugs or divine ages, being the reign of one Manu, with his posterity of sons and grandsons. The reigns of the fourteen Manus, who reigned in succession, extended to 1,000 maha-yugs or one Kalpa.

MAPHRIDA, the second dignitary of the JACOBITE CHURCH (which see) in the East.

MARABOUTS, insane persons in Algiers, Morocco, and other countries in the North of Africa, who are reputed saints, and exercise great influence over all classes of the people. Gifts of every kind are heaped upon these foolish impostors. A Marabout performs the duties of a priest, pretends to ward off evil from any one, and to cause misfortune to those with whom he may happen to be offended. He employs himself in manufacturing amulets and charms. He has the privilege of being able to accord sanctuary to any criminal whether innocent or guilty, and even under the ban of sovereign displeasure, who may have succeeded in crossing the threshold of the Marabout's eliosk. The grand Marabout is one of the principal officers at the court of the Dey of Algiers, and presides in matters of religion.

MARAE, the name given in the South Sea Islands to a heathen temple. All were uncovered and resembled oratories rather than temples. They are thus described by Mr. Ellis in his 'Polynesian Researches': "The form of the interior or area of their temples was frequently that of a square or a parallelogram, the sides of which extended forty or fifty feet. Two sides of this space were enclosed by a high stone wall; the front was protected by a low fence; and opposite, a solid pyramidal structure was raised, in front of which the images were kept, and the altars fixed. These piles were often immense. That which formed one side of the square of the large temple in Atebura, according to Mr. Wilson, by whom it was visited when in a state of preservation, was two hundred and seventy feet long, ninety-four wide at the base, and fifty feet high, being at the summit one hundred and eighty feet long, and six wide. A flight of steps led to its summit; the bottom step was six feet high. The outer stones of the pyramid, composed of coral and basalt, were laid with great care, and hewn or squared with immense labour, especially the tiava, or corner stones.

"Within the enclosure, the houses of the priests, and keepers of the idols, were erected. Ruins of temples are found in every situation: on the summit of a hill, as at Maeva, where Tane's temple, nearly one hundred and twenty feet square, enclosed with high walls, is still standing, almost entire; on the extremity of a point of land projecting into the sea; or in the recesses of an extensive and overshadowing grove. The trees growing within the walls, and around the temple, were sacred; these were the tall cypress-like casuarina, the tumani, or callophyllum, miro, or thespesia, and the ton, or cordia. These were, excepting the casuarina-trees, of large foliage and exuberant growth, their interwoven and dark umbrageous branches frequently excluding the rays of the sun; and the contrast between the bright glare of a tropical day, and the sombre gloom in the depths of these groves, was peculiarly striking. The fantastic contortions in the trunks and tortuous branches of the aged trees, the plaintive and moaning sound of the wind passing through the leaves of the casuarina, often resembling the wild notes of the Eolian harp—and the dark walls of the temple, with the grotesque and horrific appearance of the idols—combined to inspire extraordinary emotions of superstitious terror, and to nurture that deep feeling of dread which characterized the worshippers of Tahiti's sanguinary deities."

MARATONIANS. See MACEDONIANS.

MARCELLIANS, the followers of Marcellus, bishop of Ancyra in Galatia, in the fourth century. He had from the beginning keenly opposed the Arians, and warmly supported the Homoousia of the Nicene creed. All subordination of Persons in the Sacred Trinity he believed to be Arianism, and in the course of a work in refutation of the Sophist Asterius, the founder of the Semi-Arian school, he fell into an error approaching to the Sabellian or Samasotenian heresy, that of maintaining the unity of the Son with the Father, losing sight of the personal distinction between them. He was answered not only by Asterius, but by Eusebius of Cæsarea, and Acacius. Eusebius wrote two works against him, and at an assembly of Eusebians held at Constantinople A. D. 336, Marcellus was formally deposed from his bishopric, to make way, as was supposed, for the Semi-Arian Basil. Notwithstanding the suspicion of heresy which now attached to him, the orthodox party defended him for some time, and the council of Sardica acquitted him, and restored him to his see. In course of time his heretical views assumed a more definite shape, so that his friends were compelled to abandon him as a confirmed heretic; and this view of his character was rendered all the more certain by the unshrinking boldness with which his pupil Photinus developed the Marcellian heresy in all its extent, but under a new name derived from himself. (See PHOTINIANS.)

MARCIANISTS. See EUCUTES.

MARCIONITES, a Gnostic sect which arose in the second century, deriving its name from Marcion, a native of Sinope in Pontus, where his father was bishop. From early life he seems to have been animated by an ardent love of Divine truth, and a strong reluctance to submit to human tradition. The tendency in his mind towards an ascetic spirit was seen in the fact, that in the first ardour of Christian love he resolved to renounce every earthly possession, and to give himself up to a course of rigid abstinence, presenting to the church at the same time a sum of two hundred sesteria. He grasped the peculiar doctrines of Christianity, and more especially the fact of redemption, with so firm a hold, and took so absorbing a view of the God of the gospel, that he conceived him to be a Being altogether distinct from the God of nature. From such a train of thinking, he naturally passed to the idea that there was a complete contrariety between the Old Testament and the New. The God of the one was jealous, severe, and inexorable, while the God of the other was only mercy and love. The Messiah of the one had a kingdom, but wholly of this world; the Christ of the other had a kingdom also, but essentially spiritual, and not of this world.

From the character of his mind, Marcion was opposed to the allegorical interpretation of the Bible, which was so prevalent in the early ages of the church; on the contrary, he adhered to the literal meaning, and entertained an earnest desire to restore Christianity once more to its simple and primitive form, by rescuing it from the Jewish element with which it had been confounded. Excommunicated from the church at Sinope, he repaired to Rome, where he hoped to meet with more sympathy in consequence of his strong anti-Judaizing tendencies. His expectations, however, of countenance from the Roman church were disappointed, and he now conceived the design of founding an independent church. He attached himself, accordingly, to a teacher from Antioch in Syria, by name Cerdo, who taught a system of pure Dualism (see CERDONIANS), and to whose instructions he was indebted for a considerable number of his opinions. Though everywhere looked upon as a heretic, he devoted himself throughout his whole life to the active propagation of his peculiar views, not communicating them, as many of the other Gnostic teachers did, to a limited number of followers, but to all Christians with whom he came in contact. It is alleged by Tertullian, that Marcion towards the end of his life repented of the schism to which he had given rise, and sought to be restored to the fellowship of the church—a request which was granted on condition that he should bring back those whom he had seduced from the church; but his premature death prevented the fulfilment of the condition, and thus he died in a state of excommunication.

The doctrines inculcated by Marcion, and held by his followers the Marcionites, were fundamentally the same with the other Gnostics. Three primary principles were laid down as the basis of the entire system: 1. The Hyle, or matter existing from all eternity. 2. God, a Being of infinite perfection, holiness, and love. 3. The Demiurge, the Creator of the world, the God of the Jews, and of the Old Testament, who holds a middle place between good and evil, and is engaged in a constant conflict with matter, seeking to subject it to his will, but meeting with steady resistance. From the ever-resisting matter originated evil, which became concentrated in Satan, the Evil One. The moral operations of the Demiurge are thus developed by Neander: "The Demiurge of Marcion does not work after the pattern of higher ideas, of which, though unconsciously, or even against his will, he is the organ; but he is the absolutely independent, self-subsistent creator of an imperfect world, answering to his own limited essence. To this world Marcion reckoned also the nature of man, in which he did not acknowledge, like other Gnostics, the existence of another element besides. The Demiurge—so he taught—created man, his highest work, after his own image, to represent and reveal himself. Man's body he formed of matter,—hence evil desires; to this body he gave a soul in affinity with himself and derived from his own essence. He gave him a law, to try his obedience, with a view either to reward or to punish him, according to his desert. But the limited Demiurge had it not in his power to give man a god-like principle of life, capable of overcoming evil. Man yielded to the seductions of sinful lust, and thus became subject, with his whole race, to the dominion of matter, and of the evil spirits which sprang out of it. From the entire race of fallen humanity, the Demiurge selected only one people, for his special guidance; to this people, the Jews, he made a special revelation of himself, and gave a religious polity, answering to his own essence and character,—consisting, on the one hand, of a ceremonial confined to externals; on the other, of an imperative deficient system of morals, without any inner godlike life, without power to sanctify the heart, without the spirit of love. Those who faithfully observed this religious law, he rewarded by conveying them at death to a state of happiness suited to their limited natures, in the society of their pious forefathers. But all who suffered themselves to be seduced by the enticements of the Hyle to disobey the Demiurge, and all who abandoned themselves to idolatry—a system to be traced to the influence of this Hyle, he hurled down to perdition."

According to the views of Marcion, Christ was the self-manifestation of the Father, and the human body in which he appeared on earth was not a real but a seeming body. The Christ of the New Testament was wholly distinct from, and even in many respects opposed to, the Messiah of the Old. The true believer in Christ became a partaker, even in this world, of a divine life above the power of the Demiurge and the Hyle, and under the special guidance of the God of love. Such a man Marcion conceived must be an ascetic, seeking to be delivered from all contaminating influence of matter; and if any one was not capable of leading this kind of life, he ought to be kept in the class of catechumens, but in his present state could not be admitted to baptism. He is said to have held the doctrine of vicarious baptism of the living, for catechumens who had died.

With the exception of the epistles of Paul, Marcion rejected the whole New Testament, substituting for the writings of the four Evangelists a pretended original Gospel, which he maintained was the record of the gospel history used by Paul himself, but which probably was nothing more than the Gospel according to Luke, mutilated to suit Marcion's peculiar views. The great aim of this famous Gnostic teacher appears to have been to restore the primitive church, designed by Christ, and founded by the Apostle Paul. Hence in many places he founded communities of his own; to the members of which he prescribed numerous fastings and other austerities, such as abstinence from marriage, wine, flesh, and all that was pleasing to the natural appetite. The followers of Marcion, however, introduced various modifications of his opinions, mingling them up with the doctrines taught by the other Gnostics. Hence arose out of the Marcionite heresy other sects, such as the MARCOSIANS (which see), and APOLLEANS (which see), which differed widely from the original sect.

MARCOSIANS, a sect of Gnostics which sprung up in the second century, having been originated by Marcus, a disciple of Valentinus. (See VALENTINIANS.) Both Irenæus and Epiphanius treat of this sect at great length. Their opinions seem to have been founded chiefly on the Gnostic doctrine of Æons; and according to Irenæus, the knowledge of these Æons, and of the formation of the universe, was derived by a revelation from the primal four in the system of Æons, who appeared to Marcus in the form of a female. The Marcosians seem to have acknowledged the canonical Scriptures, and to have received also many apocryphal books. Neander informs us, that after the Jewish cabalistic method, Marcus hunted after mysteries in the number and positions of the letters. He maintained two kinds of baptism, a psychical baptism in the name of Jesus, the Messiah of the psychical natures, by which believers obtained pardon of sin, and the hope of eternal life in the kingdom of the Demiurge; and pneumatic baptism, in the name of the Christ from heaven united with Jesus, by which the spiritual nature attained to self-consciousness and to perfection, entering into fellowship with the Pleroma. According as the candidate was to be admitted among the psychical or the pneumatical Christians, both the ceremony and the formula of baptism differed. The latter, which was the higher baptism, was conducted with great pomp and rejoicing, the chamber in which the ceremony was performed being adorned as for a marriage. "One baptismal formula for the Pneumatics," Neander says, "ran thus: 'In the name which is hidden from all the divinities and powers (of the Demiurge), the name of truth, which Jesus of Nazareth has put on in the light-zones of Christ, the living Christ, through the Holy Ghost, for the redemption of the angels,—the name by which all things attain to perfection.' The candidate then said, 'I am established and redeemed,—I am redeemed in my soul from this world, and from all that comes from it, by the name of Jehovah, who has redeemed the soul of Jesus by the living Christ.' The whole assembly then said,

'Peace (or salvation) to all on whom this name rests. Next they bestowed on the person baptized the sign of consecration to the priestly office, by anointing with oil, customary also in the church; but the oil in this case was a costly balsam; for the precious, far-spreading fragrance was intended to be a symbol of that transcendent bliss of the Pleroma which had been appointed for the redeemed.'

The Marcosians seem to have been the first who practised the ceremony of extreme unction. The dead were anointed with balsam mingled with water, and a form of prayer was pronounced over them, to the intent that the souls of the departed might rise free from Demiurge, and all his powers, to their mother, the Sophia. This sect used also a mystical table which symbolically represented their system.

MARDAITES. See MARONITES.

MARGARET'S (ST.) DAY, a festival of the Romish church, celebrated on the 21st of February. A festival dedicated to another saint of the same name, who is represented as a virgin and martyr, is celebrated by the Romish church on the 20th of July.

MARGARITES, a word used by the Greek church to denote the small particles of bread which adhere to the chalice or the patin, after consecration, in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. They receive the name of Margarites or Pearls from the transparent appearance which they assume when exposed to the moisture.

MARICA, an ancient Roman goddess worshipped at Minturnæ, and to her a grove was consecrated on the river Liris. She has sometimes been considered as identical with APHRODITE (which see). Hesiod confounds her with Circe. Virgil makes her the wife of Faunus, and the mother of Latinus, an ancient king of Latium.

MARINE DEITIES, gods worshipped by the ancient Greeks and Romans as presiding over the sea. The principal of these was the Poëidon of the Greeks, and Neptune of the Romans, and to him must be added Nereus, Triton, Proteus, the Sirens, Sea-Nymphs, and Achelous.

MARIOLATRY, the worship of the Virgin Mary. In the fourth century, in consequence of the prevalence of the ascetic spirit, the most extravagant opinions began to be entertained of the merit of virginity, and Mary, the mother of our blessed Lord, was venerated as the ideal of the celibate life. About this time an opinion arose that there were in the temple at Jerusalem virgins consecrated to God, among whom Mary grew up in vows of perpetual virginity. In the end of the fourth century, it became customary to apply to Mary the appellation, "Mother of God." Until this time, however, there is no trace of the worship of the Virgin. But the first appearance of Mariolatry was among a small sect of women, who came from Thrace and settled in Arabia, and who, from cakes or wafers which they consecrated to Mary, were called COLLYRIDANS (which see). These were keenly opposed by the HELVIDIANS or ANTIDICA-MARIANITES (which see). But the worshippers of Mary prevailed, and in the fifth century images of the Virgin were placed in the churches holding the infant Jesus in her arms. Once introduced, this species of worship spread rapidly, and Mary became a conspicuous object of veneration in the churches, both of the East and West. Towards the close of the tenth century the custom became prevalent among the Latins, of celebrating masses, and abstaining from flesh on Saturdays, in honour of Mary. About the same time the daily office of St. Mary, which the Latins call the lesser office, was introduced, and it was afterwards confirmed by Pope Urban II. in the council of Clermont. The Rosary also came into use, consisting of fifteen repetitions of the Lord's Prayer, and one hundred salutations of St. Mary; and the Crown of St. Mary, as it was called by the Latins, consisted of six or seven repetitions of the Lord's Prayer, and sixty or seventy salutations according to the age ascribed by different authors to the Holy Virgin.

Mariolatry now became an established doctrine and practice in the church of Rome, and down to the present day has continued to occupy a very conspicuous place in her ritual; while with equal intensity Mary receives the worship of the Oriental church, under the name of Panagia, or all-holy. Adopting the distinction drawn by Thomas Aquinas, Romanists allege that they honour the Virgin, not with Latria, or the worship due to God only, but with a high degree of veneration, which they term Hypodulia, and which occupies an intermediate place between the Latria due to God, and the Dulia due to saints and angels. But even with this qualification it cannot be denied that in Romish books of devotion, prayers to the Virgin occupy a prominent place. Thus, what prayer is in more constant use than the "Ave Maria," or "Hail Mary," which, after quoting a passage from the Salutation of the Angel Gabriel to the Virgin, adds those words, "Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us sinners now, and in the hour of our death, Amen?" Again, in another prayer, the Virgin is thus addressed, "We fly to thy patronage, O Holy Mother of God; despise not our petitions in our necessities, but deliver us from all dangers, O ever glorious and blessed Virgin." The "Salve Regina" runs thus, "Hail! Holy Queen, mother of mercy, our life, our sweetness, and our hope! to thee we cry, poor banished sons of Eve, to thee we send up our sighs, mourning and weeping in this valley of tears; turn, then, most gracious advocate, thy eyes of mercy towards us, and after this our exile is ended, show unto us the blessed fruit of thy womb, Jesus,—O clement! O pious! O sweet Virgin Mary." She is called "Mirror of Justice," "Seat of Wisdom," "Cause of our Joy," "Tower of David," "Ark of the Covenant," "Gate of Heaven," "Morning Star," "Refuge of Sinners," and many other such terms, which plainly shows the very high place which Mary occupies in the devotions of the Romish church. The Romish Breviary, also, of which every priest must read a portion each day in private under pain of mortal sin, uses the following strong language as to the Virgin,—“If the winds of temptation arise, if thou run upon the rocks of tribulation, look to the star, call upon Mary. If thou art tossed upon the waves of pride, of ambition, of detraction, of envy, look to the star, call upon Mary. If anger or avarice, or the temptations of the flesh toss the bark of thy mind, look to Mary. If disturbed with the greatness of thy sins, troubled at the defilement of thy conscience, affrighted at the horrors of the judgment, thou beginnest to be swallowed up in the gulf of sadness, the abyss of despair, think upon Mary—in dangers, in difficulties, in doubts, think upon Mary, invoke Mary.” The Council of Trent declares prayer to the Virgin to be “good and wholesome.” But if we would know how strong is the hold which devotion to the Virgin has taken of the true Romanist, let us listen to the following undisguised avowal of an Italian Jesuit, as made to the Rev. Hobart Seymour, and recorded in his deeply interesting work, ‘Mornings with the Jesuits.’

“The feeling of devotion to the Virgin,” said this bigoted Romanist, “has a mysterious something in it, that will ever linger about the heart of the man who has ever felt it. It is one of those feelings that, once admitted, can never afterwards be totally obliterated. There it still clings around the heart, and though there may be coldness to all other religious impressions,—though there may be infidelity or even scorn upon all our faith,—though there may be the plunging into the wild vortex of every sin, yet still there will not unfrequently be found even among the very worst of our people, a lingering feeling of devotion to the blessed Virgin. It is as a little thread that still keeps hold of the soul, and it will yet draw him back. All else may be broken; but this thread, by which the blessed Virgin holds him, still clings to his soul. Even in the most wild, wicked, and desperate men—even among the bandits in their worst state, there is always retained this devotion to Mary; and when we cannot get at their hearts in any other way—when every other argument or truth or principle or feeling of religion fails to make any impression, we frequently find access opened to their hearts, by this one feeling still lingering about them; and thus we find by experience that a devotion to the blessed Virgin proves often the means by which we are able to lay hold of their hearts, and win them back to our holy religion.”

So enthusiastic, accordingly, have been the votaries of the Blessed Virgin, that Buonaventura has blasphemously applied some of the most sublime, devotional passages in the Psalms, to the Virgin Mary, and St. Liguori goes so far as to say, that “all is subject to Mary, even God himself.” In “The Glories of Mary,” by St. Alphonso de Liguori, who was canonized by the Church of Rome only a few years ago, we find the vision of St. Bernard recorded with approbation, in which he beheld two ladders extending from earth to heaven. At the top of one ladder appeared Jesus Christ. At the top of the other ladder appeared the Virgin Mary. While those who endeavoured to enter into heaven by the way of Christ's ladder, fell constantly back and utterly failed; those, on the other hand, who tried to enter by the ladder of Mary, all succeeded, because she put forth her hands to assist and encourage them.

But it is not necessary to go so far back as Buonaventura, or St. Bernard, or St. Liguori; we may refer to Pope Gregory XVI., who thus speaks in an encyclical letter issued on entering on his office:—"Let us raise our eyes to the most blessed Virgin Mary, who alone destroys heresies, who is our greatest hope, yea, the entire ground of our hope." Nay, the enthusiasm waxing greater as time advances. Dr. Cullen, the archbishop of Dublin, in a pastoral issued a few years ago, breaks forth into the following strains of laudation:—

"Her body, which had been the temple of the Holy Ghost, and given human flesh to the Redeemer, exempted from the lot of the other descendants of Adam, is not condemned to moulder into dust, but united again with her pure soul, is, by the Divine power, translated into heaven, and placed at the right hand of her eternal Son. Here, to use the words of Scripture, she appears 'bright as the morning rising, elect as the sun, beautiful as the moon, terrible as the array of battle.'—(Cant. vi. 9.) 'The angels and saints of heaven, filled with astonishment at the splendour of her majesty, cry out, 'Who is she that cometh up from the desert flowing with charms and delights, leaning upon her beloved?'—(Cant. viii. 5.) With what raptures do all the celestial spirits receive their queen! With what exultation do the patriarchs and prophets, and all the saints, rise up to greet her through whom they received their Redeemer, and to whom they were thus indebted for their glory! Oh, how on this happy occasion the earth itself rejoices! its fruits are no longer the fruits of malediction. 'The land that was desolate and impassable shall be glad,' says the Scripture, 'and the wilderness shall rejoice and shall flourish like the lily. It shall bud forth and blossom, and shall rejoice with joy and praise.'—(Isa. xxx.)"

That the worship of the Virgin is universally practised by Romanists, travellers in Roman Catholic countries universally attest. Churches are built to her honour, while her shrines are crowded with enthusiastic devotees. Her name is the first which the infant is taught to lip, and to her is cast the last look of the dying. The soldier fights under her banner, and the brigand plunders under her protection. In Italy and Spain robbers wear a picture of Mary hung round their neck. If overtaken suddenly by death, they kiss the image and die in peace. Santa Maria, Holy Mary, is the Romish devotee's all in all. One Hail Mary is worth ten Paternosters, and Mr. Seymour tells us that a Romish priest in Italy declared to him his firm belief, that God hears our prayers more quickly when they are offered through the Blessed Virgin than when offered through any one else. It has also been maintained by some Romanists, that the adoration of the Virgin is in accordance with the principles of human nature. Thus Mr. Seymour describes an interview on this subject with a Jesuit priest at Rome: "He stated, that there was a great difference in the bent and habit of mind, between English Protestants on the one hand, and Italian Romanists on the other; that Protestants habitually let their minds dwell on Christ's teaching, on Christ working miracles, and especially on Christ's suffering, bleeding, dying on the cross, so that in a Protestant mind, the great object was Christ in the maturity of his manhood; but that Romanists habitually dwelt on the childhood of Christ; not on the great events that were wrought in maturity and manhood, but on those interesting scenes which were connected with his childhood. He then went on to say that this habit of mind led to the great difference, that as Protestants always dwelt on the suffering and dying Christ, so Christ in a Protestant mind was always connected with the cross: and that as Romanists constantly meditated rather on the childhood of Christ, so Christ in a Romanist's mind was usually associated with his mother, the Virgin Mary. He then continued to say that the constant dwelling of the mind in contemplation of the child, naturally led to more thought, more contemplation, more affection, and finally, more devotion for the mother; that when one thinks of all the little scenes of his childhood, dwells on the little incidents of interest between the child Jesus and the mother Mary, recollects that she had him enshrined in her womb, that she used to lead him by the hand, that she had listened to all his innocent prattle, that she had observed the opening of his mind; and that during all those days of his happy childhood she, and she alone of all the world, knew that that little child whom she bore in her womb, and nursed at her breasts, and fondled in her arms, was her God—that when a man thinks, and habitually thinks of all this, the natural result is, that his affections will be more drawn out, and his feelings of devotion more elevated towards Mary. And he concluded by stating that this habit of mind was becoming more general, and that it was to it that he would attribute the great increase, that late years had witnessed in the devotion to the Virgin Mary."

In accordance, therefore, with the importance attached to the worship of the Virgin in the Church of Rome, we find in its prescribed offices and ritual not only prayers offered to the Almighty in her name, pleading her merits, through her mediation, advocacy, and intercession, but prayers offered directly to herself, beseeching her to employ her intercession with the Eternal Father and with her Son in behalf of her petitioners; and proceeding a step farther, we find prayers to her for her protection from all evils, spiritual and bodily; for her guidance and aid, and for the influences of her grace. In addition to all this, divine praises are ascribed to her in pious acknowledgment of her attributes of power, wisdom, goodness, and mercy, and of her exalted state above all the spirits of life and glory in heaven; and for her share in the redemption of the world, and the benefits conferred by her on the individual worshipper.

In Romish countries the whole month of May is annually devoted to the Virgin, and is called by way of eminence, "Mary's Month." In Paris, for example, a service in her honour is performed with great ceremony every evening throughout the entire month. Temporary altars are raised to her surrounded by flowers and evergreens, and profusely adorned with garlands and drapery, her image usually standing in a conspicuous place before the altar. The chief part in these religious festivities is performed by societies or guilds, which are expressly instituted chiefly for the celebration of the Virgin's praises. A collection of hymns is in regular use by the fraternities in Paris, many of them being addressed directly and exclusively to the Virgin. One of the most remarkable works in praise of Mary is the Psalter of Bonaventura, a Franciscan monk of the thirteenth century. In this work the author so changes the commencement of each of the Psalms of David as to address them all to the Virgin Mary; interspersing in some of them much of his own composition, and then adding the Gloria Patri to each. Appended to Bonaventura's Psalter are various hymns to the Virgin, being alterations of prayers addressed to God in Scripture. The Athanasian Creed is employed in the same manner to declare belief in the divinity of Mary, and in course of this modification of the creed, the assumption of the Virgin into heaven is specified as one of the points to be believed on pain of forfeiting all hopes of salvation.

The works of Bonaventura gave great impulse to the worship of Mary in the Romish church. Others followed in the same strain, among whom may be mentioned Gabriel Biel, a schoolman of great celebrity in the fifteenth century, and Peter Damiani, whose works were published under the authority of the Pope in the beginning of the seventeenth century. At length, to such an extent had the veneration for the Virgin Mary been carried, that able and learned Roman Catholic writers came forward to moderate the extravagancies of their brethren, and to modify and reduce the worship of the Virgin within reasonable bounds. To effect this object, Theophilus Raynaud, a Jesuit of Lyons, produced a work entitled 'Diptycha Mariana,' in which he strongly disapproved of some of the sentiments which had been put forth by preceding writers on the subject, particularly those which ascribed to Mary attributes and acts which properly belong to God the Father, or to Christ the Son. To such an extent, indeed, had the desire been carried of setting aside Jesus, and substituting Mary in his room, that in the sixteenth century the Christian era was made, by some Romish writers, to begin, not from the "birth of Christ," but from "the Virgin Mother of God."

At the present day the worship of the Virgin Mary occupies a conspicuous place in the ritual of the Romish church. The Ave Maria, or Hail Mary, has, since the fifteenth century, been the favourite prayer to the Virgin, and always accompanies the Pater noster in the stated devotions of a Romanist. In the 'Litany of the Blessed Virgin' there are more than forty invocations of the Virgin, designating her by as many varieties of title. The favourite hymn or prayer, called Salve Regina, is addressed exclusively to the Virgin, as is also the hymn Ave Maria Stella, Hail, Mary, star of the sea. St. Alphonsus Liguori, who was canonized by Pope Gregory XVI. in 1839, published a work entitled the 'Glories of Mary,' in which she is extolled far above mortals, and invested with attributes and authority of the highest order. The Most Holy Father, to whom we have just referred, granted in 1840 an indulgence of 100 years to every one who should recite a prayer to the Virgin to this effect, "O immaculate queen of heaven and of angels, I adore you. It is you who have delivered me from hell; it is you from whom I look for all my salvation." Pius IX., in his encyclical letter of date 1846, says, "In order that our most merciful God may the more readily incline his ear to our prayers, and may grant that which we implore, let us ever have recourse to the intercession of the most holy mother of God, the immaculate Virgin Mary, our sweetest mother, our mediatrix, our advocate, our surest hope, and truest reliance, than whose patronage nothing is more potent, nothing more effectual with God." In the allocution of the same 'Most Holy Father,' pronounced in the secret consistory at Gaeta, 1849, he says, "Let us have recourse to the most holy and immaculate Virgin Mary, who, being the mother of God, and our mother, and the mother of mercy, finds what she seeks, and cannot be frustrated." In 1854 his Holiness issued a decree, declaring the immaculate conception of the Virgin to be henceforth an article of faith in the Romish Church, and thus a very important step in advance has been taken towards investing the mother of Jesus with the honours of divinity. She is henceforth to be viewed by every Romanist as taken out of the category of sinful mortals, and ranged among sinless beings.

MARONITE CHURCH (THE), one of the Oriental churches, which fraternizes with Rome. It derives its name either from a Syrian monk named Maro, who lived on the banks of the Orontes about A. D. 400, or from one Marun or Maro, who was their patriarch of Antioch, and flourished about A. D. 700. The Maronites appear to be the descendants of those Syrian Christians who, on the Mohammedan invasion in the seventh century, found an asylum in the mountains of Libanus and Anti-Libanus, whence they frequently sallied forth on predatory incursions to the great annoyance of the Saracens or Arabs. Great numbers of them, so many it is said as 12,000, were seized and carried off as prisoners by Justinian III., the Greek emperor. This proved an effectual check to their marauding propensities. During the Crusades the extent of their territory was much reduced, and by frequent wars with the Ottomans they were diminished in numbers, and at length put under tribute.

The Maronites at an early period of their history seem to have maintained the heresy of the MONOTHELITES (which see), alleging that in the Person of Christ there were two natures and one will. For five centuries the Maronite church held an independent position, but in the twelfth century it was united with the Romish church in the reign of Baldwin IV., and their patriarch was present at the Lateran council held by Pope Innocent III. Though nominally subject to Rome, this Oriental church still retains so much of its original independence, that its patriarch styles himself Peter the patriarch of Antioch, thus claiming to be the spiritual descendant and representative of the Apostle Peter in the East. The fact is, that Rome has had the utmost difficulty in maintaining its authority over the Maronites, both because of their tendency to fall into heresies of different kinds, and also because of their unwillingness to part with their ancient independence. To effect their more complete subjugation to the Papal see, Gregory XIII. founded a college at Rome for the education and training of Maronite missionaries, who might be instrumental in diffusing among their countrymen an ardent attachment to the Romish church. All the schemes devised, however, to bind the Maronite church to the Roman pontiff have been hitherto unsuccessful; for some of them refuse, at this day, to recognize the alliance with the Latin church. To arrange the affairs of the Maronite church, Pope Clement XII. summoned the Great Council of Lebanon, which was held on the 30th of September 1736. It was attended by eighteen bishops, of whom fourteen were Maronites, two Syrian, and two Armenian. The abbots of several monasteries were also present, along with a multitude of the priests and chief people of the country. By the decrees of this council the church of the Maronites is regulated to this day.

The seat of the Maronites is the mountainous district of Lebanon, from about Tripoli to Tyre. The main body of the range called Libanus is inhabited by nearly 240,000 Maronites, calculated, however, by Dr. Wilson, at not more than 150,000. The patriarch of the body is elected by the bishops, who must all be monks, but he receives his robe of investiture from Rome, in acknowledgment of the subjection of his church to the Papal see. He is held in the highest veneration by the people among whom he lives. His income amounts to about £2,000 a-year. His jurisdiction extends over nine metropolitan sees, the occupants of which, chosen by the people, but consecrated by the patriarch, are called Metrans or Metropolitans. The patriarch has two vicars or assistants, one of them connected with the temporal, and the other with the spiritual affairs of the church. He has also an agent at Rome, and three presidents at the principal monasteries or colleges. The agent of the patriarch at Rome reported in 1844, that, exclusive of convents, there were 356 Maronite churches in Syria, to which were attached 1,205 priests, under the authority of their bishops and patriarch. The number of priests, however, was stated by the American missionaries in 1845 at between 700 and 1,000.

Dr. Wilson, in his 'Lands of the Bible,' quotes from a communication of Mr. Graham of Damascus, the following description of the Maronite convents: "In Lebanon the conventual system is in the most vigorous operation. In most other countries these institutions have been on the decline since the era of the Reformation; but on the goodly mountain, fanaticism and superstition, like the power of its vegetation, have been increasing and multiplying with startling luxuriance. . . . Division perverts their councils, and fanaticism stains their conduct, and the heathenish Druze and the superstitious Maronite are hardly distinguishable from each other in the moralities and charities of life. In the extensive district of Kasrawán a Protestant would not be allowed to settle; and, if he could be permitted to pass through it without insult or injury, he might be very thankful. This is the result of the Monastic Institutions, for the peasants are a quiet, tranquil, and industrious race. The whole mountain is filled with convents. Their numbers I do not know; but it must be prodigious. Some of them, like that of the Deir el-Kalla, are very rich, possess the choicest old wines of the country, and the reputation of indulging in the unnatural enormities which brought destruction on the cities of the plain. Many of the monks are totally ignorant, and can neither read nor write. In such circumstances, it may easily be imagined how incompetent their motives, hopes, and fears must be to control, not the vices of our nature only, but its very principles also! Apostolic morality is not sufficient. They aim at the supposed angelic excellency of the celibate, and they fall into pollutions below the level of the brutes."

The Maronite clergy, though connected with Rome, dissent from her regulations in regard to the celibacy of the priesthood, most of them being married men. On this point, accordingly, the Pope has been obliged to make a compromise with them, and to allow them to retain their wives when they happen to have married before taking priest's orders. They are not, however, allowed to marry after having entered into the priesthood, or to remarry should they be deprived of their wives while in the priesthood. In Divine service, the Arabic language is used in reading the Gospels and Epistles, and the Syriac in performing their masses and liturgical services. The parish priests are elected by the people, and ordained by the diocesan bishops or the patriarch. They are not allowed to follow any secular profession. It is no part of their duty to preach, but simply to read the offices. The priests have parsonage houses, but the produce of their glebes is applied to defray the ordinary expenses of their churches. Their income ranges from 2,000 to 9,000 piastres. The unmarried priests are not generally elected to the ministerial charge of parishes, but are usually connected with convents, either as superiors, or in subordinate offices. The Maronites consider preaching to have been one of the peculiar offices of our Saviour, and a preacher is therefore held in the highest respect. Before a priest can venture to undertake the responsible duty of preaching, he must have a written permission from the patriarch or the bishop of the diocese. Occasionally permission is given to laymen to officiate as preachers. The Romish church, unwilling to lose the hold she has got over the Maronites, allows them to retain several customs and observances at variance with her ritual arrangements. A few of these are thus adverted to by Dr. Wilson: "They have been allowed to maintain most of their own customs and observances, however much at variance with those which Rome is usually content to sanction. They are allowed to preserve their own ecclesiastical language, the Syriac, while Rome has shown her partiality for the Latin rite, by bringing it into use wherever practicable. They dispense the communion in both kinds, dipping the bread in wine before its distribution among the people. Though they now observe the Roman calendar, as far as the time of feasts and fasts is concerned, they recognise local saints which have no place in its commemorations. They have retained the custom of the marriage of their clergy previous to their ordination. Though they profess to be zealous partizans of Rome, it dare not so count upon their attachment as to force upon them all that in ordinary circumstances it thinks desirable. In order to secure its present influence over them, it is subjected to an expense of no small magnitude."

The Maronites are an active industrious people, and amid their rocky dwellings they carry forward their agricultural labours with such zeal and success, that ere long the prophecy bids fair to be fulfilled, "Lebanon shall be turned into a fruitful field."

MARRIAGE. The origin and institution of the nuptial contract dates from the creation of man, for no sooner had Adam sprung from the hand of his Creator, than God was pleased to declare, "It is not good for man to be alone," and accordingly he created Eve, and brought her to the man, who said, "This is bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh. Therefore shall a man leave father and mother, and cleave unto his wife: and they twain shall be one flesh." Among the earliest nations, accordingly, we find the marriage relation uniformly held in respect. The Jews, indeed, in Old Testament times, not only regarded the married state as honourable and right, inasmuch as it was a fulfilment of the Divine command, "Be ye fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth," but from the expectation of the advent of the Messiah, which prevailed among them from the earliest period of their nation's history, there was felt to be as it were a sacred obligation resting upon all to marry. Hence it was esteemed the duty of every male who had reached eighteen or twenty years of age to enter into the marriage union, and it was esteemed a reproach in any man to lead a life of celibacy; nay, even it was viewed as a sin, since he might by remaining unmarried frustrate the great promise of the Redeemer, that the seed of the woman should bruise the head of the serpent. Hence among the Jews marriages were usually contracted at an early age, the ordinary period fixed by the Rabbins being eighteen in the case of males, and twelve in the case of females.

Maimonides alleges that marriage was contracted in the time of the patriarchs with little ceremony, but it is plain from various passages of the Books of Moses, that a regular contract was made in the house of the bride's father, before the elders and governors of the place, after which she was conveyed with considerable pomp to the house of her husband. The Jews allege that after her espousals or betrothment she was allowed to remain for a certain period, at least ten months, in her parents' house, that she might make suitable preparations for the marriage ceremony. The wedding was celebrated with a feast of seven days. The bride was adorned on the occasion with as much care and elegance as her station in life permitted, and a nuptial crown was placed upon her head. During the marriage-feast, the bridegroom and his party entertained themselves in one apartment, while the bride and her companions were similarly employed in another. "On the last day," to quote from Dr. Nevin in his 'Biblical Antiquities,' "the bride was conducted to the house of the bridegroom's father. The procession generally set off in the evening, with much ceremony and pomp. The bridegroom was richly clothed with a marriage robe and crown, and the bride was covered with a veil from head to foot. The companions of each attended them with songs and the music of insturments; not in promiscuous assemblage, but each company by itself; while the virgins, according to the custom of the times, were all provided with veils, not indeed so large and thick as that which hung over the bride, but abundantly sufficient to conceal their faces from all around. The way, as they went along, was lighted with numerous torches. In the meantime, another company was waiting at the bridegroom's house, ready, at the first notice of their approach, to go forth and meet them. These seem generally to have been young female relations or friends of the bridegroom's family, called in at this time, by a particular invitation, to grace the occasion with their presence. Adorned with robes of gladness and joy, they went forth with lamps or torches in their hands, and welcomed the procession with the customary salutations. They then joined themselves to the marriage train, and the whole company moved forward to the house. There an entertainment was provided for their reception, and the remainder of the evening was spent in a joyful participation of the marriage supper, with such social merriment as suited the joyous occasion. None were admitted to this entertainment beside the particular number who were selected to attend the wedding; and as the regular and proper time for their entrance into the house was when the bridegroom went in with his bride, the doors were then closed, and no other guest was expected to come in." Such were the ceremonies which attended the celebration of a marriage among the ancient Jews. In the time of Ruth no other ceremony seems to have attended a marriage than the pronouncing of a solemn blessing, by the nearest relations, on the parties, who agreed in their presence to become husband and wife. Thus Boaz merely declared in presence of the elders assembled at the gate of the city, that he had resolved to take the daughter of Naomi to be his wife. "And all the people that were in the gate, and the elders, said, We are witnesses. The Lord make the woman that is come into thine house like Rachel and like Leah, which two did build the house of Israel: and do thou worthily in Ephrath, and be famous in Bethlehem. So Boaz took Ruth, and she was his wife: and when he went in unto her, the Lord gave her conception, and she bare a son."

The marriage ceremony of the modern Jews differs considerably from that of the ancient. It is thus described by Mr. Allen in his 'Modern Judaism': "On the day fixed for the solemnization of the nuptials, the bride and bridegroom are conducted to the place appointed for the celebration of the ceremony. The bride is escorted by women, and the bridegroom by men. The company is generally large, including most or all of their friends and acquaintances. Ten men, at least, must be present; or the marriage is null and void. The chief-rabbi and chassan of the synagogue form part of the company.

"A velvet canopy is brought into the room, and extended on four long poles. The bride and bridegroom are led to their station under this canopy; the bridegroom by two men; and the bride by two women, her face being covered with a veil. These two men and two women are always the parents of the bride and bridegroom, if they happen to be living: otherwise this office is performed by their nearest kindred; a man and his wife for the bride, and another man and his wife for the bridegroom; though the bridegroom is led by the men, and the bride by the women. The parties are placed opposite to each other, and then the person who performs the ceremony, takes a glass of wine in his hand, and says: 'Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe! who createst the fruit of the vine. Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe! who hast sanctified us with thy commandments and hast forbidden us fornication, and hast restrained us from the betrothed, but hast permitted us those who are married to us, by means of the canopy and wedlock. Blessed art thou, O Lord! who sanctifiest Israel.' The bridegroom and bride then drink of the wine; after which the bridegroom takes the ring, and puts it on the bride's finger; saying, 'Behold thou art wedded to me with this ring, according to the law of Moses and Israel.'

"Then the marriage contract is read, which specifies that the bridegroom A. B. agrees to take the bride C. D. as his lawful wife, according to the law of Moses and Israel; and that he will keep, maintain, honour, and cherish her, according to the manner of all the Jews, who honour, keep, maintain, and cherish their wives; and that he will keep her in clothing decently, according to the custom of the world. This instrument also specifies what sum he settles upon her in case of his death; and he obliges his heirs, executors, and administrators, to pay the same to her out of the first produce of his effects.

"After the reading of this instrument, the person performing the ceremony takes another glass of wine, and repeats seven benedictions. Then the bridegroom and bride drink the wine; after which the empty glass is laid on the floor, and the bridegroom, stamping on it, breaks it to pieces. This part of the ceremony is said to be intended as an indication of the frailty of life. Then all the company shout, Good luck to you. The ceremony is followed by a contribution for the poor of the land of Canaan.—The nuptial feast is as sumptuous as the parties can afford, and continues for seven days."

In the early ecclesiastical writers, no account is given of the mode in which marriage was solemnized among the members of the primitive Christian church. It was not until the ninth century, indeed, that the propriety or necessity of marriage being celebrated with religious exercises was recognized by the civil law, but so early as the second century, such religious rites were required by the church. The ceremony appears to have been conducted with the utmost simplicity in these days of primitive Christian ity. The purple fillet with which the hair of unmarried females was bound, was first removed from the head of the bride, and a veil thrown over her person. The pastor then addressed suitable admonitions to the parties, at the close of which they both partook of the communion. This solemn service having been gone through, they were required to join their right hands, when the minister pronounced them to be married persons, and prayed for a blessing upon the union thus formed. The parties were now adorned with garlands of flowers, and walked in procession to their home. The evening was closed with a marriage feast, at which the relatives and friends of the bridegroom and bride were present. The ceremony of crowning the parties, which was the commencement of the whole service, has been already described under the article CROWN (NUPTIAL).

The marriage procession which conducted the bridegroom with great pomp to the house of his future bride, is universal in the East, and is alluded to in the Talmud and in the parable of the Ten Virgins, recorded in Matth. xxv. 1—10. We find a modern illustration of the custom in Messrs. Bonar and McCheyne's Travels in Palestine: "The bridegroom was on his way to the house of the bride. According to custom, he walked in procession through several streets of the town, attended by a numerous body of friends, all in their showy eastern garb. Persons bearing torches went first, the torches being kept in full blaze by a constant supply of ready wood from a receiver, made of wire, fixed on the end of a long pole. Two of the torch-bearers stood close to the bridegroom, so that we had a view of his person. Some were playing upon an instrument not unlike our bagpipe, others were beating drums, and from time to time muskets were fired in honour of the occasion. There was much mirth expressed by the crowd, especially when the procession stood still, which it did every few paces. We thought of the words of John, 'The friend of the bridegroom, which standeth and heareth him, rejoiceth greatly because of the bridegroom's voice.' At length the company arrived at the entrance of the street where the bride resided. Immediately we heard the sound of many female voices, and observed by the light of the torches, a company of veiled bridesmaids, waiting on the balcony to give notice of the coming of the bridegroom. When they caught a sight of the approaching procession, they ran back into the house, making it resound with the cry, 'Halil, halil, halil,' and music both vocal and instrumental commenced within. Thus the bridegroom entered in and the door was shut.' We were left standing in the street without, 'in the outer darkness.' In our Lord's parable, the virgins go forth to meet the bridegroom with lamps in their hands, but here they only waited for his coming. Still we saw the traces of the very scene described by our Lord, and a vivid representation of the way in which Christ shall come and the marriage supper of the Lamb begin."

Among the ancient Greeks marriage was looked upon as an important and even solemn transaction. On the day before the marriage was celebrated, sacrifices or offerings were made to the deities who presided over the marriage relation, particularly to Hera and Artemis. Both bride and bridegroom cut off a portion of their hair, and dedicated it as an offering to one of the gods. On the wedding-day the parties were both of them subjected to careful ablution. Towards evening the bride was conveyed from her father's house to that of the bridegroom in a chariot, accompanied by the bridegroom and a companion chosen by him for the occasion, and usually called the paranymph. Crowds of attendants marched in procession carrying lighted torches, while music, both vocal and instrumental, saluted the bridal train as it moved along. The bride was veiled, and both she and the bridegroom wore chaplets on their heads. As the parties entered the house of the bridegroom, sweetmeats were showered plentifully over their heads, denoting a wish that abundance of good things might ever attend them. The marriage was not celebrated with any special rites, either civil or religious; but when the parties had reached the house of the bridegroom, or of his parents, a nuptial feast was held, at which both women and men were present, seated, however, at separate tables. At the conclusion of the feast, and when the parties had retired to their own apartments the epithalamium or marriage hymn was sung before the door. On the day following the marriage, it was customary for the friends to send presents to the newly married pair.

An ancient Roman marriage differed in various particulars from a marriage among the ancient Greeks. The wedding-day was not fixed without first consulting the auspices. Certain days were avoided as unlucky, especially the Kalends, Nones, and Ides of each month. On the occasion of the marriage, the bride was dressed in a long white robe with a purple fringe, or adorned with ribands, and a girdle was worn round the waist, while a veil of a bright yellow colour was thrown over the head, and shoes of the same colour were worn upon the feet. Her hair was divided on this occasion with the point of a spear. Among the Romans no marriage was celebrated with religious rites except the CONFARREATIO (which see). In the evening of the marriage the bride was conducted to the house of her husband, carrying in her hands a distaff and a spindle with wool. Three boys accompanied her dressed in the prætexta, one bearing a torch before, while the other two walked by her side. The procession was also attended by a large company of the friends both of the bridegroom and the bride. On reaching the house of the bridegroom, the entrance of which was ornamented with flowers, the utmost care was taken that the bride should not strike her foot against the threshold, which would have been an unlucky omen. To prevent this she was carried into the house. Before entering, however, she wound a portion of wool round the door-posts, and anointed them with lard; after which her future husband met her with fire and water, which she was required to touch. She then advanced forward and took her seat upon a sheepskin prepared for the purpose, when the keys of the house were formally presented to her. A marriage feast closed the whole proceedings. On the day following the marriage, or at least on an early day thereafter, sacrifices were offered to the Penates or household gods.

The marriage ceremonies among the ancient Scandinavians were very simple, and chiefly consisted in feasting. "The bridegroom," says Mr. Mallet, "having obtained the maiden's consent, together with that of her parents and guardians, appointed the day; and having assembled his own relations and friends, sent some of them to receive in his name the bride and her portion from her father. The friends were answerable for the charge that was committed to them, and if they abused their trust, the law amerced them in a sum treble to what was paid for murder. The father or guardian of the young woman attended her also to the husband's house, and there gave her into his hands. After this the new married pair sat down to table with their guests, who drank to their healths along with those of the gods and heroes. The bride's friends then took her up and bore her on their shoulders, which was a mark of esteem among the Goths; her father afterwards led her to the nuptial bed, a great number of lights being carried before her; a custom known to the Greeks and Romans, and still in use in some parts of the North. The marriage being consummated, the husband made his wife several presents, such as a pair of oxen for the plough, a harnessed horse, a buckler, together with a lance and a sword. 'This was to signify,' says Tacitus, 'that she ought not to lead an idle and luxurious life, but that she was to be a partaker with him in his labours, and a companion in dangers, which they were to share together in peace and war.' He adds that 'the women, on their parts gave some arms; this was the sacred band of their union, these their mystic rites, and these the deities who presided over their marriage.' The yoked oxen, the caparisoned horse, and the arms, all served to instruct the women how they were to lead their life, and how perhaps it might be terminated. The arms were to be carefully preserved, and being ennobled by the use the husband made of them, were to be consigned as portions for their daughters, and to be handed down to posterity."

In the Greek church the marriage ceremony consists of three parts, the betrothal, the coronation, and the dissolving of the crowns. Hence the ceremony is complicated and protracted. In the course of the service many prayers are offered not only for the married parties, but also for the bridesmaids. Benedictions of great beauty and solemnity are pronounced upon the newly married couple.

The modes of celebrating marriage among modern heathen nations are very different, and some of them very peculiar and deeply interesting. We select a few taken from the accounts of travellers. Among the Japanese a marriage is conducted after this manner: "On the day fixed for the marriage, an intelligent female servant of the second class is sent to the house of the bride to attend her, and the bride's father, having invited all his kinsfolk, entertains them previous to the bride's departure. The bridal party sets out in norimons or litters, the mediator's wife first, then the bride, then the bride's mother, and, finally, her father. The mediator has already preceded them to the bridegroom's house. The bride is dressed in white (white being the colour for mourning among the Japanese), being considered as thenceforward dead to her parents.

"If all the ceremonies are to be observed, there should be stationed, at the right of the entrance to the house of the bridegroom, an old woman, and on the left an old man, each with a mortar containing some rice-cakes. As the bride's norimon reaches the house, they begin to pound their respective mortars, the man saying, 'A thousand years!' the woman, 'Ten thousand!'—allusions to the reputed terms of life of the crane and the tortoise thus invoked for the bride. As the norimon passes between them, the man pours his cakes into the woman's mortar, and both pound together. What is thus pounded is moulded into two cakes, which are put one upon another and receive a conspicuous place in the toko of the room where the marriage is to be celebrated.

"The norimon is met within the passage by the bridegroom, who stands in his dress of ceremony ready to receive it. There is also a woman seated there with a lantern, and several others behind her. It was by the light of this lantern that formerly the groom first saw his bride, and, if dissatisfied with her, exercised his right of putting a stop to the ceremony. The bride, on seeing the bridegroom, reaches to him, through the front window of her norimon, her marmor, which is a small square or oblong bag, containing a small image of metal, used as an amulet, and he hands it to a female servant, who takes it into the apartment prepared for the wedding, and hangs it up. The bride is also led to her apartment, the woman with the lantern preceding.

"The marriage being now about to take place, the bride is led, by one of her waiting women, into the room where it is to be celebrated, and is seated there with two female attendants on either side. The bridegroom then leaves his room and comes into this apartment. No other persons are present except the mediator and his wife. The formality of the marriage consists in drinking saki after a particular manner. The saki is poured out by two young girls, one of whom is called the male butterfly, and the other the female butterfly,—appellations derived from their susu, or saki-jugs, each of which is adorned with a paper butterfly. As these insects always fly about in pairs, it is intended to intimate that so the husband and wife ought to be continually together. The male butterfly always pours out the saki to be drunk, but, before doing so, turns a little to the left, when the female butterfly pours from her jug a little saki into the jug of the other, who then proceeds to pour out for the ceremony. For drinking it, three bowls are used, placed on a tray or waiter, one within the other. The bride takes the uppermost, holds it in both hands, while some saki is poured into it, sips a little, three several times, and then hands it to the groom. He drinks three times in like manner, puts the bowl under the third, takes the second, hands it to be filled, drinks out of it three times, and passes it to the bride. She drinks three times, puts the second bowl under the first, takes the third, holds it to be filled, drinks three times, and then hands it to the groom, who does the same, and afterwards puts this bowl under the first. This ceremony constitutes the marriage. The bride's parents, who meanwhile were in another room, being informed that this ceremony is over, come in, as do the bridegroom's parents and brothers, and seat themselves in a certain order. The saki, with other refreshments interspersed, is then served by the two butterflies, to these relations of the married parties in a prescribed order, indicated by the mediator; the two families, by this ceremony, extending, as it were, to each other the alliance already contracted between the bride and bridegroom."

Mr. Ellis gives an interesting account of the marriage ceremony in Madagascar: "When the preliminaries are determined, and the time fixed, viz., a good or lucky day, according to the sikidy or diviner, the relatives of the bride and bridegroom meet at the houses of the parents of the respective parties. All are attired in their best apparel, and decorated with their gayest ornaments. At the appointed hour, the relatives or friends of the bridegroom accompany him to the house of the bride. These pay or receive the dowry, which being settled, he is welcomed by the bride as her future husband; they eat together, are recognized by the senior members of the family as husband and wife; a benediction is pronounced upon them, and a prayer offered to God, that they may have a numerous offspring, abundance of cattle, many slaves, great wealth, and increase the honour of their respective families. They then repair to the house of the parents or friends of the bridegroom, and again eat together, when similar benedictions are pronounced by the senior members of the family, or the head man of the village, who is usually invited to the ceremony. The nuptial bond is, in some instances, now regarded as complete: general feasting ensues, after which the parties return to their respective homes, and the newly married couple to the residence prepared for them. But if, as is generally the case, the houses in which the parties have met is below the hill on which their village is built, the bride is placed on a sort of chair, under a canopy, and borne on men's shoulders up the sides of the hill to the centre of the village. Occasionally the bridegroom is carried in the same manner. The relatives and friends of the parties follow the procession, clapping their hands, and singing, as the bearers ascend. On reaching the village, they halt at what is called the parent-house, or residence of the officer of the government; a hashina, or piece of money, is given to the attending officer, for the sovereign, the receiving of which is considered a legal official ratification of the engagement, as the marriage cannot afterwards be annulled, except by a legal act of divorce in the presence of witnesses. No ring, or other emblem of the married state, is used on such occasions, or worn afterwards; nor is there any badge by which the married may be distinguished from the unmarried women in Madagascar, when their husbands are at home; but during the absence of their husbands, especially in the service of government, a necklace, of silver rings, or beads, or braided hair, is worn, to denote that they are married, and that consequently their persons are sacred. Thus the wives of the officers composing the late embassy to England were distinguished during the absence of their husbands."

Turning to the South Sea Islands, we find the following description given of a marriage in that quarter of the world by Mr. Williams in his Missionary Researches: "A group of women seated under the shade of a noble tree which stood at a short distance from the house, chaunted, in a pleasing and lively air, the heroic deeds of the old chieftain and his ancestors; and opposite to them, beneath the spreading branches of a bread-fruit tree, sat the newly purchased bride, a tall and beautiful young woman, about eighteen years of age. Her dress was a fine mat, fastened round the waist, reaching nearly to her ankles; while a wreath of leaves and flowers, ingeniously and tastefully entwined, decorated her brow. The upper part of her person was anointed with sweet-scented cocoa nut oil, and tinged partially with a rouge prepared from the turmeric root, and round her neck were two rows of large blue beads. Her whole deportment was pleasingly modest. While listening to the chaunters, and looking upon the novel scene before us, our attention was attracted by another company of women, who were following each other in single file, and chaunting as they came the praises of their chief. Sitting down with the company who had preceded them, they united in one general chorus, which appeared to be a recital of the valorous deeds of Malietoa and his progenitors. This ended, a dance in honour of the marriage was commenced, which was considered one of their grandest exhibitions, and held in high estimation by the people. The performers were four young women, all daughters of chiefs of the highest rank, who took their stations at right angles on the fine mats with which the dancing-house was spread for the occasion, and then interchanged positions with slow and graceful movements both of their hands and feet, while the bride recited some of the mighty doings of her forefathers. To the motions of the dancers, and to the recital of the bride, three or four elderly women were beating time upon the mat with short sticks, and occasionally joining in chorus with the recitative. We saw nothing in the performance worthy of admiration, except the absence of every thing indecorous—a rare omission in heathen amusements. We were informed that most of the wives of the principal chiefs were purchased; and that if a sufficient price is paid to the relatives, the young woman seldom refuses to go, though the purchaser be ever so old, and unlovely."

Hindu marriages are conducted with great pomp, and often at an enormous expense. "It often happens that a parent will expend his whole fortune upon a marriage entertainment, and pass the rest of his days in the most pitiable destitution. The nuptial ceremonies continue many days. On the third day the astrologer consults the zodiac, and pointing out to the married party a small star in the constellation of Ursa Major, near the tail, directs them to offer their devotions to it, declaring it to be Arundhati, wife of one of the seven rishis, or penitents. The wedding dinner is invariably furnished with an immense number of guests, and if the entertainers be rich, is always extremely magnificent. Upon this occasion only, the bride sits down to partake with her husband of the luxuries provided; indeed, both eat out of the same plates. This, however, is the only time in her life that the wife is allowed such a privilege; henceforward she never sits down to a meal with her husband. Even at the nuptial feast, she eats what he leaves, unless she be too much of an infant to be sensible of the honour to which she has been exalted. Upon the last days of the festival, the bridegroom offers the sacrifice of the Homan, the bride throwing parched, instead of boiled rice into the fire. This is the only instance in which a woman takes part in that sacrifice, considered by the Hindoos the most sacred of all except that of the Yajna. These ceremonies being concluded, a procession is made through the streets of the town or village. It commonly takes place at night, the streets being brilliantly illuminated with innumerable torches, which gleam through the darkness with a dazzling but unnatural glare. The new-married pair are seated in the same palanquin facing each other. They are magnificently arrayed in brocaded stuffs, and adorned with jewels presented to them by the fathers of each, and if their fathers are unable to do this, the gems are borrowed for the occasion. Before the palanquin marches a band of musicians, who drown every other sound in the braying of horns, the clamour of drums, pipes, and cymbals. As the procession moves onward, the friends and relatives of the bride and bridegroom come out of their houses to express their congratulations as they pass, offering them various presents, for which, however, they expect a more than adequate return."

The marriages of the Chinese are, like those of the Hindus, celebrated at great expense. The bride, locked up in a red quilt sedan, borne by four men, and sometimes followed by an immense train gaily dressed, with music, banners, and other paraphernalia, is carried by night to the house of the bridegroom. Here the parties pledge each other in a cup of wine, and together worship the ancestral tablets, besides sometimes prostrating themselves before the parents of the bridegroom.

MARROW CONTROVERSY, a dispute which arose in the Church of Scotland in the beginning of the eighteenth century, caused by the re-publication of a book called the 'Marrow of Modern Divinity.' The book here referred to had been originally published in 1646, with the view of explaining and establishing the perfect freeness of the gospel salvation; of leading the sinner to come to the Saviour, all guilty, polluted, and undone as he is, and to embrace without hesitation the offered mercy. The author of the 'Marrow' was an Englishman, named Mr. Edward Fisher, who had been educated in the University of Oxford. To prevent the first part of the book from being misunderstood or perverted, a second part was added showing the Christian uses of the Law, and steering a middle course between the Antinomians on the one hand, and the Neonomians on the other. A copy of this production having been accidentally carried to Scotland in the knapsack of an old soldier, fell into the hands of Mr. Thomas Boston, then minister of Simprin, who acknowledged himself deeply indebted to it for clear views of Divine truth. The prevailing tone of theology in Scotland at that time was lamentably lax, and even semi-Arminian in its character. Amid the darkness, however, which covered almost the whole church and country, there were a few pious and devoted ministers of Christ, who sighed and prayed for a revival of the Lord's work in the land. Among these men of God was Mr. James Hog, minister at Carnock, who, anxious to diffuse a purer theology, issued an edition of the 'Marrow' in 1717, with a recommendatory preface. Immediately on its publication in Scotland, the book was assailed from various quarters as being unsound in doctrine, and Mr. Hog found it necessary to send forth two different pamphlets on the subject, the one, a 'Vindication of the Doctrine of Grace from the charge of Licentiousness;' the other, an 'Explication of the Passages excepted against in the Marrow;' both of which appeared early in the year 1719.

The Scottish pulpits now resounded with denunciations of the 'Marrow' and its doctrines. Among others, Principal Hadow of St. Andrews, in a sermon preached before the synod of Fife, and afterwards published at their request, attacked the 'Marrow' as a book fraught with the most odious Antinomianism. In addition to this sermon, Hadow soon after published a pamphlet, which he styled, 'The Antinomianism of the Marrow detected.' A host of polemical pieces on both sides of the question now appeared in rapid succession, and for four years the Marrow Controversy raged in Scotland with unabated violence and fury. The numerous misrepresentations of the doctrines of the 'Marrow' which were given to the public by its opponents, led to the publication in the course of a few years of another edition of the book with copious and very valuable explanatory notes from the able pen of Thomas Boston of Ettrick.

The controversy was not long limited to the general public; it soon found its way into the General Assembly. That Court in 1719 issued instructions to its Commission to inquire into the publishing and spreading of books and pamphlets tending to the diffusion of doctrines contrary to the Westminster Confession of Faith. The Commission, accordingly, at its first meeting, proceeded to take action in the matter by appointing a Committee, under the imposing name of "The Committee for Purity of Doctrine," and to ripen the affair for the Assembly, several avowed supporters of the Marrow doctrines were summoned before this Committee in April 1720, and subjected to a series of searching questions in regard to the obnoxious book. An overture was now prepared with great care and introduced into the General Assembly in May, condemning the 'Marrow' under five different heads: (1.) The nature of faith, under which the charge is that assurance is made to be of the essence of faith. (2.) Universal atonement and pardon. (3.) Holiness not necessary to salvation. (4.) Fear of punishment and hope of reward not allowed to be motives of a believer's obedience. (5.) That the believer is not under the Law as a rule of life. These alleged charges were supported by a number of passages selected from the 'Marrow.' The subject was discussed at some length by the Assembly, and the deliverance of the Court was, that the said passages and quotations are contrary to the Holy Scriptures, and our Confession of Faith and Catechisms. "And therefore the General Assembly do hereby prohibit and discharge all the ministers of this church, either by preaching, writing, or printing, to recommend the said book, or in discourse to say anything in favour of it." "This decision," says Dr. McCrie, "which seems to have been hastily adopted, without any due examination of the book, under a vague alarm, excited by certain paradoxical expressions taken apart from their connection and exhibited in the most odious light, gave great offence in different quarters of the church. A representation prepared by Ebenezer Erskine, and signed by twelve ministers, remonstrating against the decision as injurious to various points of evangelical truth, was presented at next meeting of Assembly. The 'Purity of Doctrine' committee, on the other hand, 'turned the cannon against them,' by preparing 'twelve queries,' which, as if they had taken aim at each of them separately, they directed against the 'twelve Representatives.' The controversy thus assumed the strange aspect of two parties charging each other respectively with defection from the truth, each equally confident of being supported by Scripture and the standards of the church. So far as the orthodoxy of the 'Marrow' was concerned, the Representatives were less careful to vindicate the book than to uphold those precious truths which had been endangered by its condemnation. The 'Purity of Doctrine' men seized on certain phrases, which they insisted should be 'sensed' according to other parts of the book; while the Representatives, condemning the sentiment as thus 'sensed,' maintained that no such propositions were to be really found in the book. But on the doctrines evolved by the queries, the Representatives boldly took their stand; and in their answers, which are drawn up with great ability and precision, they unquestionably succeeded in demonstrating that the Assembly had, unwittingly on the part of many, given their sanction to some very grave errors in Christian doctrine."

In 1722, the General Assembly brought the matter judicially to a conclusion, by condemning the Representation, and ordering the Representatives to be rebuked and admonished at their bar, which was done by the Moderator; whereupon the Representatives tendered a solemn protest, which, though refused by the Assembly, was afterwards published. In this document they protested against the Act 1720 condemning the 'Marrow,' as contrary to the Word of God, and the standards of the church, and our covenants, and declared that "it shall be lawful to us to profess, preach, and bear testimony unto the truths condemned by the said Acts of Assembly, notwithstanding of the said Acts, or whatsoever shall follow thereupon." This being a protest against a decision of the Supreme Court, might have subjected all the parties signing it to severe ecclesiastical censure, if not to summary deposition, but such a sentence was averted by the earnest solicitations of government, and "had not this influence been exerted," says the elder McCrie, "there is reason to think that the sentence would have been more severe, and in that case the Secession would have taken place ten years earlier than it actually happened." That this unhappy controversy paved the way for the Secession of 1733, there cannot be the shadow of a doubt. The attachment of multitudes of the Christian people to the Church of Scotland was seriously shaken, and the fact was too obvious to be denied that the evangelical purity of doctrine which characterized her standards, was far from characterizing the teaching of the great majority of her ministers. All whose doctrines savoured of the 'Marrow' were looked upon with suspicion, and the Representatives in particular were subjected to annoyance in various ways by their respective synods and pre-byteries.

The Marrow Controversy was not long limited to Scotland; in a short time it was transferred to England. The views of the Marrowmen were embraced by Mr. Hervey, particularly on the subject of the appropriating assurance of faith, and not only did he give expression to his sentiments in his well-known 'Theron and Aspasio,' but he spoke of the 'Marrow' in terms of the highest eulogium. His writings were assailed with great bitterness and severity by Mr. Robert Sandeman, who gave rise to the sect known by the name of SANDEMANIANS (which see). Thus commenced a controversy which lasted for a long time, and extended even to America. The theology of the Marrow-Men in its characteristic features is thus ably delineated by the younger M'Crie: "Its leading principles may be comprised in two words—full atonement and free salvation. On these two pillars, like the Jachin and Boaz of the ancient temple, was the whole fabric built and upheld. In their system, the atonement of the Saviour stood forth in all its plenitude, as a complete satisfaction given by the Surety of sinners in their room, securing pardon and life for all whom he represented. They did not consider it necessary to abridge its virtues and merits, in order to extend them to all men, or to furnish ministers with a warrant to offer them to all. They found their warrant to do so in the offers of the gospel; nor did they deem it essential to find out a warrant for God to justify him in making these offers. They saw no inconsistency in preaching a full Christ, as well as a free Christ to mankind at large, and sinners of all kinds; for they found this already done to their hand by Christ himself and his apostles. Some members of his synod having denied that there was any gift of Christ as a Saviour to sinners of mankind, Ebenezer Erskine rose, and with a tone and manner which made a deep impression, said, 'Moderator, our Lord Jesus said of himself, "My Father giveth you the true bread from heaven;" this he uttered to a promiscuous multitude, and let me see the man who dare say he was wrong.' Much did they delight in pointing the believer to the special love of Christ in dying for his own; but equally careful were they to point the sinner to the death itself, as the proper and only object of saving faith. To the believer they said, Think on the love of the Saviour, fixed upon you from all eternity, shedding his blood for you, drawing you to himself, and fitting you for the kingdom he hath purchased for you. To the sinner they said, Look not to the secret purposes of God, or to the intention of the priest in offering himself, but look to the sacrifice offered, which is sufficient for all. We do not say, 'Christ died for thee,' this would imply a knowledge of the secret purposes of the Most High, and secret things belong not to us; but we may say, 'Christ is dead for thee,' that is, he is exhibited as crucified and slain for thee—for thy benefit, for thee to look to for salvation, as the serpent was lifted up for the wounded Israelite to look to for healing,—for thee to flee to, as the city of refuge was appointed for the manslayer to flee to for safety."

MARS, a deity held in the highest estimation among the ancient Romans. He was identified at an early period as the god of war, with the Greek Ares (which see). He was one of the three tutelary divinities of Rome, and had a temple dedicated to his worship on the Quirinal Hill, whence he received the surname of Quirinus. As the deity presiding over war, females were not allowed to engage in his worship. He is usually represented with a fierce aspect, clothed in armour, and brandishing a spear in his right hand. He sits in a chariot, drawn by two horses. The Romans were wont to boast that they were descended from this warlike deity; Romulus, the founder of their kingdom, being the son of Mars by the goddess Rhea. Besides the temple inside the city dedicated to Mars Quirinus, they had one outside the city to Mars Gradivus. That portion of the city also which was set apart for athletic games and martial exercises, was named from this god Campus Martius. Not only, however, was Mars considered as patronizing war, but also the peaceful art of agriculture, and in this character he received the name of Silvanus. The wolf and the horse among animals, and the woodpecker among birds, were accounted sacred to Mars.

MARTIN'S (St.) DAY, a festival observed in the Romish church on the 30th of January.

MARTINISTS, a sect of Russian Dissenters, which arose in the beginning of the present century. It derived its name from the Chevalier St. Martin, a native of France, who, while infidel philosophy was exercising almost undisputed sway over the public mind of that country, set himself with his whole heart and soul to diffuse the doctrines of a pure practical Christianity, though undoubtedly tinged with a considerable admixture of mysticism. To spread his principles the more widely, he made use of the masonic lodges, but met with comparatively little success in France, except in the lodges of Lyons and Montpellier. The doctrines of St. Martin were imported into Russia by Count Grabianka, a Pole, and Admiral Plescheyeff, a Russian, both of whom were successful in introducing them into the masonic lodges in that country, where they soon met with very wide acceptance. The Martinists at length became a numerous sect, including in the list of their members some names of rank and influence. The favourite authors, whose writings they chiefly consulted, were, besides St. Martin himself, those of the German Pietistic school, such as Arndt and Spener. But the object of the sect was not so much to cultivate a speculative as a practical Christianity, by seeking to do good to all within the sphere of their influence, not only performing deeds of charity to the poor, but promoting, as far as possible, the progress of education and literature. The principal seat of the Martinists was the city of Moscow, where they established a typographic society for the encouragement of learning; and to accomplish this important object, they purchased all the manuscripts, whether in prose or poetry, which were offered to them, publishing, however, only such as appeared worthy of seeing the light. Their countenance was chiefly given to those writings which had a religious or moral tendency. Many of the works published by this society were translations from foreign languages, but some very valuable original works, literary, scientific, and religious, were issued with their sanction. They established also a large library, chiefly consisting of religious books, to which all were admitted who were sincerely desirous of acquiring information. A school was founded at their expense, and deserving young men were assisted in carrying forward their studies either in the country or at foreign universities. To the seasonable aid thus afforded, Karamsin, the talented Russian historian, was indebted for his education at the university of Moscow. Many of the Martinists, unable to contribute money in order to carry out the plans of the society, devoted their time and talents to works of benevolence, and more especially to the alleviation of human suffering. Some of this noble class of men sacrificed large fortunes, and even submitted to great privations, in order to fulfil the designs of this charitable and useful institution.

The Martinists became in process of time a numerous and highly respected body of men, and their influence was daily diffusing itself more and more widely among the Russian people. Men of all ranks, both in church and state, hastened to join the lodges of this noble band of Free Masons, which bade fair, had it been permitted to continue its operations, to be eminently instrumental in promoting the cause of Christianity and true civilization throughout the whole Russian Empire. But the rapidly increasing fame and influence of this noble sect, and more especially of their typographic society at Moscow, which was working wonders by means of the press, awakened suspicions and jealousies in the mind of the Empress Catharine II. She resolved, therefore, to put forth her utmost efforts to crush the sect. Novikoff, one of its leading and most active members, was imprisoned in the castle of Schlusselburg; several of the nobles who belonged to it were banished to their estates, and several religious books which it had issued were seized and burnt, as being subversive of the good order of the country. At the death of Catharine, the Emperor Paul, who succeeded her on the throne of Russia, liberated Novikoff, whose tragic story is thus briefly told by Count Krasinski: "He recovered his liberty, but found a desolate home: his wife was dead, and his three young children were a prey to a terrible and incurable disease. The Emperor Paul, whose mad outbursts of despotism were the result of a mind diseased by a keen sense of wrongs inflicted upon him by his own mother, but whose natural character was noble and chivalrous, demanded of Novikoff, when he was presented to him on his liberation from the fortress, how he might compensate the injustice that had been done to him, and the sufferings to which he had been exposed. 'By rendering liberty to all those who were imprisoned at the same time when I was,' was Novikoff's answer."

The labours of the Martinists as a body were completely checked by the persecution which they had suffered under Catharine, and they contented themselves, during the reign of Paul, with quietly propagating their opinions in their individual capacity. Under Alexander I., however, who was somewhat inclined towards religious mysticism, the Martinists recovered for a time their influence in Russia, and Prince Galitzin, one of their number, was intrusted by the emperor with the ministry of religious affairs and public education. The imperial councils were now guided by men of piety and of patriotism. Bible Societies were openly promoted by the government, and religious works published with the sanction of the emperor. But matters completely changed on the death of Alexander. His brother, Nicholas, who succeeded him, adopted a different line of acting. He suppressed Bible Societies, discouraged the progress of liberal and religious tendencies, and by his whole course of policy he put an effectual check upon all the operations of the Martinists, and led to the total disappearance, from the face of Russian society, of a sect or body of men, of whom any civilized country might well be proud.

MARTINMAS, a festival formerly observed on the 11th of November, in honour of St. Martin, Bishop of Tours in France, who died A. D. 400.

MARTYRARI. See OSTIARI.

MARTYRIA, a name given in the ancient Christian church to those churches which were built over the graves of martyrs, or built in memory of these witnesses to the truth.

MARTYRS (FEAST OF ALL THE). See ALL SAINTS' DAY.

MARTYRS (FESTIVALS OF THE). See ANNIVERSARIES, BIRTHDAY.

MARTYRS (WORSHIP OF). This kind of worship did not fully develop itself until the fourth century. At an early period these confessors of the truth were held in great respect among Christians, and special festivals were celebrated on the anniversary of their martyrdom. Each successive generation, as it removed from the times in which these holy men lived and suffered, cherished their memory with ever-increasing regard, and approached their tombs with almost idolatrous veneration. Animated by such feelings, men naturally began to show respect to their bones or mangled remains, as the dust of heroes who had died for the cause of Christ. These natural and innocent feelings, however, soon passed into superstitious reverence; and in course of time religious homage was paid to the martyrs as men, who, by their holy character and heroic deeds, had earned a title to the homage and the adoration of the Christian church. "The more remote," says Gieseler, "the times of the martyrs, the greater the adoration paid to them. The heathen converts, naturally enough, transferred to them the honours they had been used to pay their demigods, while the horror of creature-worship, which had hitherto operated as a check on the growing superstition, had been gradually dying away since the extinction of paganism. As men had long been accustomed to assemble for public worship at the graves of the martyrs, the idea of erecting churches over them would readily occur. In Egypt the Christians began to embalm the bodies of reputed saints, and keep them in their houses. The communion with the martyrs being thus associated with the presence of their material remains, these were dug up from the graves and placed in the churches, especially under the altars; and the popular feeling, having now a visible object to excite it, became more extravagant and superstitious than ever. The old opinion of the efficacy of their intercession who had died a martyr's death, was now united with the belief that it was possible to communicate with them directly—a belief founded partly on the popular notion that departed souls always lingered around the bodies they had once inhabited, and partly on the views entertained of the glorified state of the martyrs, a sort of omnipresence being ascribed to them. These notions may be traced to Origen, and his followers were the first who apostrophized the martyrs in their sermons, and besought their intercession. But though the orators were somewhat extravagant in this respect, they were far outdone by the poets, who soon took up this theme, and could find no expressions strong enough to describe the power and the glory of the martyrs. Their relics soon began to work miracles, and to be valuable articles of trade. In proportion as men felt the need of such intercession, they sought to increase the number of their intercessors. Not only those who, on account of services rendered the church, were inscribed in the Diptycha, but the pious characters from the Old Testament, and the most distinguished of the monks, were ranked among the saints. Martyrs before unknown announced themselves in visions, others revealed the place of their burial. From the beginning of the fifth century the prayers for the saints were discontinued as unbefitting their glorified state. Christians were now but seldom called upon to address their prayers to God, the usual mode being to pray only to some saint for his intercession. With this worship of the saints were joined many of the customs of the heathen. Men chose their patron saints, and dedicated churches to their worship. The heathen, whom the Christians used to reproach with worshipping dead men, found now ample opportunity of retort."

This tendency to excessive veneration for the martyrs began to display itself at an early period, for we find Tertullian, when a Montanist, contending against the superstitious practice, and Cyprian condemning it as a heathenish custom.

MARUTA (ST.), LITURGY OF, one of the twelve Liturgies contained in the Missal of the Maronites, published at Rome in 1592.

MARUTS, ancient Hindu deities mentioned in the Vedas. They were personifications of the winds, and represented as attendants upon Indra. Sometimes the "soma wine" and sacrificial food are presented to Indra alone, but at other times to Indra and the Maruts conjointly.

MASORA. Immediately after the destruction of the city and temple of Jerusalem by the Romans, the Great Council of the Israelitish Rabbins was established at Tiberias in Palestine. This celebrated school of learned Jews undertook the important task of revising the sacred text, and issuing an accurate edition of it. For this purpose they collected together all the critical remarks which had been made by different Rabbins upon the Hebrew Bible at different times, digesting, arranging, and adding to them with a view to fix the reading and interpretation of the sacred books. This collection is called Masora, which signifies Tradition, while the Rabbins themselves give it the name of Pirke Aroth, which means Fence or Hedge of the Law. It was probably executed gradually, and accordingly, though it was commenced sometime before the Talmud, it was not finished till a long time after.

The Masora consists of critical remarks upon the verses, words, letters, and vowel-points of the Hebrew Text; and though the preparation of such a work undoubtedly involved much learned and laborious trifling, it was a contribution of some value to the cause of sacred literature. The Masorites were the first who distinguished the books and sections of books into verses; and to prevent interpolation or omission on the part of transcribers, they carefully numbered the verses of each book and section, placing the exact amount at the end of each in numeral letters, or in some symbolical word formed out of them. Not contented with these labours, which did immense service to the cause of Biblical criticism, and more especially to the preservation of the integrity of the Hebrew Text, the compilers of the Masora went still further, counting the number of words and letters in each verse, and marking the middle verse in each book, noting the verses where they supposed any omission was made, the words which they believed to be changed, the letters which they thought superfluous, the cases in which the same verses were repeated, the different readings of the words which are redundant or defective, the number of times that the same word is found at the beginning, middle, or end of a verse, the different significations of the same word, the agreement or conjunction of one word with another, what letters are pronounced, what are inverted, and what hang perpendicularly, marking the exact number of each. They also reckoned which is the middle letter of the Pentateuch, which is the middle clause of each book, and how many times each letter of the alphabet occurs throughout the Hebrew Bible.

The Masora is written in Chaldee, and is usually divided into Great and Small. The Great is partly on the top and bottom of the margins of the text; and sometimes in the margin underneath the commentaries, while anything which had been omitted was added at the end of the text, and was called the final Masora. The Small Masora is written upon the inner margin, or sometimes on the outer margin of the Bible. It is an abridgment of the Great Masora written in small characters. In some copies of the Hebrew Bible with the Masoretic notes, the transcribers have formed the marginal lines of the Masora into various fanciful devices, as of birds, beasts, and other objects.

The precise date when the Masora was composed cannot now be ascertained, but the most generally received opinion is, that the Masorites lived about the fourth or fifth century. Bishop Walton attributes the preparation of the work to a succession of grammarians extending through several centuries. "They lived at different periods," he says, "from the time of Ezra to about the year of Christ 1030, when the two famous Rabbins, Ben Asher and Ben Naphtali flourished; since whose time little more has been done than to copy after them, without making any more corrections, or Masoretical criticisms." Aben Ezra supposes the Masorites to have been the inventors of the Hebrew vowels or accents; others again trace the invention back as far as the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity.

MASS, the service observed in the Romish church in the celebration of the eucharist. Dr. Chaloner, in the 'Catholic Christian Instructed,' says, that it "consists in the consecration of the bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ, and the offering up of this same body and blood to God, by the ministry of the priest, for a perpetual memorial of Christ's sacrifice upon the cross, and a continuation of the same until the end of the world." Considerable difference of opinion exists as to the origin and derivation of the word. Some consider it as a corruption of the Hebrew word missach, which signifies "a voluntary offering;" others derive it from missio or missa, alluding to the dismissal of the catechumens and congregation generally, before the Lord's Supper was dispensed in the early Christian Church. The officiating minister, at this part of the service, pronounced the words "Ite, missa est," and immediately the catechumens and others dispersed, the faithful or members of the church alone remaining. Hence it is alleged the eucharistic service came to be denominated Missa or the Mass.

To understand what is meant by the Romish doctrine of the sacrifice of the Mass, it must be borne in mind, that the canons of the Council of Trent explicitly declare, "If any one shall say, that a true and proper sacrifice is not offered to God in the mass; or that what is to be offered is nothing else than giving Christ to us to eat; let him be accursed. If any one shall say that the mass is only a service of praise and thanksgiving, or a bare commemoration of the sacrifice made on the cross, and not a propitiatory offering; or that it only benefits him who receives it, and ought not to be offered for the living and the dead, for sins, punishments, satisfactions, and other necessities; let him be accursed." The Catechism of the Council of Trent, published by command of Pope Pius V., is equally explicit on the same subject: "We confess that the sacrifice of the mass is one and the same sacrifice with that upon the cross: the victim is one and the same, Christ Jesus, who offered himself, once only, a bloody sacrifice on the altar of the cross. The bloody and unbloody victim is still one and the same, and the oblation of the cross is daily renewed in the eucharistic sacrifice, in obedience to the command of our Lord, 'This do for a commemoration of me.' The priest is also the same Christ our Lord: the ministers who offer this sacrifice consecrate the holy mysteries not in their own but in the person of Christ. This the words of consecration declare: the priest does not say, 'This is the body of Christ,' but, 'This is my body;' and thus invested with the character of Christ, he changes the substance of the bread and wine, into the substance of his real body and blood. That the holy sacrifice of the mass, therefore, is not only a sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving, or a commemoration of the sacrifice of the cross, but also a sacrifice of propitiation, by which God is appeased and rendered propitious, the pastor will teach as a dogma defined by the unerring authority of a General Council of the Church. As often as the commemoration of this victim is celebrated, so often is the work of our salvation promoted, and the plenteous fruits of that bloody victim flow in upon us abundantly through this unbloody sacrifice."

The celebration of the mass in the Romish church is an intricate and complicated ceremonial. On this peculiarly solemn occasion the officiating priest is clothed with certain vestments which are designed to be emblematical of the different circumstances connected with the closing scene of our blessed Lord's life upon the earth. The altar, too, is so fitted up as to represent the cross on which our Saviour hung; and on the altar stands the chalice or cup which is to contain the wine mingled with a little water, and covering the cup is the patten or plate intended to hold the cake or wafer; while there are also seen upon the altar, wax tapers, an incense pan, a vessel for holy water, a crucifix and a bell. At the commencement of the service, the priest first appears standing at the foot of the altar. Making the sign of the cross he bows to the altar, and then again at the foot of it: rising, he ascends and kisses it; moves to the middle of the altar; where he repeats, "Have mercy on us."

addressed to each of the Persons of the Trinity; three times in succession a hymn follows, and then a benediction is pronounced upon the people. "Bowing down before the middle of the altar, he commences the reading of the Gospel, when both priest and people make the sign of the cross on the forehead, mouth, and breast, to signify their confession of Christ crucified, and their allegiance to him. After certain recitations, the priest offers up the bread and the wine. With the wine there is mingled water, in emblem of the water and blood that issued from Jesus' side on the cross. In this act he prays that the offering may be accepted as a sacrifice for the sins of all the faithful, living and dead. The elements are then blessed with the sign of the cross. Thereafter the priest washes the tips of his fingers, in token of the purity with which the eucharist should be celebrated. Again, bowing at the middle of the altar, he craves the divine acceptance of the oblation, and the intercession of the saints. After renewed prayers and other ceremonies, the priest again spreads his hands over the bread and wine, prays God to accept the oblation for eternal life, blesses them, signs the cross, again prays that the oblation may be accepted. Next comes the awful act of consecration. The priest pronouncing the words hoc est corpus meum, "This is my body," the bread is converted into the body of Christ; in like manner, by a separate act, the wine is changed into his blood. The bell rings thrice; the bread, under the name of the host or sacrifice, is lifted up in view of the congregation; and the people, kneeling, adore. Thrice again the bell tinkles as the host is set down. Repetitions follow of prayers for the salvation of the living and the dead, through the sacrifice now presented. The host is broken, in imitation of Christ's breaking the bread, and a particle of it is mixed with the wine, to denote the remitting of Christ's body, blood, and soul, at his resurrection. Three times the priest strikes his breast in token of repentance; then follow three prayers; and thrice again the priest, kneeling, strikes his breast: he then, with prayers between, partakes of the bread in the form of a wafer, and next of the cup. After this the people receive the communion of the bread: and the ceremony closes with the priest pouring a little wine into the cup, and a little on his fingers over the cup, as a means to prevent any particle of the consecrated wafer from being lost or profaned."

The wafer of the Romish church, used in the mass, is composed of unleavened bread. It is made thin and circular, and bears upon it either the figure of Christ or the initials I. H. S., which mean Jesus Homi-ni-um Saluator, Jesus the Saviour of men, or as some explain it, the three first letters of the name of Jesus in Greek. The mass is termed by Romanists an unbloody sacrifice, in opposition to the bloody sacrifice of the cross; and they allege, that while Christ's sacrifice upon the cross was sufficient to obtain pardon for the sins of the whole world, the sacrifice is to be repeated in order that the benefits of the first sacrifice might be applied. The sacrifice of the mass is grounded on the dogma of transubstantiation and the real presence, and is believed to possess a propitiatory merit both for the living and the dead, which was the doctrine laid down in plain terms by the Tridentine fathers. Some of the more moderate Romish writers, as, for example, Father Bossuet, attempt to modify and explain the propitiatory character of the sacrifice of the mass, by representing it as commemorative and intercessory. But it must appear obvious to every thoughtful mind, that a sacrifice cannot be at once propitiatory and commemorative, the two qualities being necessarily inconsistent, and even contradictory. In the Ordinary of the Mass the following account occurs of the mode in which the wafer is given to the communicant: "The priest, in giving the consecrated wafer to the communicant, says, 'Behold the Lamb of God! Behold Him who taketh away the sin of the world!' Then he and the communicant repeat thrice, 'Lord, I am not worthy thou shouldest enter my roof; speak, therefore, but the word, and my soul shall be healed.' the communicant striking his breast in token of his unworthiness. Then, says the Directory, having the towel raised above your breast, your eyes modestly closed, your head likewise raised up, and your mouth conveniently open, receive the holy sacrament on your tongue, resting on your under lip; then close your mouth, and say in your heart, 'Amen, I believe it to be the body of Christ, and I pray it may preserve my soul to eternal life.'"

Numerous, in the estimation of the Romanist, are the advantages to be derived from the sacrifice of the mass, not only to the living, but to the dead. It is by the saying of masses that souls are delivered from purgatory. Mr. Seymour, in his 'Pilgrimage to Rome,' informs us, "that in Italy the parish churches are much neglected, and in indifferent state of repair, and the parochial clergy, whose duty is the cure of souls, are too often found in poverty and destitution, while the establishments of the conventual and cathedral clergy, whose main duty is to say masses for the delivery of souls from purgatory, are exceedingly wealthy, being enriched by large donations and bequests." Of late years, what are called Purgatorian Societies have been established in London, Dublin, and other places, whose members regularly contribute sums of money to defray the expenses of "procuring masses to be offered up for the repose of the souls of deceased parents, relations, and friends, of all the subscribers to the institution in particular, and the faithful departed in general." It is not unusual to find in the Roman Catholic Directories such notices as these:—Monthly masses will be said for such benefactors as will aid in paying off the debt on such and such chapels and schools; and masses will be said every quarter for those who are interred in such and such a burial-ground. "It is taught and believed in Italy," says Mr. Seymour, "that a number of 'daily masses,' of 'high masses,' of 'remembrance masses,' of 'voluntary offerings,' can release suffering souls, or diminish the intensity of their sufferings in the frightful abode of purgatory, and thus tend to translate them to a state of rest in the regions of the blessed. The monks and friars of the inferior and mendicant orders avail themselves of this belief, and profess a readiness to offer, in the church of the convent, the requisite number of masses, provided a commensurate donation or gratuity be given to the convent, for the maintenance of the poor brethren. I have myself witnessed the bargain and arrangement for this, and have seen the masses purchased, the money paid and received, at the moderate charge of about 2s., to secure the release of a soul." High mass is so called as being accompanied by all the ceremonies which custom and authority have annexed to the celebration of mass.

MATAHITI (MAOA RAA), the ripening or completing of the year, a festival regularly observed in Uahine in Polynesia. "In general," says Mr. Ellis, "the men only engaged in pagan festivals; but men, women, and children, attended at this: the females, however, were not allowed to enter the sacred enclosure. A sumptuous banquet was held annually at the time of its observance, which was regulated by the blossoming of reeds. Their rites and worship were in many respects singular, but in none more so than in the ripening of the year, which was regarded as a kind of annual acknowledgment to the gods. When the prayers were finished at the marae, and the banquet ended, a usage prevailed much resembling the popish custom of mass for souls in purgatory. Each individual returned to his home, or to his family marae, there to offer special prayers for the spirits of departed relatives, that they might be liberated from the po, or state of night, and ascend to rohutuanoa, the mount Meru of Polynesia, or return to this world, by entering into the body of one of its inhabitants. They did not suppose, according to the generally received doctrine of transmigration, that the spirits who entered the body of some dweller upon earth, would permanently remain there, but only come and inspire the person to declare future events, or execute any other commission from the supernatural beings on whom they imagined they were constantly dependent."

MATERIALISTS, a name usually applied to those speculative thinkers who attempt to explain the whole theory of the universe, and even the phenomena of life and thought, by the laws of matter and motion. The Materialist denies the separate existence of matter and of mind, and thus obviates the necessity of propounding any question as to their mutual action and influence upon each other, and yet the hypothesis of the Materialists is itself an intrusion upon a province from which man is excluded. We know nothing of mind or of matter but by their properties; the essential nature of either it is impossible in our present state we can ever discover. On a prima facie view of the subject, the presumption seems to be against the Materialist. What two things are apparently more completely distinct in their nature than thought and matter? All that we know of matter is, that it is inert, senseless, and lifeless, but that any modification of matter should give rise to thought, seems inconsistent with all that we can learn of its modifications as far as they are ever effected by human power. "It was never supposed," to use the language of Dr. Samuel Johnson, "that cogitation is inherent in matter, or that every particle is a thinking being. Yet if any part of matter be devoid of thought, what part can we suppose to think? Matter can differ from matter only in form, density, bulk, motion, and direction of motion; to which of these, however varied or combined, can consciousness be annexed? To be round or square, to be solid or fluid, to be great or little, to be moved slowly or swiftly, one way or another, are modes of material existence, all equally alien from the nature of cogitation. If matter be once without thought, it can only be made to think by some new modification, but all the modifications which it can admit are equally unconnected with cogitative powers." If this then be the proper conclusion to which our knowledge of matter necessarily leads us, there is the strongest presumption against the opinion of the Materialists. But then it may be alleged, the mere existence of a violent presumption against the theory is no reason why it should be rejected. Were the theory supported by actual facts, which went far to establish its truth, no mere presumption could be of any force. But the subject is not such as to admit of being established by facts, any more than it admits of being opposed by facts. Whether the mind be material or immaterial is a question which no collection of facts can ever either prove or disprove; and in this state of the case the force of the theory is sufficiently obviated by opposing to it a powerful analogical argument, which, though it does not show that the theory is false, shows at all events that it is extremely improbable. All the modifications of matter which the chemist or the mechanical philosopher have ever discovered have been devoid of cogitative power, and is it not in the highest degree unlikely that the modification of matter, which constitutes the body of man, should be the single solitary exception in the whole universe of matter and its infinite modifications?

Lord Bacon seems to have entertained very high notions of the extent of the human faculties, when he declared his opinion that in process of time man would discover the essences of material objects. The fact is, that though, since the days of Bacon, physical philosophy in all its departments has made astonishing progress, the essence of no one substance in nature has been hitherto discovered. And without any inordinate depreciation of our intellectual constitution, we may pronounce the discovery beyond the reach of man. The human understanding is limited, and to solve the question as to the materiality or immateriality of the thinking principle, transcends these limits. "We have the ideas of matter and thinking," Locke wisely remarks, "but possibly shall never be able to know whether any mere material being thinks or no." "By the mind of a man," says Dr. Reid, "we understand that in him which thinks, remembers, reasons, wills; the essence both of body and mind is unknown to us." And Mr. Stewart, speaking of the "occasional causes" of Malebranche and Leibnitz, observes, "The chief objection to the doctrine of occasional causes is, that it presumes to decide upon a question of which human reason is altogether incompetent to judge—our ignorance of the mode in which matter acts upon mind, or mind upon matter,—furnishing not the shadow of a proof that the one may not act directly and immediately on the other, in some way incomprehensible by our faculties."

On reflection it must appear unreasonable in the extreme to deny the existence of mind, and yet retain our belief in the existence of matter. Both rest on evidence equally powerful and undeniable. On this point Lord Brougham justly remarks: "The evidence for the existence of mind is to the full as complete as that upon which we believe in the existence of matter. Indeed it is more certain and more irrefragable. The consciousness of existence, the perpetual sense that we are thinking, and that we are performing the operation quite independently of all material objects, proves to us the existence of a being different from our bodies, with a degree of evidence higher than any we can have for the existence of those bodies themselves, or of any other part of the material world. It is certain—proved, indeed, to demonstration—that many of the perceptions of matter which we derive through the senses are deceitful, and seem to indicate that which has no reality at all. Some inferences which we draw respecting it are confounded with direct sensation or perception, for example, the idea of motion; other ideas, as those of hardness and solidity, are equally the result of reasoning, and often mislead. Thus we never doubt, on the testimony of our senses, that the parts of matter touch—that different bodies come in contact with one another, and with our organs of sense; and yet nothing is more certain than that there still is some small distance between the bodies which we think we perceive to touch. Indeed it is barely possible that all the sensations and perceptions which we have of the material world may be only ideas in our own minds: it is barely possible, therefore, that matter should have no existence. But that mind—that the sentient principle—that the thing or the being which we call 'I' and 'we,' and which thinks, feels, reasons—should have no existence, is a contradiction in terms. Of the two existences, then, that of mind as independent of matter is more certain than that of matter apart from mind."

Among the ancient Greek philosophers, the leading Materialists were Democritus and Epicurus, both of whom admitted nothing in mind but sensations, and nothing in nature but bodies, and alleged the primary component principles of all things to be indivisible, eternal, and indestructible atoms. But while these two schools of ancient Materialists agreed together as to the materia prima or original matter of the universe, they differed as to the mode in which the atoms operated, so as mechanically to construct the universe. Democritus alleged, that atoms were put in motion in a right line in the infinite void. Epicurus, however, dissatisfied with this explanation, endowed the particles with a second motion in an oblique line, by which, being carried in every direction, they would come by their successive contacts and separations to produce the different phenomena which present themselves in the universe. In the system of Democritus mind is simply an aggregate of images conveyed from external objects, and coming into contact with the inner organization of man. Epicurus, pushing still farther his materialistic views, regarded the mind as composed of a more refined matter than the body, but so united to it that the dissolution of the one involves the dissolution of the other. The school of Epicurus continued for ages to propagate its materialist opinions, without, however, giving rise to a single individual who could be said to emulate the fame of its founder. With the single exception, indeed, of the brilliant poem of Lucretius, "De Natura Rerum," on the nature of things, this mechanical system of philosophy has left no trace of its existence among the speculative theories of antiquity.

It has been strangely alleged by some writers that the Christian Fathers of the first centuries held materialist views. To understand, however, what were their true sentiments on this subject, we must bear in mind the circumstances in which they wrote. The early Christian Church had to contend with various systems of doctrine which sought to mingle themselves up with the Christian scheme. Hence arose the Neo-Platonism of the Alexandrian school, and the variety of Gnostic sects, some of them pervaded by Judaism, and others by the Oriental systems of philosophy. These various corruptions of Christianity, instead of claiming the slightest affinity with materialism, partook largely of the characters of the opposite system of spiritualism. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that in combating the high Spiritualist views of the Alexandrian and Gnostic schools, a few of the early Christian writers should have expressed themselves in such a way as to lay themselves open to the imputation of materialism. But the tendency of their writings, as a whole, is far from favouring any views which attached high importance to matter, so as to exclude mind or spirit. On the contrary, they viewed matter as an inert and passive substance at the lowest stage of existence; and St. Augustine even goes so far as to call it an almost non-existence, and he says that if there were a word which at once signified something which is, and something which is not, he would give that name to matter.

In the Middle Ages materialist opinions were extensively diffused by the secret societies which arose in Syria and Egypt; one of the initiatory maxims inculcated upon their members being, that there was no other God than material nature. But the first development of materialism, as a philosophical system in modern times, is due to Spinoza, who taught that thought, like extension, could be only a property of a material substance, and that intelligence and will are simply modifications of the human organism. Materialism, however, in its grossest and most repulsive form, was set forth by the author of the 'Système de la Nature'—a work which obtained a wide circulation, not only on the Continent of Europe, but in Great Britain, and also in America, undermining the religious principles of multitudes, and diffusing among all classes of society a bold, unblushing infidelity. "The universe," says this leader in the ranks of modern Materialists, "that vast assemblage of all that exists, exhibits nowhere anything else than matter and motion." The same doctrine has been more recently revived by M. Comte, in what is termed the Positive Philosophy, which explains all natural phenomena whatever, whether material, mental, or moral, as merely the necessary results of the laws of extension or of motion. The operations of mind or spirit are thus resolved into the laws of matter, and the necessity is obviated of having recourse to a Great First Cause, personal, spiritual, all-creating, and all-controlling. This form of materialism, accordingly, in its very nature and results, terminates in Atheism. Yet Dr. Priestley, though holding substantially the same opinions with D'Holbach and Comte, avows in his writings his firm belief in a personal God, a resurrection from the dead, and a future state of final retribution. The same inconsistency marks the theories of not a few of the Positivists and other Materialists of our own day. Some of the recent Spiritualists in America, to uphold their views of clairvoyance and magnetic influence, put forth a modified form of materialism, alleging the soul to be composed not of gross matter, but of a subtle, ethereal, impalpable substance like light, heat, or electricity. The same theory was broached by Hartley, followed up by Abraham Tucker, the ingenious author of the 'Light of Nature pursued,' and more fully developed by Dr. Mason Good in his 'Life of Lucretius,' prefixed to his English poetical translation of the celebrated poem of that ancient writer, who was himself an avowed and gross Materialist. "This," as Dr. James Buchanan well remarks, "is a new and very singular phase of materialism. It is widely different from the doctrine which was taught by the infidel writers of the last century. They had recourse to the theory of materialism chiefly with the view of excluding a world of spirits, and of undermining the doctrine of a future state: here it is applied to prove the constant development and indestructible existence of minds generated from matter, but destined to survive the dissolution of the body; nay, every particle of matter in the universe is supposed to be advancing, in one magnificent progression, towards the spiritual state. The danger now is, not that religion may be undermined by materialism, but that it may be supplanted by a fond and foolish superstition, in which the facts of mesmerism and the fictions of clairvoyance are blended into one ghostly system, fitted to exert a powerful but pernicious influence on overcredulous minds." Though there may be some foundation for the apprehension here expressed by Dr. Buchanan, yet the tendency which has so strongly appeared of late years in England among too many cultivators of science to favour such works as those of Oken and Comte, and the 'Vestiges of Creation,' renders it not improbable, that for some time to come, writers on Christian apologetics will find it necessary to contend earnestly against a rapidly increasing school of materialist philosophers. MATH, the residence of a monastic community among the Hindus. It consists of a number of buildings, including a set of huts or chambers for the Mahant or superior, and his resident Chêlas or disciples; a temple sacred to the deity whom they worship, or the Samâdh, or shrine of the founder of the sect, or some eminent teacher; and one or more sheds or buildings for the accommodation of the mendicants or travellers who are constantly visiting the Math, both ingress and egress being free to all. The number of permanent pupils in a Math varies from three or four to thirty or forty; besides whom there is also a considerable number of out-door members. The resident Chêlas are usually the elders of the body, with a few of the younger as their attendants and scholars. The superior is usually elected from the senior or more proficient of the pupils. The manner in which the Hindu convents are supported is thus pointed out by Professor H. H. Wilson: "Most of the Maths have some endowments of land, but with the exception of a few established in large cities, and especially at Benares, the individual amount of these endowments is, in general, of little value. There are few Maths in any district that possess five hundred bigahs of land, or about one hundred and seventy acres, and the most usual quantity is about thirty or forty bigahs only: this is sometimes let out for a fixed rent; at other times, it is cultivated by the Math on its own account; the highest rental met with, in any of the returns procured, is six hundred and thirty rupees per annum.

Although, however, the individual portions are trifling, the great number of these petty establishments renders the aggregate amount considerable, and as the endowed lands have been granted Mayi, or free of land tax, they form, altogether, a serious deduction from the revenue of each district.

"Besides the lands they may hold, the Maths have other sources of support: the attachment of lay votaries frequently contributes very liberally to their wants: the community is also sometimes concerned, though, in general, covertly, in traffic, and besides those means of supply, the individual members of most of them sally forth daily, to collect alms from the vicinity, the aggregate of which, generally in the shape of rice or other grains, furnishes forth the common table: it only remains to observe, that the tenants of these Maths, particularly the Vaishnavas, are most commonly of a quiet inoffensive character, and the Mahants especially are men of talents and respectability, although they possess, occasionally, a little of that self-importance, which the conceit of superior sanctity is apt to inspire: there are, it is true, exceptions to this innocuous character, and robberies and murders have been traced to these religious establishments."

MATHEMA (Gr. a Lesson), a name usually given in the ancient Greek writers to the Creed, probably because the catechumens were obliged to learn it.

MATHEMATICI, a term applied to astrologers both in the Justinian and Theodosian codes.

MATHURINI, a name given to the BRETHREN OF THE HOLY TRINITY (which see), because their church in Paris has St. Mathurin for its tutelar saint.

MATINS, the ancient name used in the Christian church to denote early morning prayers, which usually began about day-break. The office of matins or morning prayer, according to the Church of England, is an abridgment of her ancient services, for matins, lauds, and prime.

MATRAGYRTÆ, an appellation given to the AGYRTÆ (which see), or priests of Cybele, because they gathered oblations for the Great Mother.

MATRALIA, an annual festival celebrated at Rome on the 11th of June, in honour of the goddess Matuta. Roman matrons alone took part in the ceremonies, offering cakes baked in pots of earthenware. A female slave was next introduced into the temple, who received a blow on the cheek from one of the matrons, and was driven with scorn from the sacred building. It was customary for the matrons at this festival to carry the children of their sisters instead of their own into the temple, and to offer up prayers to the goddess in their behalf, whose statue was then crowned with a garland by one of the matrons whose husband was still alive.

MATRES SACRORUM (Lat. mothers of the sacred things), priestesses of Mithras, the Persian god of the Sun, after his worship had been introduced into the Roman Empire.

MATRICULA, a term used by the council of Agde, to denote the CAXON (which see) or catalogue of the clergy in the ancient Christian church.

MATRICULARII, subordinate ecclesiastical officers among the ancient Christians. They were intrusted with the care of the church, in which they were accustomed to sleep. They had also a specific office to perform in public processions.

MATRIMONY. See MARRIAGE.

MATRONALIA, an ancient Roman festival celebrated annually on the Kalends of March, in honour of Mars. It was kept by the matrons alone; hence the name. It was instituted either on account of the peace which was concluded between the Romans and Sabines by the mediation of women; or because the founder of Rome was the son of Ilia and Mars.

MATSURI, a public spectacle exhibited at Nagasaki in Japan, on the birthday of the god Suwa, the patron of the city. It consists of processions, plays, dances, and other amusements, which are celebrated at the expense of the inhabitants of ten or eleven streets uniting each year for that purpose. Processions pass through the principal streets, and spectacles are exhibited in a temporary building of bamboo, with a thatched roof, open towards the square on which it is erected. The festival is thus described by Kämpfer, who himself witnessed it: "Everything being ready, the Sinto clergy of the city appear in a body, with a splendid retinue, bringing over in procession the Mikosi of their great Suwa, as, also, to keep him company, that of Symios. Mura-aki is left at home, as there is no instance in the history of his life and actions from which it could be inferred that he delighted in walking and travelling.

"The Sinto clergy, upon this occasion, style themselves Ootomi—that is, the high great retinue—their pompous title, notwithstanding the alms-chest is one of the principal things they carry in the procession, and, indeed, to very good purpose, for there is such a multitude of things thrown among them by the crowds of superstitious spectators, as if they had a mind out of mere charity to stone them.

"When they come to the place of exhibition, the ecclesiastics seat themselves, according to their quality, which appears in good measure by their dress, upon three benches, built for them before the front of the temple. The two superiors take the uppermost bench, clad in black, with a particular head ornament, and a short staff, as a badge of their authority. Four others, next in rank, sit upon the second bench, dressed in white ecclesiastical gowns, with a black lackered cap, something different from that worn by their superiors. The main body takes possession of the third and lowermost bench, sitting promiscuously, and all clad in white gowns, with a black lackered cap, somewhat like those of the Jesuits. The servants and porters appointed to carry the holy utensils of the temple, and other people who have anything to do at this solemnity, stand next to the ecclesiastics, bareheaded.

"On the other side of the square, opposite to the ecclesiastics, sit the deputies of the governors, under a tent, upon a fine mat, somewhat raised from the ground. For magnificence sake, and out of respect for this holy act, they have twenty pikes of state planted before them in the ground.

"The public spectacles on these occasions are a sort of plays, acted by eight, twelve, or more persons. The subject is taken out of the history of their gods and heroes. Their remarkable adventures, heroic actions, and sometimes their love intrigues, put in verse, are sung by dancing actors, whilst others play upon musical instruments. If the subject be thought too grave and moving, there is now and then a comic actor jumps out unawares upon the stage, to divert the audience with his gestures and merry discourse in prose. Some of their other plays are composed only of ballets or dances, like the performance of the mimic actors on the Roman stage. For the dancers do not speak, but endeavour to express the contents of the story they are about to represent, as naturally as possible, both by their dress and by their gestures and actions, regulated according to the sound of musical instruments. The chief subjects of the play, such as fountains, bridges, gates, houses, gardens, trees, mountains, animals, and the like, are also represented, some as big as the life, and all in general contrived so as to be removed at pleasure, like the scenes of our European plays."

MATTHEW'S (St.) DAY, a festival of the Romish church, kept on the 21st of September, in honour of the Evangelist Matthew. This festival is observed in the Greek church on the 16th of November.

MATTHEW'S (St.) LITURGY, one of the twelve Liturgies of the Maronites contained in their Missal.

MATTHIAS'S (St.) DAY, a festival observed by the Romish church, on the 24th of February, in honour of Matthias, who was elected to the apostleship in room of Judas.

MATUTA, a surname of Juno, under which the festival MATRALIA (which see) was observed in her honour.

MATUTINA, the new morning service of the ancient Gallican church, so called in contradistinction to the old morning service which was always early before day; whereas this was after the day was begun. When this was admitted among the canonical hours to make up the number of seven times a day, the Psalms appointed for the service were the fifty-first, the sixty-third, and ninetyeth.

MAUI, a legendary hero of the Polynesian mythology. There is not a single group of islands in the whole range of Oceanica, where Maui was not held in constant veneration under one or other of his numerous appellations, but the more special seat of his worship was New Zealand, which was supposed to have emerged from the ocean at his command; and in the Tonga islands he is said to have fished up these islands out of the sea with a hook and line. "The stories tell," says Mr. Hardwick in his 'Christ and other Masters,' "that Maui was the last-born child of Tara-hunga or Taranga, being descended also, after many generations, from Tu-mata-uenga, one of the unnatural sons of Heaven and Earth. Though finally admitted to the number of the gods, and though at times confounded even with the highest members of the ancient pantheon, he is not unfrequently declared to be of purely human origin. His youthful pranks, betokening always an exuberance of life and vigour, and occasionally intermingled with proceedings of more than dubious morality, remind us of the early feats ascribed to the heroic Krishna; while his struggles with a huge sea-monster (Tumuru) furnish some additional points of contact or comparison with the Hercules alike of India and of Greece. On this account it was that he acquired a lasting hold on the affections of the ancient Maori, and was scrupulously invoked by them as their own tutelary genius on many grand occasions, and especially when they were setting out upon some fishing expedition.

"Very many of the strange adventures which are told of Maui indicate his vast superiority over his five elder brothers in strength, in cunning, in good fortune. To astonish or to overreach them he would voluntarily assume the form and other qualities of a bird; and once, in this disguise, appears to have succeeded in gaining admittance to the subterranean world, in which his parents were detained. Ere long, however, it was found that the mysterious visitor was a man, or rather was 'a god,' and when his mother finally beheld in him her own Maui ('Maui possessed of the topknot, or power, of Taranga'), her delight at the discovery was rapturous and unbounded. 'This,' she exclaimed, 'is indeed my child. By the winds and storms and wave-uplifting gales he was fashioned and became a human being. Welcome, O my child, welcome: by thee shall hereafter be climbed the threshold of the house of thy great ancestor, Hine-nui-te-po (the goddess of the world invisible), and death itself shall thenceforth have no power over man.' With the express intention of achieving the fulfilment of this hopeful prophecy, the hero of New Zealand entered on the last and greatest of his labours. He had noticed how the sun and moon, which he was instigated to extinguish, were immortalised, because it was their wont to bathe in some living fountain: 'he determined, therefore, to do the same, and to enter the womb of Hine-nui-te-po, that is Hades, where the living water—the life-giving stream—was situated. Hine-nui-te-po draws all into her womb, but permits none to return. Maui determined to try, trusting to his great powers; but before he made the attempt, he strictly charged the birds, his friends, not to laugh. He then allowed Great Mother Night to draw him into her womb. His head and shoulders had already entered, when that forgetful bird, the Piwaka-waka, began to laugh. Night closed her portals: Maui was cut in two, and died. Thus death came into the world, [or rather, in accordance with a second and more congruous version, kept its hold upon the world]. Had not the Piwaka-waka laughed, Maui would have drunk of the living stream, and man would never [more] have died. Such was the end of Maui!"

MAUI FATA, altar-raising, a religious ceremony in Polynesia. No human being was slain on this occasion, but numbers of pigs, with abundance of plantains, were placed upon the altars, which were newly ornamented with branches of the sacred miro, and yellow leaves of the cocoa-nut tree. These rites extended to every marae in the island, and were designed to secure rain and fertility, for the country gained by conquest or recovered from invasion.

MAULAVI, the name usually given to a Mohammedan priest in India.

MAUNDY THURSDAY, the Thursday before Easter; supposed by some to allude to the mandatum or commandment which Christ gave to his disciples on that day, to love one another as he had loved them; while by others it is supposed to be derived from mandatum or command, that being the first word of the anthem sung on that day. "A new commandment I give unto you." Others again allege that the name arose from the maunds or baskets of gifts, which it was an ancient custom for Christians to present to one another at this time, in token of the mutual affection which our blessed Lord urged upon his people. On Maundy Thursday, in ancient times, in some of the Latin churches, the communion was administered in the evening after supper, in imitation of the first communion. Augustine takes notice of the same custom, and also observes that the communion in some places was administered twice on this day; in the morning for the sake of such as could not keep a day of fast, and in the evening for those that fasted till evening, when they ended their fast and received the communion after supper. On this day the competentes or candidates for baptism publicly rehearsed the Creed before the bishops or presbyters in the church. It was customary also for servants to receive the communion on this great and holy fifth day of the Passion Week. After the ancient love-feasts were discontinued, this day was observed as a feast of love.

On Maundy Thursday the Romish church celebrates the burial or entombment of our blessed Lord. It may appear strange that Good Friday being considered the anniversary of our Saviour's death, the preceding day should be chosen to represent his funeral; but the reason assigned by Romanists for this seeming inconsistency is, that the church has preferred to represent it by anticipation on Thursday, rather than on the following day in which the church is in profound mourning on account of his death. On this occasion, we learn, on the testimony of an eye-witness, that two hosts are consecrated, one of which is consumed as usual by the officiating cardinal, and the other is carefully placed in a chalice, and covered with a paten and napkin. This is called the chalice of the Sepulchre, and is very handsome, being of rock crystal, set in silver gilt, and adorned by figures of the twelve apostles. "The procession," it is added, "set out in the usual manner, the Pope being last of all, and on this occasion walking bareheaded, having the canopy borne over him by eight bishops, and carrying in his hand the chalice, containing the host. The procession passed through the vestibule to the Pauline Chapel, which was illuminated by five hundred and sixty-seven wax lights—producing a blaze of light almost intolerable to the eye. The altar was prepared as a sort of sepulchre, and there the Pope deposited the host, in a small wooden box as in the tomb, and the sepulchre was locked by the sacristan, and the key delivered to the cardinal penitentiary, who was to perform the service of next day."

Another ceremony observed at Rome on Holy Thursday is the washing of the feet of thirteen pilgrims by the Pope, in imitation of the act of humility and condescension which our Lord performed in washing the feet of His disciples. Another singular ceremony which belongs to this day is the washing of the high altar with wine; a ceremony which, as well as that of uncovering the altar, has already been described under the article ALTAR. The Pope also pronounces a solemn anathema on Maundy Thursday against all heretics and enemies of the church (see ANATHEMA), being the Bull in cana Domini. On this day alone of all the festival days in the year, the ceremony is performed of blessing the catechumenal and chrismal oils, and the oil of the sick.

MAUR (ST.), CONGREGATION OF, one of the reformed congregations of Benedictine monks, which originated in the seventeenth century. It was formed under the authority of Gregory XV. in 1621, and endowed with various privileges and rights by Urban VIII. in 1627. The object of this Congregation, which is widely extended throughout France, is to revive the spirit of St. Benedict in the observance of his rule, and with this view much attention is paid to the training of young religious. To effect this the more completely, there are houses for novices, from which those who are to be admitted to profession are removed to other cloisters, where they are trained for two years to acts and exercises of worship. Then they study human learning and theology for five years, after which they spend one year in special preparation for their sacred duties. The Benedictines are accustomed to speak in very high terms of the eminent services which the Congregation of St. Maur have done to the cause of literature, most of their time and attention having been directed to the pursuit of learning. This devotion to the study of sacred and secular knowledge was strongly objected to by some who admired the ancient monastic discipline. Hence a controversy arose in France on the question, "How far is it suitable for a monk to cultivate literature?" But the monks of St. Maur refused to yield to the prejudices of some of the French bishops, and to the petty jealousies of the Jesuits; they have continued, accordingly, to issue from the press works of great interest and importance. Their celebrated editions of the Fathers, extending to ten Greek and twelve Latin Fathers; their 'Gallia Christiana,' in thirteen volumes folio, not yet completed; their 'Histoire Littéraire de la France,' which has been carried on from 1733 down to the present day; and an admirable compendious work, also continued down to the present time, under the title, 'L'Art de vérifier les Dates des Faits Historiques,' have all of them proved valuable accessions to literature both sacred and profane. Such names as Mabillon and Montfaucon, both of whom belonged to the Congregation of St. Maur, are sufficient to show that among the monks of this order have been enrolled some men of distinguished talents and profound learning, men who by their laborious researches have thrown a flood of light upon the history and antiquities of the Christian church.

MAURI, an inferior order of supernatural beings, according to the belief of the South Sea Islanders. They were considered the most malignant of beings, exceedingly irritable and implacable. They were not confined to the skulls of departed warriors, or the images made for them, but were occasionally supposed to resort to the shells from the sea-shore, especially a beautiful kind of murex, called the murex ranoces. These shells were kept by the sorcerers, and the peculiar singing noise perceived on applying the valve to the ear, was imagined to proceed from the demon it contained.

MAURO URA, the red sash, a very sacred relic held in the highest estimation by the natives of Tahiti in the South Sea Islands. It is thus described by the late lamented missionary, John Williams: "This was a piece of network, about seven inches wide and six feet long, upon which the red feathers of the paroquet were nearly fastened. It was used at the inauguration of their greatest kings, just as the crown is with us, and the most honourable appellation which a chief could receive was, Arii maro ura, 'King of the Red Sash.' A new piece, about eighteen inches in length, was attached at the inauguration of every sovereign; to accomplish which several human victims were required. The first was for the mau raa titi, or the stretching it upon pegs in order to attach to it the new piece. Another was necessary for the futu raa, or attaching the new portion; and a third for the pin raa, or twitching the sacred relic off the pegs. This not only invested the sash itself with a high measure of solemn importance, but also rendered the chiefs who wore it most noble in public estimation."

MAUSOLEUM, a name originally applied to the magnificent sepulchre erected by Artemisia to the memory of Mausolus, king of Caria; but now used to denote generally any splendid tomb. See CEMETERIES, TOMBS.

MAYA, a term used in Hinduism to denote the personification of Brahmin's fruitless longing for some being other than his own. In the Vaidic period Maya meant no more than the desire of evolution. In its full development, however, the word always implies illusion, and hence all forms assumed by matter are held to be not only transient, but illusive and essentially non-existent. Dr. Duff explains Maya as the actuating principle or efficient cause of illusion;—the illusory energy. "It is Maya," says this able and learned missionary, "that delusively exhibits all the diversified appearances which compose what is ordinarily called the visible external universe. These have no exterior material basis or substantive form, neither have they any interior spiritual basis or substratum, either in the Universal Soul, or in the human soul before which they are displayed. In both these respects, they differ essentially from the subtle types or models of all things which Plato supposed to exist in the divine mind from all eternity,—and to which he gave the name of 'ideas, or intelligible forms,' because apprehended solely by the intellect. These Platonic ideas are not mere conceptions. They are real immutable beings, subsisting in the divine mind as their proper seat. They are unchangeable patterns or exemplars, which, by the power of God, issue forth from the fountain of his own essence,—and, becoming united with matter previously without any form, they impress their own form upon it, and so render visible and perceptible the whole range of individual sensible objects presented to us in the external universe. These forms, thus impressed on contingent matter, are exact copies of those that are invariable. But sensible things are perpetually changing. Their forms, consequently, cannot be the proper objects of contemplation and science to the enlightened and purified intellect. Hence, says Plato, they are the ideas, or intelligible forms, eternally and immutably subsisting in the divine mind, which alone can be the real objects contemplated by the expanded reason of man.

"Unlike, too, the 'ideas' of Malebranche: which, though contained only in the one great Omnipresent Mind, and perceived by other spirits therein, had yet corresponding external objects;—unlike the 'sensible species,' or phantasms, or shadowy films of Aristotle, which, though transformed by the active and passive intellect into intelligible species fit to be the objects of the understanding, were yet only resemblances or pictures of outward substances;—unlike the 'ideas' of Berkeley, which, though representing no material forms, were not mere states of the individual mind, but separate spiritual entities, wholly independent of it, and imperishable,—capable of existing in finite minds, but reposing chiefly on the bosom of the infinite;—unlike any, or all of these, the 'ideas' or images of the Hindu theology float in utter vacuity,—challenging no separate or independent existence. They are mere illusive appearances presented by Maya,—having no 'species' in the human intellect; no 'substantial exemplars' in an external world; no 'intelligent forms' in the divine mind for their antitypes. Neither do they depend, in any degree, for their origin on any power or faculty of the soul itself. They spring from no anterior act of the soul—no more than the shadow in water is produced by an active power resident in the water. If you could suppose the water percipient, it would perceive the shadow in its own bosom, though wholly passive in the manifestation thereof; so, of the percipient soul. It does not originate any of the illusive appearances that flit before it. It is only the passive recipient as well as percipient of them. In your ignorance, you conclude that an image or shadow necessarily presupposes some counterpart substantial form. But know that it is the prerogative of Maya, the divine energy, to produce images and shadows without any corresponding reality,—to produce and exhibit, for example, the image of a sun, or the shadow of a tree, in the bosom of a limpid stream, though there be no luminary in the firmament, no tree on the verdant bank. And thus it is that Maya does produce images and forms, and exhibits them to the soul as before a mirror, though there be no counterpart realities. It is from the habit generated by ignorance that you talk of sensations and perceptions in the soul, as if these necessarily implied the existence of external objects as their exciting causes.

"It is true, say the Hindu theologians, that so long as the power of Maya is exerted, the soul is deceived into the belief of its own distinct individuality, as well as of the real existence of material phenomena. In other words, the soul—in consequence of the twofold operation of Maya, first, in subjecting it to ignorance of its real nature and origin, and secondly, in exposing it to illusive sensations and perceptions—cannot help being impressed with a conviction of its own separate identity, and the independent existence of external forms. And so long as this double belief, the compound result of ignorance and delusion, continues,—so long must the soul act, 'not according to its essential proper nature, but according to the unavoidable influences of the ignorance and illusive appearances to which it hath been exposed,'—or, in the words of the Shastra, 'so long must it be liable to virtue and vice, to anger and hate, and other passions and sensations,—to birth and death, and all the varied changes and miseries of this mortal state.'"

MAYITRI, a future Budha, who is destined to appear at the end of five thousand years from the death of Gotama Budha, and will continue for ages to be the teacher of the human race.

MEAT-OFFERING, a part of the appointed offerings of the ancient Hebrews. There were five kinds of meat-offerings, all of which are minutely described in Lev. ii. They were (1.) of fine flour unbaked. (2.) Of flour baked in a pan. (3.) Baked in a frying-pan. (4.) Baked in an oven. (5.) Of barley-meal without any oil or frankincense. The ingredients in general consisted of flour, barley-meal, or green ears of corn, oil, frankincense, and salt. The most ancient meat-offerings were those which were composed of fine flour unbaked. The offering of Cain is supposed to have been of this description. It was prepared in this way. A quantity of oil having been put into a vessel, some flour was mixed with it, and an additional quantity of oil was poured over it. The mixture was then put into the holy vessel, in which it was to be carried to the altar, and oil was poured upon it again, and a quantity of frankincense. The offering thus prepared was carried to the altar, where it was waved and salted, and part of it laid upon the fire. The rest was eaten by the priests. When the Hebrews had entered Canaan, where this meat-offering was appointed to accompany all the voluntary burnt-offerings of beasts, as well as the daily morning and evening sacrifice, a certain quantity of wine was substituted instead of frankincense. All the priests who attended on this occasion, received an equal share of the meat-offering; but the baked meat-offerings belonged to the priest alone who ministered at the altar. The unbaked meat-offering was called an offering made by fire, although by some writers it has been supposed to have been an expiatory sacrifice, because what remained was to be eaten by the priests.

The second species of meat-offering, which we have characterized as baked in a flat pan, consisted of fine flour unleavened, kneaded with oil, thus forming a cake which was divided, part of it being offered to God, and part given to the priests. In the case of the third species, which was baked in a frying-pan, the oil was not kneaded with the flour, but simply mixed with it, thus forming a moist cake, a part of which was separated from the rest by the priest, who burned it upon the altar before the other part was eaten. The fourth species, which was baked in an oven, consisted of two kinds, being either thick unleavened cakes, or thin like wafers. In thick cakes the flour and the oil were kneaded; but if they were thin, the oil was spread upon them in the form of the Greek kappa, before they were baked, or, as some suppose, after they came out of the oven.

No meat-offering laid upon the altar was allowed by the law of Moses to be leavened; nor was honey to be mingled with it, but simply a small portion of salt, that it might be seasoned. The meat-offerings were generally combined with other sacrifices, such as burnt-offerings or peace-offerings, but never with sin-offerings. The fifth species of meat-offering, which was presented alone, was either used in a case of extreme poverty, when the offerer was unable to procure any other victim, or in the case of a wife suspected of unfaithfulness to her marriage vows. This, which was a humbler kind of meat-offering, consisted of the tenth part of an ephah of barley-meal, without any oil or frankincense. It was substituted in the case of the poor for a sin-offering.

Meat-offerings were either public or private. The public meat-offerings were three in number: (1.) The twelve loaves of show-bread, which were set before the Lord every Sabbath, and when removed were eaten by the priests. (2.) The two wave-loaves offered at Pentecost. (3.) The first-fruits of the harvest. (See HARVEST, FESTIVAL OF.) The meat-offerings for private persons included the daily meat-offering of the high-priest; the meat-offering of initiation, which every priest was appointed to bring when he entered upon his office; the poor man's meat-offering, which was accepted instead of a sin-offering; and the meat-offering of the suspected wife.

MECCA, the chief city of Arabia, and from time immemorial the sacred city of the Arabs. It has been alleged to have been built in the time of the patriarchs shortly after Hagar and her son had been dismissed from the house of Abraham. The Amalekites are said to have founded the city, and to have taken Ishmael and his mother under their protection. In a short time the Amalekites were expelled by the proper inhabitants of the place, and Ishmael, having married the daughter of the ruling prince, gave origin to the ancestors of the Arabs. Mecca is specially remarkable as containing the BEITULLAH (which see), or celebrated temple in which stands the KAABA (which see). The city is also particularly famous as having been the birth-place of Mohammed, the founder of the faith of Islam. Among the ancient Arabians it was the resort of pilgrims from all parts of the peninsula, and such was the importance attached to this rite of pilgrimage, that four months in every year were dedicated to the observance. Business was suspended, wars ceased, and multitudes, clad in the garb of pilgrims, repaired to the sacred city, went round the Kaaba seven times, in imitation of the angelic host, touched and kissed the sacred stone, drank and made ablutions at the well of Zemzem, in memory of Ishmael, and having performed these hallowed ceremonies, the pilgrims returned home to resume their wonted occupations. Mohammed, accustomed from his childhood to revere the pilgrimage, and to attach a special sacredness to any one who had performed it, adopted the ceremony as a part of his own system, specially commanding his followers to regard Mecca as holy ground, and to observe the pilgrimage as a sacred duty, if in their power to perform it. The city is thus described by Burckhardt: "Mecca is in a narrow, sandy valley, within hills of moderate elevation, barren, and wholly destitute of trees. Still it is more cheerful than most eastern cities, because the streets have purposely been made wide for the passage of the pilgrims, but the only open space is the sacred enclosure. It is strange that a city that exists only for pilgrims has no caravanserais to accommodate them. The far-famed Kaaba, so called as being nearly a cube, towers above all the low, flat-roofed dwellings, though no more than forty feet high. From time immemorial a place of pilgrimage, its erection is traced up to Adam. The Deluge of course washed it away, and it is said to have been rebuilt by Abraham. Still the actual edifice has not the prestige of antiquity, for it has been renewed eight times, and as far as could be with the old materials, a reddish sandstone. Its unique appearance bears out the tradition that it has been scrupulously restored after the original design. The last was nearly washed away by a torrent which inundated the town, and the present was erected as late as 1624, by Amurath IV.; and indeed whatever dignity it derives from the enclosing arcade it owes to the piety of the Turkish Sultans. It was rebuilt while Mohammed was a private individual, and it is curious that he should have been the person chosen to lift the black stone into its place."

MECCA (PILGRIMAGE TO), a sacred ordinance of the Mohammedan religion, required to be observed at least once in a man's life, but only provided he has sufficient means to defray the expenses of the journey. It is expressly commanded in the Koran, and such was the importance which the Arabian prophet attached to the performance of this duty, that he declared a believer neglecting this pilgrimage, if it was in his power to undertake it, might as well die a Jew or a Christian. From all parts of the East, accordingly, thousands of Mohammedan devotees, having made all due preparation on the month Du'kaada, set out on their journey to Mecca. When within a few stages of the sacred city, they assume the Ithram or sacred dress, consisting of one piece of cloth wrapped round the loins, and another thrown over the shoulders. Some are clothed in this fashion from the very commencement of their journey, but it is not imperatively required until the pilgrim approaches the city. He commences the ceremony with bathing and shaving the head. He then makes a prayer of two inclinations, asks a blessing on his undertaking, and ends with the Lebik, or a declaration of readiness to obey, which ought to be continually in his mouth during the performance of the pilgrimage. He must kill no animals, not even the smallest insect, otherwise he must expiate his sin by the sacrifice of a sheep. The head must be uncovered, unless in the case of old age or sickness. The pilgrims are of both sexes, the only ground of exemption from the Hadj being inability to undertake the journey, and it is declared by Moslem casuists, that even where a believer is incapable he must perform the duty by deputy, and pay all his expenses. To have accomplished the pilgrimage, and thus earned the title of Hadjj, is accounted one of the highest honours a man can attain in this world. For nearly a quarter of a century the pilgrimage was rendered impossible by the outrageous conduct of a heretical Mohammedan sect, called the CARMATHIANS (which see), who attacked the caravans, plundered the holy city, and carried off the black stone. It was again interrupted at a more recent period by the Wahabees, who destroyed the tomb of the prophet, and committed other acts of violence. Mohammed Ali, however, the energetic pacha of Egypt, reduced this rebellious tribe to subjection, and restored the pilgrimage, which had for a time been discontinued.

The numbers of pilgrims who annually resort to the sacred city has been variously estimated, some rating them at 30,000, and others as high as 100,000. Burekhardt calculated their amount when he was present at 70,000, and Lieutenant Burton at 50,000, the latter adding, that, in the following year, the number was reduced one half. The first act of the pilgrim when he finds himself within the gates of Mecca, is to visit the mosque, where he commences his sacred exercises. On entering, he prays with four rakaats to salute the mosque, and in gratitude for having reached the holy city. He then goes forward and touches, and if the crowd permits his coming near enough, he kisses the black stone. He then commences the circuit, which is repeated seven times, the first three rounds at a quick, and the other four at a more moderate pace, repeating all the while certain prayers, and at each circuit kissing both stones. Having completed the appointed circuits, he stands with outstretched arms and prays for the pardon of his sins; he then performs two rakaats at Abraham's station, and drinks of the well of Zemzem. "He is now conducted," borrowing the account of Burekhardt the traveller, "to a small ascent, called the hill of Safa, to take the sai, that is, a walk along a level street, six hundred paces long, to Merona, a stone platform. He has to walk quick, and for a short space to run, and during the course, which is also repeated seven times, he must pray aloud. He may now shave his head; but as the course is fatiguing, that ceremony is generally postponed. The course is in imitation of Hagar's running backward and forward. It is indispensable to visit, on the ninth day, Mount Arafat, or knowledge, so called because Adam and Eve are said to have met here, after their long separation, on their expulsion from Paradise. It is meritorious to perform this expedition of six hours on foot; some were engaged in reciting the Koran or prayers, while the worldly and impudent quarrelled with their camel drivers. The hill was entirely covered, for in addition to the pilgrims, the inhabitants of Mecca and of Jidda consider it their duty to attend. At three in the afternoon the Kadhi took his stand, and read a sermon till sunset, at intervals stretching forth his hands to invoke the divine blessing on the immense multitude, who rent the air with shouting in return the Labik, 'Here we are at thy disposal, O God! Some were crying and beating their breasts, and confessing themselves to be grievous sinners, in the style of an American camp-meeting, while others mocked them, or smoked with oriental gravity, and some to intoxication with forbidden hemp. The Kadhi's shutting his book was the signal for a general rush down the hill, as it is thought meritorious in pilgrims to quicken their pace. The tents had been previously packed up, and the caravan was ready to return. According to a tradition, there are 600,000 beings present, angels making up the deficiency of human attendants. The night was passed at an intermediate station, Mazdalifa, in prayer and reciting the Koran, and here a shorter sermon was read, between the dawn and sunrise. The multitude then returned to the valley of Mina, where each pilgrim throws, in three places, seven small pebbles, in imitation of Abraham, whom God is said to have instructed thus to drive away the devil, who endeavoured to interrupt his prayer, and to tempt him to disobey the command to sacrifice his son. This ceremony over, they slay their victims, and feast on them with their friends, giving what remains to the poor, but using no sacrificial rites, only saying, 'In the name of the merciful God!' and 'God is great!' Burekhardt calculated that the pilgrims, on the occasion to which he refers, must have sacrificed 8,000 sheep and goats.

After spending two days more on the sacred spot, on each of which they repeat the throwing of the pebbles, they now prepare for closing the pilgrimage by shaving their heads, cutting their nails, and burying the hair and parings, after which they make a circuit of the Kaaba for the last time, and perform once more the hurried walk from the hill of Safa. The devotional spirit which the pilgrims display is often deeply touching, and amidst the thousands who are assembled every year in Mecca, there are numbers who have come in the full expectation of being cured of their diseases, and not a few who, feeling their end approaching, wish to die within sight of the Beitullah, or house of God, or to breathe out their last sigh on holy ground.

MECCA (TEMPLE OF). See BEITULLAH.

MEDIATOR, one who interposes between two parties who are at variance, with the view of effecting a reconciliation. In Sacred Scripture it is applied to the Lord Jesus Christ, who came in as a daysman or Mediator between sinful man and his offended Creator. Thus in 1 Tim. ii. 5. we are assured that "there is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus." No truth is more strikingly developed in all the various forms of Paganism, both ancient and modern, than this, that there is a settled conviction in the mind of man of the necessity of a Divine Mediator. In all ages, and in all nations, such an impression has invariably prevailed. The scriptural principle, that without shedding of blood there is no remission of sins, is a recognized principle of the religion of nature, as well as of revelation. The early prevalence of sacrifice, not only among the Hebrews, but among the Canaanites, and other heathen nations, showed in the plainest and the most convincing manner, that the universal belief of man has ever been, that it is only by the surrender of life that man can be again restored to the favour and friendship and fellowship of his God. "Whence then," says Mr. Faber, "could originate this universal practice of devoting the first-born either of man or beast, and of offering it up as a burnt-offering? Whence but from a deep and ancient consciousness of moral depravation? Whence but from some perverted tradition respecting the true Sacrifice, to be once offered for the sins of all mankind? In the oblation of the first-born originally instituted by God himself, and faithfully adhered to both by Jew and Gentile, we behold the death of Him who was the first-born of his virgin-mother, accurately, though obscurely exhibited. And in the constant use of fire, the invariable scriptural emblem of wrath and jealousy, we view the indignation of that God who is a consuming fire, averted from our guilty race, and poured upon the immaculate head of our great Intercessor and Mediator."

We find the idea of a Mediator pervading the most ancient forms of heathenism. Thus in the ancient religion of Persia, if Ormuzd and Ahriman are essentially at variance and struggling for the mastery, Mithras acts as Mediator between the two, defending man against Ahriman and his devs, who are ever seeking to injure and even destroy him. In the early religion of India, we find in the Rig-Veda, the myth of Agni, the mediator of the Aryans of the Indus. "He is the immortal among mortals, their companion, their cherished friend, their near kinsman, who seats himself beside their fires, and upon whom they found their hopes as upon a fire." Here then is a mediator God, who becomes man for the good of humanity, the friend of mankind, their king, their prophet, their life, their sacrificer, their intercessor. There was no period, indeed, in the history of the Indo-Aryan people, when altars were not reared and sacrifices offered. In the Brahmanic period, the notion of an external Mediator, who should manifest himself in human form, is conveyed in the avatars or incarnations of Vishnu. The saint of the Chinese, who forms the principal subject of one of the books of Confucius, involves the same idea, being a man who, by his humility, his charity, his moral perfection, has become a God. He was a Divine man, the mediator between heaven and earth, who offered himself in sacrifice to conquer evil and take away sin from the world. Numberless instances might be adduced from the religions both of ancient and of modern times, which clearly point to the notion of a Mediator, as deeply embedded in the human mind.

MEDAL (MIRACULOUS), a medal which is extensively circulated among Romanists, both in Europe and America, as accomplishing wonderful cures. The origin of this medal is thus described by the Abbé Le Guillon, in a work devoted to the subject, which was published at Rome in 1835: "Toward the end of the year 1830, a well-born young female, a novice in one of those conservatories which are dedicated in Paris to the use of the poor and the sick, whilst in the midst of her fervour during her prayers, saw a picture representing the most Holy Virgin (as she is usually represented under the title of the Immaculate Conception), standing with open and extended arms: there issued from her hands rays of light like bundles, of a brightness which dazzled her: and amidst those bundles, or clusters of rays, she distinguished that some of the most remarkable fell upon a point of the globe which was under her eye. In an instant she heard a voice, which said, 'These rays are symbolical of the graces which Mary obtains for men, and this point of the globe on which they fall most copiously is France.' Around this picture she read the following invocation, written in letters of gold:—O Mary, conceived without sin, pray for us who have recourse to you.' Some moments after, this painting turned round, and on the reverse she (the Estatica) distinguished the letter M, surmounted by a little cross, and below it the most sacred hearts of Mary and Jesus. After the young girl had well considered the whole, the voice said, 'A medal must be struck, and the persons who wear it, and who shall say with devotion the inscribed short prayer, shall enjoy the very special protection of the Mother of God.'"

This supernatural intimation accordingly was obeyed, and, under direction of the archbishop of Paris, a medal was struck, and a large supply was ready against the invasion of the cholera. The Abbé gives a full account of the cures which the medal had effected, and the wonders it had wrought, winding up the whole by the statement, "Finally, from all parts we hear the most consoling facts. Priests full of the spirit of the Lord tell us, that these medals are reviving religious feeling in cities as well as country places. Vicars-General, who enjoy a well-merited consideration, as well for their piety, and even distinguished bishops, inform us that 'they have reposed every confidence in these medals, and they regard them as a means of Providence for awakening the faith which has slept so long in this our age.'"

MEDINA, a town in Arabia, held in considerable veneration among the disciples of Islam, as being the burial-place of Mohammed. It occupies a far inferior place to Mecca in the estimation of the faithful. There is no obligation upon the pilgrims to visit Medina, and accordingly, few do so except the Turks in whose route it lies. The great mosque, which includes the prophet's tomb, is described as very splendid, being surrounded by numerous pillars of marble, jasper, and porphyry, on which letters of gold are inscribed in many places. The tomb itself is plain, and on each side of it are the tombs of the two early Caliphs, Abubekr and Omar. Near this spot also repose the ashes of Mohammed's beloved daughter, Fatimah, and of many of his companions who are revered as saints. A visit to Medina is no doubt quite voluntary, but such a visit raises the reputation of a pilgrim.

MEDITRINA (Lat. mederi, to heal), a goddess worshipped by the ancient Romans, as presiding over the healing art. An annual festival was celebrated in her honour. See next article.

MEDITRINALIA, a festival observed by the ancient Romans, every year on the 11th of October, when for the first time the new wine was drunk, which was supposed to have a healing power, and therefore to be connected with the goddess MEDITRINA (which see).

MEDUSA, one of the GORGONS (which see).

MEGABYZI, described by Strabo as eunuch priests in the temple of Artemis at Ephesus.

MEGÆRA. See EUMENIDES.

MEGALESIA (Gr. Megalē theos, great goddess), a festival celebrated at Rome in ancient times, in honour of Cybele, the mother of the gods. It was observed annually in the month of April. The statue of the goddess was first introduced at Rome in B. C. 203, but the festival did not begin to be held until B. C. 191, at the completion and dedication of the temple in honour of Cybele. The Megalesia, consisting of games, feasting, and rejoicing, commenced on the 4th of April, and continued for six days. To such an extent, however, did some Roman families carry their luxury and extravagance on this occasion, that it was found to be necessary for the government to issue a public decree limiting the expenditure to a certain amount. The Megalesian differed from the Circensian games in being chiefly theatrical. The third day of the festival, indeed, was wholly devoted to scenic representations. At the games, which were presided over by the curule ædiles, slaves were not allowed to be present, and the magistrates were dressed in purple robes.

MEGALOCHEMI, the highest rank of monks, or the order of the Perfect in the Greek church.

MEGARA (SCHOOL OF), a school of philosophy in ancient Greece. It was founded about B. C. 400, by Eucled, who, while he had chiefly cultivated the logic of his master Socrates, had previously studied with the Eleatics, and imbibed their principal doctrines. He is said to have limited truth to identical propositions. The Megarian school held all existence to be included in the primitive unity, but considering the subject rather in a moral than in a metaphysical aspect, they maintained the absolute being to be the absolute good. But their speculations, characterized rather by acuteness and subtlety than accuracy of thinking, appear to have produced no perceptible influence on the mind of Greece.

MEGILLOTH, a division of the Hebrew Scriptures adopted by the Jews, and including the Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther, which they term the five rolls or volumes. There is a Targum on the Megilloth, which, however, probably belongs to a late period, not earlier indeed than the sixth century. See TARGUM.

MEGMA, an assembly or council of Imāms or Doctors of the Law, among the Mohammedans.

MEHIDIVIS, a Mohammedan sect in India, who take their name from believing their Wali or saint to have been the promised Mahdi or MAHDI (which see). This pretender, who claimed to be descended from Hossein, the son of Ali, was born at a small town near Benares, in the year of the Hegira 847, and declared himself at the black stone at Mecca about A. D. 900, to be the Mahdi or twelfth Imām, an expectation of whose appearance prevails among the Mohammedans all over the East. After his death, which took place in Khorasan A. D. 910, his followers dispersed without however surrendering their belief in the reappearance of their deceased leader as the long-expected Mahdi. This sect was subjected to a severe persecution by Aurangzebe. They are still found in small communities in various parts of India, as in Gujerat, the Deccan, and Sindh.

MEILICHIUS, a surname of Zeus, as the god that can be propitiated, under which name altars were reared to him in various towns of Greece. It was also a surname of Dionysus, under which he was worshipped in the island of Naxos. The term was applied, besides, to several deities, who were wont to be propitiated by sacrifices offered at night.

MEIRUN, the term used to denote the oil of CHRISM (which see), in the Greek church.

MELÆNIS, a surname of Aphrodité, under which she was worshipped at Corinth.

MELANÆGIS, a surname of Dionysus, under which he was worshipped at Eleutheræ and at Athens.

MELANCTHONIANS. See ADIAPHORISTS.

MELCARTHUS, a god anciently worshipped by the Tyrians, being, as the word signifies, Lord of the city. From Herodotus we learn, that his temple was built at the same time with the city, and was enriched with so many donations, and was so famous, that he went thither on purpose to see it.

MELCHISEDEK (THE ORDER OF), an order of priesthood mentioned by the Apostle Paul, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, as higher as well as more ancient than the order of the Aaronic priesthood under the Mosaic economy. Melchisedek appears to have been the only individual who held the office of high-priest by Divine appointment before the giving of the law. And in the statement of the apostle that Jesus Christ was "a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedek," may be perceived a beautiful propriety, for, unlike the Levitical priesthood, the sacred office was combined with regal authority in the case of Melchisedek, thus clearly pointing him out as a striking type of our High Priest, of whom it was prophesied by Zechariah, "He shall be a priest upon his throne;" and, besides, the priesthood of Melchisedek was more honourable, being instituted previous to, and independent of, the Mosaic economy, and one to which, as we learn from the reasoning of the apostle in Heb. vii., the Levitical priesthood was distinctly subordinate; for separated, as Melchisedek is declared to have been in point of descent from all around him, he is considered as receiving tithes from those who, though not yet born, were represented by their progenitor Abraham. "And," says the apostle, "as I may so say, Levi also who received tithes, paid tithes in Abraham;" thus distinctly admitting the superiority of the priesthood of Melchisedek to their own; and the reasoning in the subsequent verses displays to us still more clearly the striking propriety of our Lord's connection with this order in preference to that of Aaron. "For if," he argues, "perfection," or, in other words, the perfection of the whole Divine economy in regard to our world, "had been by the Levitical priesthood," under whom they received the law, in which they seemed to rest as the consummation of the whole scheme; if such had been the case, "what further need was there that another priest should rise after the order of Melchisedek and not after the order of Aaron." If the Divine purposes are fully accomplished in the law, why change the order of the priesthood, since such a change, as the apostle remarks, must bring along with it a "change also of the law." By this mode of reasoning we are not only taught that the whole of the Jewish economy has been abrogated by the gospel, but we are presented with a most interesting view of the priesthood of Christ. He was not called after the order of Aaron, for this simple reason, that he would have thereby formed a part of an imperfect and symbolical system, and thus the antitype would have been confounded with the type. And by his connection with the order of Melchisedek, our High Priest was identified with an economy independent of the temporary institutions of Moses, and, accordingly, it is said, "He was made not after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an endless life." And though the law having accomplished its purposes was abrogated, and, of course, the institution of the priesthood destroyed, this man, being independent, not merely of death, by which the functions of individual priests were terminated, but being independent of the whole order of the Levitical priesthood, notwithstanding of its dissolution, "this man," it may well be said, "because he continueth ever hath an unchangeable priesthood." And in the very nature of his consecration was involved the everlasting durability of his priestly office, for the decree of appointment by Jehovah was couched in these words: "Thou art a Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedek;" and being confirmed in this everlasting appointment by the oath of Him with whom there is no variableness neither shadow of change, we are brought to the comfortable and delightful conclusion, that we have an everlasting and unchangeable High Priest, appointed of God as was Aaron, but called after the order of Melchisedek.

MELCHISEDEKIANS, a sect of Christians which arose in the second century, deriving their name from the fact that they held Melchisedek to be the power of God, and superior to Christ; and that he sustained the office of an intercessor for the angels in heaven as Christ for men on earth. This sect was afterwards revived in Egypt by the HIERACITES (which see), who maintained still further that Melchisedek was the Holy Ghost.

MELCHITE CHURCH, a name applied to the Greek-Catholic church, or to those Romanists in Asia who are attached to the rites and ceremonies of the Greek church. The American missionaries estimate the total number of the Melchites at between 30,000 and 40,000 souls, having 12 bishops and 180 priests. The term Melchites, which is derived from the Syriac word melcha, a king, was applied in the sixth century as a term of reproach by the Jacobites to the orthodox Greeks, implying that they were king-followers, or that it was imperial influence alone which led them to subscribe to the canons of the council of Chalcedon, condemning the Eutychian heresy. The name thus commenced in scorn has been appropriated to those converts to Rome who still observe the ceremonies of the Greek ritual. This community probably originated in the labours of the Jesuits at Aleppo, in the seventeenth century, who perceiving the unwillingness of their converts to conform to the Latin church, with their usual duplicity and cunning, persuaded the Pope to sanction a compromise, whereby the Melchite church should acknowledge the authority of Rome, but adhere to the liturgical rites and ceremonies of the Eastern church, renouncing, however, the characteristic dogma of the Greeks, that the procession of the Holy Spirit is from the Father only. In all other points they conform to the Eastern church. They keep firmly by the "old style," and regulate all their feasts and fasts by the Oriental calendar. In all their churches in Syria they conduct Divine service in the Arabic, which is the vernacular tongue. They receive the communion in both kinds, and use unleavened bread in the Lord's Supper. Their priests are permitted to marry before ordination; but their bishops must remain unmarried. No restriction is put upon the laity in the use of the Sacred Scriptures. Dr. Wilson, in his 'Lands of the Bible,' mentions them as "amongst the most liberal and intelligent native Christians in the East."

The adherents of the Melchite church are chiefly found at Aleppo and Damascus, particularly at the latter town, where the patriarch resides. Their cathedral at Damascus, which is remarkably splendid, is thus described by Mr. Graham in a letter to Dr. Wilson: "The building inside is elegant, and on festival days, when brilliantly lighted up, the scene is grand and imposing. The floor is beautifully variegated marble. The roof is ornate and lofty, is supported by a row of stately marble columns on either hand as you go in, and between these and the exterior walls are the female galleries. Seats there are none, save a few chairs around the walls and encircling the altar. Hundreds, I might almost say a thousand, silver lamps fill the house with insufferable brightness; while priests, clothed in rich Oriental costume, are walking in solemn procession, and filling the house with incense almost insufferably pleasing, and accomplishing the service before the altar and in the neighbouring recesses. The people, meantime, are not idle. There is no order. They go and come just as they please. Some are kneeling and beating their brows before the picture of a favourite saint; others are gazing on the Virgin and her infant, and muttering inarticulate prayers; some are squatting on the marble, crossing, and bowing, and adoring before a hirsute monk of the olden time; some are standing upward making awkward genuflections, and at intervals prostrating their foreheads on the stone floor; some are talking with one another; all are intent, each at his own business whatever it is, and all is done aloud or in a mumbling muttering voice. Quiet silent prayer is not known or practised in the East. The bells are ringing, the priests are reading the service with a loud voice, and with the rapidity of lightning the censers are waving to and fro, filling the house with odour; the people are kneeling, standing, sitting, muttering prayers, talking, prostrating, weeping, sighing, beating their breasts, making the common prayer (so called.)—a scene of sound and confusion without parallel, save in the synagogues of Safed and Tiberias."

There are two orders of monks among the Greek Catholics in Syria, and connected with the monastic establishments there are no fewer than 250 monks and 90 nuns, while the number of regular priests belonging to the body, in so far as Syria is concerned, does not exceed fifty-five. The people are more generally able to read than the other Christians, though the Greek Catholics have few schools of their own. Some years ago a college was founded for the sect, but the building having been destroyed during the Druze war, it has never been rebuilt. Dr. Wilson mentions having found a section of the Melchite church in Egypt also; and at Cairo, he tells us, he was introduced to their bishop, who is said to have under his superintendence about 4,000 souls.

In other parts of the East the Greek Catholics conform to the Romish church more completely than their brethren in Syria, and in public worship they use not the Greek, but the Latin ritual. At Constantinople there are 500 families belonging to this sect, chiefly the remains of Italian conquests in the East, and most of them emigrants from foreign countries. Unwilling to acknowledge the authority of the Armenian Catholic patriarch, who, by his firman, is head of all the Catholics, they made application to the Porte for permission to choose a head of their own. The petition was granted, and thus the Greek Catholics became an independent sect in Turkey, and chose a Mussulman as their deputy to communicate in their behalf with the Porte. Thus documents are issued in the name of the community, called Latins; they follow the Roman rite; and Roman priests baptize, confess, and bury them, though they are recognized subjects of the Turkish government. They are independent both in civil and ecclesiastical affairs, being ruled civilly by a Mussulman, and ecclesiastically by an Italian bishop and vicar-apostolic sent from Rome to be their ruler in spiritual matters under the Pope.

MELETE, the name of one of the Muses (which see).

MELETIANS AT ANTIOCH. Amid the violent dissensions caused throughout the East by the Arian controversy in the fourth century, the Church of Antioch was subjected for a long period to the most agitating trials. About A. D. 330, Eustathius, bishop of Antioch, had been deposed from his office by the Eusebians, a branch of the Anti Nicene party, but a majority of the members of the church still adhered to him. A series of Arian bishops, however, succeeded the deposed prelate, and the Christian of Antioch were split into two parties, some separating themselves meanwhile from the church, and worshipping as a distinct community, under the name of EUSTATHIANS (which see), while others, though mainly agreeing in sentiment with the seceders, preferred submitting to the Arian bishops who were thrust upon them against their will. Athanasius, when passing through Antioch on his return from his second exile, acknowledged the Eustathians as, in his view, more consistent in their actions than the Arianizing party. On the translation of Eudoxius, A. D. 360, from the bishopric of Antioch to that of Constantinople, Meletius, then bishop of Sebaste in Armenia, was chosen as his successor. This man, who had risen to considerable fame, had been brought up in the communion of the Arians, and as one of their party, he had been appointed to the see of Sebaste, and now promoted to the see of Antioch, chiefly at the instigation of Acacius. Being naturally of a mild, amiable, and benevolent disposition, taking no part in the angry controversies which were carried on around him, but calmly and faithfully labouring in his ministerial work, the Arians and Arianizers of his day mistook his silent and gentlemanly demeanour for an acquiescence in their heretical views. But Meletius was not long in undeceiving them. The circumstances in which he unexpectedly showed his entire sympathy with the orthodox party, are thus detailed by Dr. Newman in his 'Arians of the Fourth Century': "On the new patriarch's arrival at Antioch, he was escorted by the court bishops, and his own clergy and laity, to the cathedral. Desirous of solemnising the occasion, the Emperor himself had condescended to give the text, on which the assembled prelates were to comment. It was the celebrated passage from the Proverbs, in which Origen has piously detected, and the Arians perversely stifled, the great article of our faith; 'the Lord hath created [possessed] Me in the beginning of His ways, before His works of old.' George of Laodicea, who, on the departure of Euxodius, had rejoined the Eusebians, opened the discussion with a dogmatic explanation of the words. Acacius followed with that ambiguity of language, which was the characteristic of his school. At length the patriarch arose, and to the surprise of the assembly, with a subdued manner, and in measured words, avoiding indeed the Nicene Homousion, but accurately fixing the meaning of his expressions, confessed the true Catholic tenet, so long exiled from the throne and altars of Antioch. A scene followed, such as might be expected from the excitable temper of the Orientals. The congregation received his discourse with shouts of joy; when the Arian archdeacon of the church running up, placed his hand before his mouth to prevent his speaking; on which Meletius thrust out his hand in sight of the people, and raising first three fingers, and then one, symbolized the great truth which he was unable to utter. The consequences of this bold confession might be expected. Meletius was banished, and a fresh prelate appointed, Euzoius, the friend of Arius. But an important advantage resulted to the orthodox cause by this occurrence; the Catholics and heretics were no longer united in one communion, and the latter were thrown more into the position of schismatics, who had rejected their own bishop. Such was the state of things, when the death of Constantius occasioned the return of Meletius, and the convocation of the council of Alexandria, in which his case was considered."

Thus scarcely a month had elapsed after his entrance on the see of Antioch, when Meletius found himself deposed and in exile. Eustathius in the meantime had died, but his party suspecting Meletius of Arianism, from the character of the persons who had procured him his bishopric, remained aloof from him, and continued as a separate body under the presbyter Paulinus, who had officiated for some time as their pastor. Lucifer of Cagliari, who was sent to Antioch to heal the disputes, widened the breach among the orthodox by ordaining Paulinus as bishop of the Eustathians. Thus was laid the foundation of a schism of the most important kind, the Western and the Alexandrian churches declaring in favour of Paulinus, and the Oriental church chiefly in favour of Meletius. It had been the earnest desire of the Alexandrian council to combine the two sections of the orthodox party by uniting the Eustathians and the Meletians, but their wishes and their exertions were frustrated by the rash conduct of Lucifer, who afterwards gave rise to another schism, founding a separate party in the church, called the LUCIFERIANs (which see), which lasted about fifty years.

The Meletian schism continued for a long period. Athanasius and the Egyptian churches fraternized with the Eustathians, and all the more as Meletius refused to communicate with Athanasius. In this opposition to the Meletians, the Egyptian were joined by the Western churches and those of Cyprus. The Eastern Christians, on the contrary, adhered firmly to the Meletian party. Meletius presided at the second general council at Constantinople A.D. 381. and from his venerable age, as well as his consistent opposition for many years to the Arian heresy, he was selected by the Emperor Theodosius to consecrate Gregory of Nazianzen bishop of Constantinople. During the sittings of the council, Meletius died, and Chrysostom deeming this a favourable time for putting an end to the unseemly schism which had for many years rent in twain the orthodox party, successfully exerted his influence with the Egyptian and Western churches in favour of Flavian, the successor of Meletius, and thus terminated the Meletian schism.

MELETIANS IN EGYPT, the name of a party which existed in the Christian church in Egypt in the third and fourth centuries, and which was headed by Meletius, bishop of Lycopolis, in the Thebaid. The dispute which led to the formation of this schism had regard to the best mode of proceeding ecclesiastically in the case of those Christians who had fallen away during the Diocletian persecution. The subject had been already discussed under the Decian persecution, and Cyprian had laid down the principle (see LAPSED CHRISTIANS, that all who had in any way departed from the faith should be excluded from the fellowship of the church until peace was completely restored, and if up till that time they had manifested a spirit of sincere contrition, they should then, but not before, be delivered from church censure. Meletius, who had been thrown into prison for the cause of Christ, maintained among his fellow-prisoners the principles which had been previously taught by Cyprian; while Peter, bishop of Alexandria, pleaded for a more lenient course, particularly towards Christian slaves, who had been compelled by their masters to offer sacrifice instead of them. This latter prelate had for some special reasons abandoned his flock for a time, and Meletius having obtained his freedom from prison, exercised his authority in Egypt as the second metropolitan, in the absence of the bishop Peter, and travelling through the whole diocese of the Alexandrian patriarch, he ordained and excommunicated at pleasure. "He did not recognize," says Neander, "the official power of those to whose charge, as Periodontæ, or visitors, the bishop Peter of Alexandria had committed the destitute communities. Their different views respecting the proper mode of treating those who had fallen, or who had become suspected of denying God in some way or other, was here, too, probably made a subject of discussion, or at least used as a pretext; since the Meletians boasted of representing the pure church of the martyrs. Four Egyptian bishops, among the imprisoned confessors, declared themselves firmly against the arbitrary proceedings of Meletius, who, however, took no notice of this protestation. The bishop Peter of Alexandria issued a writing to the Alexandrian church, wherein he bade all avoid fellowship with him, until the matter could be more closely investigated in connection with other bishops; and at length he excluded him—probably after his own return—from the functions of the episcopal office, and from the fellowship of his church, as a disturber of the peace of the communities. Also, subsequently to the martyrdom of the bishop Peter, A. D. 311, and in the time of the bishop Alexander, under whom the Arian controversies broke out, this schism still continued to exist."

Epiphanius says, that when Meletius was delivered from prison, he was banished to the mines of Phenon in Arabia Petraea; and it would appear that even while thus labouring as a slave, he diffused his principles among his fellow-bondmen. He ordained bishops, presbyters, and deacons, and kept his followers a distinct body under the title of 'the Church of the Martyrs.' At length the council of Nice, A. D. 325, found itself necessitated to take into consideration the best mode of putting an end to the Meletian schism. The subject was fully discussed, and after careful deliberation, the council decided that Meletius should still be permitted to hold the title of bishop of Lycopolis, without, however, having power to ordain either in the city or the country. It was arranged, however, that the clergy who had been already ordained by Meletius should retain their offices, but should be regarded as inferior in rank to those who had received ordination at the hands of the bishop of Alexandria. Meletius died soon after the council of Nice, and his followers having after their leader's death refused to submit to the decrees of the council, were persecuted by the bishop of Alexandria. John Arcaph was chosen to succeed as leader of the sect, and under him the schism continued. But it was not very creditable to the Meletians, nor favourable to their reputation for orthodoxy, that they co-operated with the Arians in opposing Athanasius. This schism did not terminate before the fifth century. In the account we have given of the Meletian schism, we have chiefly followed the statements of Epiphanius, in preference to those of Athanasius, who was the avowed enemy both of Meletius and his party.

MELIBCEA, a surname of PERSEPHONE (which see).

MELICERTES. See PALEMEN.

MELINAEA, a surname of APIKODITE (which see).

MELISSA, a priestess of the Delphian Apollo. It was also a surname of Artemis as the goddess of the moon.

MELISSÆ, the nymphs who nursed the infant

Zeus. The word came afterwards to be applied to priestesses in general, and more especially to those of Demeter.

MELITENIAN LEGION. See LEGION (THE THUNDERING).

MELITONIANS, a heretical Christian sect which arose in the early part of the fifth century, founded by a person named Melito; of whom all that has been ascertained is, that he taught the strange doctrine that God is corporeal, having a body like man, and this he founded on the statement of Sacred Scripture, that man was originally created in the image of God. See ANTHROPOMORPHITES.

MELLONA, a divinity among the ancient Romans, who was believed to be the protector of honey.

MELPOMENE, one of the nine Muses (which see).

MELPOMENUS, a surname of Dionysus at Athens.

MEMORIA, a name given among the ancient Christians to a church built over the grave of a martyr, and intended to be a memorial of him.

MEMRA, a word often used by the Chaldee Paraphrasts on the Books of Moses. It denotes literally the Word, and is substituted instead of the sacred name of Jehovah, while they attribute to it all the attributes of the Deity. Some suppose that by the Memra they meant the Second Person of the Trinity, more especially as it was Memra, they tell us, who appeared to Abraham at Mamre, to Jacob at Bethel, and to Moses on Mount Sinai.

MEN, a god among the ancient Phrygians, who presided over the months.

MENÆON, a Service-Book in the Greek church, which contains the hymns and particular services for the saints, and for the festivals as they occur in the year according to the calendar. It includes also an account of the life and actions of each saint added to his particular office. The whole work consists of twelve volumes folio, being one volume for each month.

MENAGYRTÆ, a name applied to the AGYRTÆ (which see), or priests of the goddess Cybele, because every month (Gr. men;) they made their collections from the people.

MENANDRIANS, the followers in the first century of Menander, the disciple and successor, as was alleged, of Simon Magus. From the testimony of Irenæus, Justin Martyr, and Tertullian, we learn that Menander claimed to be one of the Æons sent from the upper world, or the Pleroma, to succour the souls which were enduring here in material bodies, and to enable them to bear up against the machinations and the violence of those demons by whom the world is governed. He promised to his followers that if baptized in his name, they would be incorruptible and immortal, and have the benefit of an immediate resurrection. Epiphanius says, that this heresy was so absurd that it never prevailed to any great extent.

Its founder died A. D. 80, and nothing more was heard of his strange doctrines. See SIMONIANS.

MENDÆANS, or MENDAI IJAHI, disciples of John the Baptist, sometimes called also Christians of St. John, but better known in ecclesiastical history as Hemero-Baptists, or daily Baptists, from their frequent washings. In 1780, M. Norberg, a Swede, read to the Royal Society of Gottingen a memoir in reference to this sect, which was supplemented in the following year by some observations from M. Waleh, tending to prove their identity with the disciples of John the Baptist. Their language approaches that of the Talmudical Jews, being evidently a dialect of the Chaldee or Syriac. There are found near Bussora, a city between Arabia and Persia, from 20,000 to 25,000 families belonging to this sect. On inquiry M. Norberg ascertained that there was a branch of the Mendæans still existing in Syria at El Merkab, about a day's journey east of Mount Libanus. They call themselves Galileans, and their number is said to amount to about 14,000. M. Norberg received an interesting account of this people from Germanus Conti, a Maronite of Mount Lebanon, who was deputy of his patriarch in Syria. We quote the words of Conti as taken from his own mouth by M. Norberg: "These Galileans formerly dwelt, in sufficient wealth and plenty, in that which is called the Holy Land; but about a century and a half ago, they quitted that country to settle in a tract of Libanus called Mecab. They claim John the Baptist as their founder, and seem to hold a middle station between Jews and Christians. The following are their rites. He who presides in sacred things, wears a vest and tiara both of camel's skin. They also take honey and locusts, alternately, sacramentally: which are distributed as consecrated elements to the worshippers present, and are sent to the absent, equally, as a religious rite: both these kinds of food being taken with the greatest reverence. The day on which this is done is held sacred. It is proper to abstain from worldly occupations, whether of business or of pleasure. A few words are allowed, but those pious: and if more, they relate to the same subject. So also, once a-month, they have an exhortation in their place of worship; and to this they flock with eagerness. The chief topic of this discourse is the 'Light of the World,' always introduced with sentences like those of the Evangelist, 'In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God.' This they apply to John, and deny to Jesus, Messiah; whom they do not allow to be Son of God, but a prophet, and a follower of John. Their places of worship are void of all ornament. They contain neither pictures nor statues.

"Baptism, the rite of initiation, is performed in the open air, in a large vessel, a mat serving as a screen to the place, at the earliest dawn of day: the middle part of the day is proper to honey and locusts: and, at the close, at the time of divine worship, they light lamps and candles, and solemnly repeat these words: 'John, whom we here worship as our father, (instructor) we beseech thee to be propitious to us; to protect us from every hostile power, and to enlighten our minds with the light of the true religion, as thou hast commanded us to light these luminaries.' After discharging this duty, whoever can proceeds to partake of the sacrament already described. Those also who are detained at home do the same; although the duty be done in private. Twice a-week, i. e. on Sunday and Thursday, this is never omitted. And the priest, whether standing at the altar, or going up into the pulpit, puts on his official clothing for the shoulders and the head. He also holds in his hand a staff; and delivers an exhortation beginning in the Galilean language, but proceeding in Arabic. Of their ancient language all, except the priests, and a few who have learned it, are extremely ignorant. But they can say prayers by memory, and can repeat certain passages from the sacred volume; during which time the doors are closed, and proper persons are placed at the entrance. During the whole time the utmost respect and silence is preserved: the head of the devout is inclined forwards, and the hands are folded together.

"Besides this, they also dedicate to John four festival days in a-year. On the first, which is his birth-day, they dress wheat, they eat grapes, nuts, honey, and locusts, with other things intermingled. And this, in large dishes filled to the brim, it is customary freely to offer, or to place before one another. Nor do they take any other food than this during this day. After this, the whole having been well prepared, having been sanctified by prayer, and having gone round the whole congregation (of which every person present takes part of this vegetable fare into his own dish, raising his head and singing) they all make a liberal donation to the priest.

"On that day, when John instituted his Baptism, they repeat this sacred ordinance. They proceed in a body to the water, and among them one who bears a standard; also, the priest, dressed in his camel's hair ornaments, holding a vessel of water in his hand (Jydria in manu est) he sprinkles each person singly as he comes out of the river, saying, 'I renew your baptism in the name of our father and saviour John: who in this manner baptized the Jews in the Jordan, and saved them; he shall save you also. Last of all, he immerses himself in the water, for his own salvation. After this, the whole assembly resort to the place of worship, singing hymns, where they partake of honey and locusts, administered by the priest.

"And further, on the day on which John was decapitated, every one laments at the place of worship in these mournful terms: 'Our most excellent leader was on this day slain by command of Herod, and his cruelty!—well he deserves to be consumed (by fire). O God, hear us!'

"Finally, On that day when, as it is believed, John slew a dragon of wonderful size, which issued from the Lake of Tiberias, and did much mischief, they practise a ceremony of leading their cattle and sheep in troops round the place of worship, with great joy. But the memory of this miracle is celebrated in Galilee by those who have ability and wealth sufficient; they resort to the spot barefooted; taking their sick with them, who hope to recover health by favour of their patron; and when arrived there, they lay them in the place of worship. This they do in their old residence, which is distant a day's journey from Mount Tabor."

De la Valla supposes that these Christians may possibly be the remains of the ancient Jews who received the baptism of John the Baptist. They allege, indeed, that from him they received their faith, their religious books, and their customs. But their religion seems to bear a later date, being evidently a compound of the Jewish, Christian, and Mohammedan systems, and the Arabian prophet is actually mentioned by name in some of their books. The chief of their sacred writings is called Divan, which, however, contains no history of the sect, but chiefly moral and spiritual treatises. M. Norberg, after an investigation of the subject for forty years, published five volumes quarto of their writings,—1815—1818.

MENDELSONIANS. See ANTI-TALMUDISTS, JEWS (MODERN).

MENDES, a deity worshipped among the ancient Egyptians in the town of Mendes, which was situated at the Mendesian mouth of the Nile. This god was worshipped under the emblem of a goat, which, according to Jablonski, denotes the generative power of nature, especially of the sun. There is no doubt, however, that the term Mendes was used to describe both the hieroglyphical goat and the holy city of Pan. The worship of Mendes was afterwards transferred from Northern to Southern Egypt, and the name of the deity was changed to Mont.

MENDICANT ORDERS. In the beginning of the thirteenth century, two men, in different places about the same time, conceived the idea of founding a new religious society on an entirely novel principle, which was, that all the members should subsist wholly upon alms. To establish this kind of communism, Francis of Assisi organized an institution of Mendicant friars in Italy under the name of FRANCISCANS (which see); and a short time afterwards Dominic, a native of Castile in Spain, formed another fraternity of the same kind in the south of France, which received the name of DOMINICANS (which see). Both these communities bound themselves to possess no property, either individually or in common, but to depend for their livelihood entirely upon begging, and never to acquire even in this way more than was sufficient for the supply of a single day. The see of Rome, at first, declined to countenance the movement, but it was so generally regarded with favour by the people, that in A. D. 1203, Innocent III., found himself obliged to sanction the society and rule of the Franciscans; and in A. D. 1216, his successor, Honorius III., confirmed the order of the Dominicans. These societies rapidly obtained extensive popularity. The Mendicant monks found ready access to all classes of society, even the humblest. They knocked at every door, entered every cottage, accommodated themselves to the manners and even the prejudices of the working classes. To extend their influence still more widely they adopted the plan of admitting the laity to a connection with their society under the name of Tertiaries, such persons being bound by no monastic vow, but simply pledged to promote, as far as possible, the interests of the order to which they had become attached, while they themselves were living in the world and engaged in their ordinary occupations. In the middle of the thirteenth century there was almost no place, certainly no province, in which the Dominicans and Franciscans had not their Tertiaries, and thus the Mendicants exceeded in influence all other monks.

The high estimation in which the new orders were held led to the increase of their numbers to such an enormous extent that all Europe swarmed with begging monks, and they became a burden, not only to the people, but to the church itself. It soon appeared to be absolutely necessary to check the enormous growth of these monastic establishments. Pope Gregory X., accordingly, in a council which he assembled at Lyons in 1272, decreed the suppression of all the religious orders which had sprung up since the days of Innocent III., and thus the "extravagant multitude of Mendicants," as Gregory described them, was reduced within narrow limits, including only the Dominicans, the Franciscans, the Carmelites, and the hermits of St. Augustine or Augustinian Monks. And the reason for this papal interference had become so strong as to force itself upon the attention even of the most careless observer. Their progress, both in numbers and influence, was not only rapid, but for a time wholly unimpeded. Young men, even of the higher classes of society, eagerly connected themselves with one or other of the Mendicant orders. They threatened, in fact, to overthrow the established constitution of the church and the fundamental rules of the universities. One seat of learning, however, that of Paris, at length set itself to resist the unreasonable encroachments of the Mendicants. Pope Alexander IV. issued several bulls deciding in their favour against the Parisian university, which, in its turn, was ably defended by William of St. Amour, who denounced the monks as precursors of Antichrist, as mock-saints and hypocrites, having no other aim than to bring the whole influence of the church under their control. A controversy now ensued, the cause of the Mendicants being supported by some of their most distinguished men, such as Bonaventura, Albertus Magnus, and Thomas Aquinas. The monks prevailed, and the work which William of St. Amour wrote against them was condemned by Alexander IV. in 1255, while he himself was banished from France, but was afterwards brought back from exile under Clement IV. The contest on the subject of the Mendicant friars now passed away, but the university of Paris still maintained the same spirit of freedom which had long characterized its learned men.

Abuses of the most flagrant kind sprung up among the Mendicants, which attracted the notice even of their warmest admirers and friends. Thus Bonaventura, when appointed in 1256 general of his order, published a circular letter addressed to the presiding officers in the several provinces, calling upon them to do their utmost to remove the abuses which had crept in. Amid all the corruptions, however, which were gradually introduced into the Mendicant orders, the main idea on which they were founded, that of evangelical poverty, became so predominant in its influence, that multitudes of people refused to receive the sacrament at any other hands than those of the Mendicants. Thus the ordinary priests were completely superseded, and for three centuries the two chief orders professing the vow of poverty, the Dominicans and Franciscans, exercised absolute control both in church and state, filled the most distinguished offices ecclesiastical and civil, taught in the universities and churches with undisputed authority, and advanced the interests of the Papal government with the utmost zeal and success.

Notwithstanding the prestige which thus attached to the Mendicant monks, we find Nicholas of Cusa, in his book on the Corruptions of the Church, composed in 1401, representing these very monks as the genuine successors of the Pharisees described in the gospels, who, under a show of holiness, concealed all manner of wickedness. They were ravening wolves, he says, in sheep's clothing, who put on, for outside show, severity of life, chastity, humility, holy simplicity, but in secret abandoned themselves to the choicest pleasures, to a dainty variety of luxurious enjoyments. Such was the character of the beggarly friars, who were overrunning every country of Europe in the thirteenth century, and found their way even into England, where they spread with alarming rapidity. Their progress was resisted, though with little success, by the university of Oxford and the parish priests, who saw their rights encroached upon by the spiritual labours of these monks. In this contest Archbishop Richard of Armagh distinguished himself by his freedom of thought. One of the first symptoms of the reforming spirit which displayed itself in England was hostility to the begging-monks. From the first, Wycliffe was their avowed enemy, and they, on the other hand, were the most zealous and the most influential organs of the Romish hierarchy. They were, beyond all question, the fiercest enemies of the intrepid English reformer. In the year 1376 they extracted from his lectures, writings, and sermons nineteen propositions, which they marked as heretical, and sent them to Rome that they might there be condemned. In the course of the following year, accordingly, Gregory XI. issued three bulls, declaring the nineteen propositions to be heretical, and some of them to be not only inconsistent with the Catholic faith, but subversive of public order. Thus, at the instigation of the Mendicant friars, the Pope called upon the king, the bishops, and the university of Oxford to proceed against Wycliffe, and had not the duke of Lancaster placed himself at the head of his protectors the reformer's career would have been brought to an immediate and violent termination. To the last he loudly protested against the Mendicant orders. As he lay on a sick-bed in 1379, they dispatched a deputation to admonish him in view of death to retract what he had said against them. Too weak to rise from his bed, Wycliffe caused his attendants to raise him up, and collecting his last energies, he addressed the monks in these words. "I shall not die, but live, and ever continue to expose the bad practices of the begging-monks." His valuable life was prolonged contrary to the expectations of his friends; and as time rolled onward he became more vehement every day in his opposition to the Mendicants. In a paper put forth in 1382, he declared that he could point out fifty heresies and more in their orders. He charged them with setting up ordinances of men above the commandments of the living God, following a mode of life which was wholly at variance with the example of Christ, abridging the liberty wherewith Christ had made his people free, and disturbing the regular parish priests in the exercise of their sacred calling.

Both the Lollards in England, and the Hussites in Bohemia, found the Mendicants to be their bitterest and most violent opponents. The monks themselves, however, in turn were viewed with the utmost suspicion and dislike, not only by the bishops and priests, but even by the pontiffs. This was more particularly the case with the Dominicans and Franciscans. The more rigid of the latter order, who were commonly called Fratricelli, revolted from the Pope and the Romish church, bringing down upon themselves the thunders of the Vatican. About the middle of the fifteenth century, Nicholas V. violently persecuted them, and even committed many of them to the flames. Succeeding pontiffs followed the same course, but none of them more resolutely than Paul II., who punished numbers of the rebellious Fratricelli with imprisonment and exile. The two leading sects of the Mendicants abounded in every part of Europe, and by their arrogance and impudence, their superstition and cruelty, they alienated the minds of the people generally from them. They held the highest offices in the church, were ghostly confessors in the courts of all the kings and princes of Europe, filled the principal chairs in the universities and schools; and yet by their persecution of the learned and the good, for example, Erasmus, Reuchlin, and others, by the promotion of their own interests at the expense of others, by their pride, insolence, and disgraceful conduct, these very Mendicant Orders, which had once occupied a high place in the estimation both of the church and the world, were mainly instrumental in driving multitudes to seek deliverance from the tyranny of Rome, and to demand the reformation of a corrupt and degraded hierarchy.

From the very first institution of their societies, the Mendicant Orders had carried on an unceasing warfare among themselves, and with other monastic institutions, particularly the Jesuits. No sooner had the Dominicans and Franciscans been deprived of their respective founders by death, than that most unseemly rivalry and contention commenced between them for precedence, which continued for centuries. This protracted warfare had been preceded by a thirty years' controversy between the Sorbonne and the Mendicants, which was only terminated by the interference of the Pope, ordering the university to concede all the demands of the monks. The Molinist controversy also between the Dominicans and the Jesuits, the keen dispute among the Franciscans about the prophecies of Joachim, and last of all the fierce opposition of the Fratricelli to the power and authority of the Papal See, all show that Rome has had no worse enemies than the Mendicant Orders, which for a time she fondly nursed, until warmed into life and vigour, they have sought the ruin of their benefactor and friend. But amid all the wrongs which they have inflicted upon the Romish church, multitudes of these lazy mendicant friars are found begging in every Roman Catholic country, and claiming a character for sanctity founded on their rags and wretchedness. St. Francis was wont to call the begging of alms "the table of the Lord." At one time many of the cities of Europe were portioned out into four parts, the first being assigned to the Dominicans, the second to the Franciscans, the third to the Carmelites, and the fourth to the Augustinian monks. Luther himself, when he belonged to the last-mentioned order, was obliged to beg alms daily in the town of Erfurth. Though professing to adhere to their vow of poverty, the rapacity of the mendicant monks in many places excited general disgust. In the famous petition, called 'the Supplication of Beggars,' presented to Henry VIII., complaining of the encroachments of the mendicant friars, their revenues are stated at £43,333 per annum, besides their temporal goods; and the supplicants add, that "four hundred years past these friars had not one penny of this money." The same grasping avaricious spirit has characterized the Mendicant Orders down to the present day. Travellers in Romish countries generally, but more especially in Italy, are eloquent in their denunciations of these indolent, useless monks, who devote themselves to a life of mean and sordid dependence upon the industrious portion of the community.

MENE, a goddess in ancient Greece, who presided over the months.

MENELAÏA, a festival celebrated at Therapue in Laconia, in honour of Menelaus and Helena, both of whom were ranked among the gods by the Lacedæmonians.

MENI, a word which occurs in Is. lxy. 11, "But ye are they that forsake the Lord, that forget my holy mountain, that prepare a table for that troop, and that furnish the drink offering unto that number" (Meni). It has been regarded by many commentators as referring to a heathen god. Professor Jahn thinks it may mean fate or destiny, or perhaps may be identical with the god MANAH (which see), worshipped by the ancient Arabians. The term however means "number," as in the handwriting on the wall in Belshazzar's palace, and in this view some Jewish writers interpret the passage in Isaiah as implying, "you fill your mixed liquors for Meni," that is, you offer many cups of this delicious wine according to your number of guests.

MENNONITES, a sect of ANABAPTISTS (which see), originated in Holland in the sixteenth century by Menno Simonis. This individual, who became famous in his day, was born in 1505 at Witmarsum in Friesland. Having been educated for the church, he was ordained in his twenty-fourth year as a Romish priest. On one occasion while performing mass, he was seized with doubt whether the bread and wine even after consecration could be the real body and blood of Christ. At first he tried to dismiss the thought as a temptation of the devil, but it often recurred with increasing strength. He applied himself to the perusal of the New Testament, and in course of time his views completely changed, and he began to preach evangelical doctrines to the great edification of his hearers. His attention having been directed to the subject of infant baptism, he came to the conclusion, after much study and earnest prayer, that there is no direct warrant for such a practice in the Word of God. In 1536 he resigned his priestly office, and renounced all connection with the Church of Rome. Though Menno thus felt himself necessitated to abandon Romanism, he was not prepared to sympathize cordially with all those who like himself had lifted their protest against corruption and error. To his peaceful and conciliatory disposition it was deeply painful to witness the extravagancies into which too many of the Anabaptists had run. The disturbances of Munster particularly distressed him. Upon inquiry, however, he learned that multitudes of the Anabaptists themselves, while agreeing with their brethren in regard to their views of the doctrine of Scripture, refused to co-operate with them in those turbulent and insurrectionary practices which had no other effect than to bring disgrace upon the cause they espoused. A considerable number of godly and peaceable persons, accordingly, holding firmly the religious principles of the Anabaptists, urged earnestly upon Menno to become their teacher.

At length he consented, and for many years he continued, amid many dangers and discouragements, much poverty and privation, faithfully to discharge the duties of this office. Animated by fervent zeal he laboured with unwearied activity in Friesland, Guelderland, Holland, and Germany, as far as Livonia, either planting and strengthening Anabaptist churches, or reducing them to order, until in 1561 he died at Oldesloe, in the duchy of Holstein.

The Mennonites had now become a large and flourishing sect. The warm piety, the indomitable energy, and the unbending integrity of their founder, commanded everywhere the highest respect, and by the combination in his own person of so many estimable qualities, he succeeded in gathering round him a numerous body of devout and consistent Christians drawn chiefly from among the more moderate Anabaptists. Those who still bear the name of Mennonites claim to be descended from a party of the Waldensers, who, driven by persecution, left Piedmont in the end of the twelfth century, and fled into Flanders, Holland, and Zealand. But the Mennonites, properly so called, can be traced no farther back than Menno Simonis in the sixteenth century, and while they undoubtedly sprung from the Anabaptists, they dissented in several important particulars from the general body bearing that name. They disowned all expectation of a kingdom of Jesus Christ to be set up in the world by violence and the destruction of civil authority. They disclaimed the expectation of another Pentecostal effusion of the Holy Spirit, by which the church would be restored to its original purity. They condemned the licentiousness of polygamy and divorce. They renounced all belief that the Holy Spirit would impart to believers in these latter days the extraordinary gifts which belonged to apostolic times. The common doctrines held by the Anabaptists were retained by the Mennonites, such as the unscriptural and invalid character of infant baptism, the doctrine of the Millennium or thousand years' reign of Christ before the end of the world, the inadmissibility of magistrates in the Christian church, and the unlawfulness of wars and oaths.

Towards the middle of the sixteenth century a controversy arose among the Mennonites on the subject of excommunication, a party having arisen among them, who maintained that all transgressors, even though penitent, should be at once expelled from the church without previous admonition, and in addition to this they held that the excommunicated ought to be deprived of all social intercourse with even their nearest and dearest relatives. The consequence of this dispute was, that the Mennonites were split into two sections, called respectively by the names of die Feinen, the Fine, and die Groben, the Coarse. The latter section inhabited chiefly a district in North Holland, called Waterland, and hence they were often called Waterlanders. They were also termed Johannites, from John de Ries, who, in 1580, was mainly instrumental in preparing a Confession of Faith, declaring the opinions of the body, though it was never admitted as an authoritative document. The severer sect, again, called the Fine, chiefly inhabited Flanders, and hence they received the name of Flemings or Flandrians. A dispute soon after arose among the Flandrians themselves, as to the offences which properly incurred excommunication, and in consequence two sects arose out of the Fine Mennonites, who were called respectively Flandrians and Frieslanders. A third sect, who had chiefly come from Germany and settled in Holland and the Netherlands, received the name of Germans. In course of time, however, the greater number of the Frieslanders, the Flandrians, and the Germans became merged in the Waterlanders, while only a very few remained as a separate body under the name of Old Fleming Baptists. Of these there are only three congregations still existing in Holland.

From their commencement, the sect properly called Mennonites were exposed to frequent persecution, and compelled to flee from one country to another. They were dispersed accordingly over different parts of Europe, particularly Russia, Prussia, and Poland, though their principal seat has always continued to be Holland. Many were obliged also, at an early period, to emigrate to America, where a considerable number of the body are still found.

The Mennonite Confessions of Faith which have appeared are far from exhibiting a unity of doctrine. Thus on the important article which regards the Person of Christ, the Confession of the United Flemish, Friesland, and other Mennonites, adopted A. D. 1632, exhibits no deviation from the sentiments of the orthodox churches; but in a 'Summary of Christian Doctrine,' published by the Rev. J. Gan, the Mennonite minister at Ryswick, we find an exhibition of undisguised Arianism in these words: "The incarnate Son of God is set forth to us as inferior to the Father, not only in his state of humiliation, but in that of his exaltation, and as subject to the Father. It must, however, be kept in view, that notwithstanding the incarnate Son of God is inferior to the Father, he is, nevertheless, according to the purposes of the Most High, partaker of glory with the Father, and an object of religious trust and confidence in like manner as the Father." Such a statement all too plainly shows, that a party, at least, of the Mennonites had sadly fallen away from the purity of their more ancient Confession of 1632. And not only do some appear to have held Arian views, but the 'Summary' contains also low Arminian views on the doctrine of justification. Thus "God is so well pleased with the perfect obedience of the sinless Saviour, that he will consider the anguish and pain to which the Saviour freely submitted, and particularly the death of the cross, as equivalent to the punishment the guilty had deserved; and, as the reward of the Saviour's merits, he will bestow upon those whom the Saviour acknowledges as his own, an abundant share of bliss hereafter. This is the effect of God's previous mercy and love. The sufferings of the Saviour in no respect tended to move God to a favourable disposition towards mankind; but these sufferings were endured to show his holy aversion to sin, and to give to the world the strongest proofs of his mercy; and thus to inspire the penitent with a perfect confidence in him their heavenly Father. Christ died for all men in this sense; and that all men without exception might partake, upon conversion and faith, the salvation obtained by him. This salvation is universally and unrestrictedly offered in the preaching of the gospel: none are excluded but by their own fault. That which makes us partakers of the benefits of his death and sufferings is the union we have in his sufferings, his merits, and in his glory."

One of the distinguishing tenets of the Mennonites, as indeed of all the Anabaptists, has always been the denial of the validity of infant baptism. They delay the administration of the ordinance until children reach the age of eleven or twelve, when they usually perform it by pouring water upon the head of the person baptized. In some respects this sect resembled the Society of Friends. Thus they reckoned it unlawful to take oaths in any circumstances, or to bear arms. They held the doctrine of non-resistance to injury, and maintained that it is improper to engage in lawsuits, even to obtain deliverance from wrong. They considered it to be inconsistent with the Christian character to aspire after worldly dignity, or to accept of the office of a civil magistrate. Their views on these matters have undergone considerable modification.

The churches of the Dutch Mennonites are constituted on the Congregationalist model, acknowledging no other ecclesiastical authority than that of the ministers and deacons of each church. Most of their places of worship are endowed, but they accept no support from the State. The number of deacons in each church varies from six to twenty, according to the number of the members, and they are appointed sometimes for life, and sometimes for five or six years. There are also deaconesses in each church, whose duty it is to attend to the female poor. Divine service is conducted in the same way as in the Reformed churches, and in some cases a collection is made in the middle of the sermon, two bags being carried from pew to pew by the deacons, the one bag being for the poor, and the other for the expenses of public worship.

The Mennonites in Holland form one undivided Christian body, and associations of churches are held chiefly about the time of Easter at different places. In North Holland they were formerly convened every year, but their meetings are now held less frequently, and some of the churches decline all connection with the Associations. There is a Mennonite college at Amsterdam, in which some of their ministers are educated, while others have not enjoyed the privilege of a liberal education. The pastors are elected in some places by the members of the church, and in others by the elders and deacons. Many of the churches have no pastors, but are supplied either by their own elders, or by the neighbouring ministers. Occasionally one minister supplies several churches.

The difference which exists both in doctrines and practices among the Mennonites are thus noticed by Mosheim: "The opinions and practices which divide the principal associations of Mennonites, if we admit those of less importance, are chiefly the following:—

I. Menno denied that Christ received from the Virgin Mary that human body which he assumed; on the contrary, he supposed it was produced out of nothing in the womb of the immaculate Virgin, by the power of the Holy Ghost. This opinion the Fine Anabaptists or the old Flemings still hold tenaciously, but all the other associations have long since given it up. II. The more rigid Mennonites, after the example of their ancestors, regard as disciplinable offences, not only those wicked actions, which are manifest violations of the law of God, but likewise the slightest indications either of a latent inclination to sensuality, or of a mind disposed to levity and inclined to follow the customs of the world; as, for example, ornaments for the head, elegant clothing, rich and unnecessary furniture, and the like; and they think that all transgressors should be excommunicated forthwith and without a previous admonition, and that no allowance should be made for the weakness of human nature. But the other Mennonites hold that none but contemners of the divine law deserve excommunication, and they only when they pertinaciously disregard the admonitions of the church. III. The more rigid Mennonites hold that excommunicated persons are to be shunned as if they were pests, and are to be deprived of all social intercourse. Hence the ties of kindred must be severed, and the voice of nature must be unheeded. Between parents and their children, husbands and their wives, there must be no kind looks, no conversation, no manifestation of affection, and no kind offices, when the church has once pronounced them unworthy of her communion. But the more moderate think that the sanctity and the honour of the church are sufficiently consulted, if all particular intimacy with the excommunicated is avoided. IV. The old Flemings maintain that the example of Christ, which has in this instance the force of a law, requires his disciples to wash the feet of their guests in token of their love; and for this reason, they have been called Podonipte [Foot-washers]. But others deny that this rite was enjoined by Christ."

Towards the middle of the seventeenth century, a party of Mennonites in Friesland obtained some celebrity under the name of Ackcrvallists, being so called from their leader, who taught not only that the strict discipline of Menno ought to be retained, but that there is some reason to hope for the salvation of Judas and the others who laid violent hands on our Saviour. The errors here referred to are no longer held by any church or congregation among the Mennonites. The Waterlanders have in great measure renounced the rigid opinions of the early followers of Menno, and indeed scarcely differ either in opinion or practice from other Christians. They exist in two communities in Holland, called the Frieslanders and the Waterlanders. The Fleming Church in Amsterdam was split in 1664 into two parties, called from their respective leaders, Galenists and Apostolians. Some years after, the Waterlander Church in Amsterdam united with the Galenists—a party which still exists, but refuses to take the name of Mennonites.

The whole body of Mennonites in Holland does not exceed 150 congregations. In Prussia they number about 14,000 persons, and live principally in the regions of the Lower Rhine. The Dutch Mennonites are chiefly Arminian in their theology, and some have degenerated into Socinianism, and even scepticism. A branch of the body exists in Alsace, mostly in the department of Les Vosges. A hamlet called Salm is exclusively inhabited by them. They are almost all employed in agriculture. They wear a peculiar dress, use neither buckles nor buttons, and let the beard grow. Unmarried women wear the hair loose, but married women gather up the hair and bind it round the head. They baptize youth at the age of eleven or twelve, not by pouring as the other Mennonites do, but by sprinkling. In Russia, there are a few Mennonite churches, numbering not more than 5,000 or 6,000 members in all.

MENNONITES IN AMERICA. Mennonite churches exist in considerable numbers in the United States. Many followers of Menno, on the invitation of William Penn, transported themselves and their families into the province of Pennsylvania as early as A. D. 1683. The emigrants of that year, and those who followed in 1698, belonging to the same body, settled in and about Germantown, where they erected a school and meeting-house in 1708. For some years after, a yearly supply of Mennonite emigrants landed on the shores of America, and before 1735 there were nearly 500 families settled in Lancaster county. The views of the sect were much misrepresented for a time by their Transatlantic brethren, but the prejudices which had been entertained against them were to a great extent allayed by the translation into English, and publication of the Mennonite Confession, which had been originally prepared in 1632 at Dort. This Confession is entirely free from the heretical views which have been generally attributed to their founder, as well as from those errors which were avowed at a later period in the Confession issued by Mr. Gan of Ryswick.

The Mennonites in America have three orders of church-officers—bishops, elders or ministers, and deacons. All of these are chosen by lot. Their pastors receive no salaries, nor remuneration of any kind for preaching the gospel.

The Mennonites have spread over a great portion of Pennsylvania, and throughout the United States generally, as well as in Canada. The congregations in Pennsylvania are divided into three general circuits, within each of which half-yearly conferences are held for the purpose of consulting together, and devising means to advance the prosperity of the entire body. A similar conference is held in Ohio, where the Mennonites are very numerous, being chiefly composed of foreign immigrants. The members of the congregations in Indiana are chiefly from Switzerland. The whole Mennonite population in the United States may probably amount to 120,000, but as they keep no records of membership, it is difficult to state the number of persons actually in communion with the body. It has been calculated, that in all America, they have about 240 ministers, 400 churches, and from 50,000 to 60,000 members.

MENNONITES (REFORMED) IN AMERICA, a new Society of Mennonites which arose in Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, in 1811. It arose in consequence of various individuals belonging to the body having become deeply impressed with the thought, that their brethren had fallen away from their original purity, and did not carry into effect the doctrines they had formerly taught and professed. At first the number who formed a plan of reforming the body was small, but it gradually increased, and after much deliberation and prayer, they chose John Herr as their first pastor. They published a Confession of their Faith, which, though more condensed than the Mennonite Confession of 1632, does not materially differ from it in doctrine, and maintains the same views as to baptism, the Lord's Supper, foot-washing, excommunication, and other practical points. The chief difference between the Reformed and the other Mennonites, seems to be, that the former are more strict and rigid in resisting no evil whatever, in abstaining from oaths of any kind, in separating themselves from all excommunicated persons, and other practices on which Menno Simonis particularly insisted. Like the other Mennonites they do not deem themselves at liberty to keep an account of their members, both from a wish to avoid display or boasting, and also in order to avoid the sin and punishment of David in the matter of numbering the people. The Reformed Mennonites, however, are known to have congregations scattered over many parts of the United States and Canada.

MEN OF UNDERSTANDING. See HOMMES D'INTELLIGENCE.

MENOLOGION, the calendar of the Greek church.

MENS (Lat. mind), a deity worshipped by the ancient Romans as a personification of mind. She had a temple built to her honour on the capitol, and a festival which was celebrated on the 8th of June.

MEPHITIS, a goddess among the ancient Romans, who had a temple in the Esquiline, on a spot which it was considered dangerous to approach. Little is known concerning this divinity, though she may possibly have had some connexion with the mephitic exhalations which abound in some parts of the Roman States.

MERAGE, LEHLAT AL (Arab. the night of the ascension), a night accounted sacred by the Mohammedans as being that on which the prophet made his journey to heaven. They commemorate this ascension on the 28th of the month Regeb.

MERARITES, a family of the Levites on whom devolved the duty of carrying the boards of the Tabernacle, and the bars, and pillars, and sockets belonging to it, as well as the pillars of the court, the sockets, pins, cords, and other utensils. This family, as well as the Gershonites, was under the care of Ithamar; and for their convenience they were allowed to have four waggons and eight oxen.

MERCAVA, one of the divisions of the Jewish CABBALA (which see). It treats of the knowledge of the Divine perfections, and of the celestial intelligences. Masters were not permitted to explain the Mercava to their scholars.

MERCURY, a god who presided over merchandise among the ancient Romans. A temple was erected to him near the Circus Maximus, and a festival was celebrated in his honour on the 25th of May, chiefly by merchants. In later times Mercury was identified with the Greek HERMES (which see). He was also the god of eloquence; hence the people of Lys-stra, as we read in Acts xiv. 12, supposed Paul to be Mercury in disguise.

MERCY FRATERNITY OF, a Romish Society at Lisbon in Portugal, instituted for the purpose of saying masses for the faithful generally, but chiefly for its own members.

MERCY-SEAT, the covering of the ark of the covenant in the ritual ceremony of the Jews. It was made of pure gold, and was of the same length and breadth as the ark itself. At its two extremities were placed two cherubim, with their faces turned towards each other, and somewhat inclined towards the mercy-seat. It appears plain from several passages in the epistles of the Apostle Paul, that the mercy-seat was designed to be a typical representation of Jesus Christ as the grand medium of expiation for the sins of men, as well as the channel through which God holds communion and fellowship with all his believing people.

MERIA-PUJAH, an annual festival among the Khonds in Orissa, in which human sacrifices were offered until lately, when the barbarous practice was forbidden by the British government. The victims, which are called merias, consist of Hindus procured by purchase in the plains by the Panwas, a class of Hindu servitors, who were chiefly employed in supplying victims for their masters, the Khonds. The design of this cruel ceremony is to propitiate RURA-PEN-

SOU (which see), their earth-god, and thus to secure a favourable harvest. The festival was celebrated at Goomsoor, and is thus described in a Madras paper in 1838: "When the appointed day arrives, the Khonds (inhabitants of the hill country) assemble from all parts of the country, dressed in their finery, some with bear-skins thrown over their shoulders, others with the tails of peacocks flowing behind them, and the long winding feather of the jungle-cock waving on their heads. Thus decked out, they dance, leap, and revel, beating drums, and playing on an instrument not unlike in sound to the Highland pipe. Soon after noon the Jani, or presiding priest, with the aid of his assistants, fastens the unfortunate victim to a strong post, firmly fixed into the ground, and then standing erect, the living sacrifice suffers the unutterable torture of having the flesh cut off from his bones in small pieces by the knives of the savage crowd who rush on him and contend with each other for a portion of the gory and quivering substance. Great value is attached to the first morsel thus severed from the victim's body, for it is supposed to possess superior virtues, and a proportionate eagerness is evinced to acquire it.

"Women are sacrificed as well as men. A female found her way into the collector's camp, at Patrimgia, with fetters on her limbs, who related that she had been sold by her brother!

"The Khonds are in the habit of sacrificing children annually at sowing time, in a most cruel manner, for the purpose of propitiating the demon of their worship, and of securing, as they suppose, a good harvest by the blood of their victims.

"In January, just before the turmeric shrub is planted, the Khonds make the sacrifice alluded to. They select as their victims, male children who are devoted from infancy to this purpose, and are sold to the chiefs of the different villages. When the ground is ready, the victim is led forth, bound to bamboos for the better security, and taken into the open plain. The cultivators assemble, and at the supposed auspicious moment, commence the dreadful carnage by hacking with knives the body of the truly pitiable creature: each cutting off a part as quickly as possible, and hastening with it to the field whose fertility is the object to be secured. The blood, in which the Khonds imagine the virtue of the spell to subsist, is then made, by pressure of the hand, to fall in drops upon the soil: and the flesh, not yet cold, is cast into the same ground. In hewing the body great care is taken not to touch a vital part, for should death occur before the blood is dropped on the field, the charm, according to the notions of the people, would be lost.

"Some of the Khonds, on being expostulated with, asked what else they could do, as they should have no crops if they neglected to perform this ceremony."

Through the combined efforts of the government agent, J. P. Frye, Esq., and the missionaries, great numbers of the meria victims have been rescued from the sacrificial knife. In the Report of the General Baptist Missionary Society for 1849, it is stated that Mr. Frye had been instrumental in rescuing 106 victims from the horrid death to which they were doomed. In the same report the following interesting details are given: "The last full moon had been fixed upon for a very great sacrifice, in anticipation of the agent's arrival, (it is the time for sacrificing through the whole sacrificing country,) but he was happily in the midst of them twelve days before the appointed time, and the fearful waste of human life was mercifully prevented. The torture with which the revolting rite is performed in this part of the Khond country exceeds, if it be possible, the worst that has been heard of anywhere. The victim is surrounded by a crowd of half-intoxicated Khonds, and is dragged round some open space, when the savages, with loud shouts, rush on the victim, cutting the living flesh piece-meal from the bones, till nothing remains but the head and bowels, which are left untouched. Death has, by this time, released the unhappy victim from his torture; the head and bowels are then burnt, and the ashes mixed with grain. The efforts of the government to suppress the abhorred rites of human sacrifice and female infanticide among these barbarous people, and in these hills and jungles, are in a high degree creditable to its character. The revolting rites of sacrifice and female infanticide have prevailed from time immemorial in the impenetrable jungles and inaccessible hills of the Khond country. No one can tell where they originated, or compute the frightful waste they have occasioned, but it is estimated that, allowing these bloody rites to have prevailed from the commencement of the Christian era, as they were found to prevail when the district was discovered a few years since, on a moderate computation the awful aggregate would exceed three millions. We have thought, and talked, and prayed about the Khonds, and God has answered our supplications, though in a way we did not expect. Who can calculate the results of so many being brought under Christian influence?" The report of the same Society for 1853, mentions the baptism of fourteen of these rescued children, after giving evidence of sincere conversion to Christ; and it states also that during the year Col. Campbell, the government agent for the suppression of human sacrifices, had rescued 120 victims, and that the chiefs and headmen of the villages had signed an agreement to abandon the inhuman practice.

MERODACH, the name of a divinity worshipped by the ancient Babylonians. The prophet Jeremiah, when speaking of the destruction of Babylon, thus refers to this deity, "Declare ye among the nations, and publish, and set up a standard; publish, and conceal not: say, Babylon is taken, Bel is confounded, Merodach is broken in pieces; her idols are confounded, her images are broken in pieces." Nothing is known concerning the god Merodach;

but we find his name mentioned in Scripture compounded with other words to form proper names, as Evil-Merodach and Merodach-Baladan.

MERU, the old or mythic name among the Hindus of the Himalaya mountains, especially the most elevated parts of them, called the Dwalgiri. This was the world-mountain of the Hindu system of cosmogony, and the most sacred habitation of the gods. The physical universe, as it sprung from the Mundane Egg, was said to consist of three worlds—heaven above, the earth below, and the interambient ether. According to a minute division, the universe consists of fourteen worlds, seven inferior or descending below the world which we inhabit, and seven superior or ascending above it, our world being the first of the ascending series, and its habitable portion consisting of seven circular islands or continents, each surrounded by a different ocean. The central island, destined to be the abode of man, is called Jamba-Dwip, and from its centre shoots up the holy mountain Meru, rising to the height of several hundred thousand miles. This mountain, says Dr. Duff, is "in the form of an inverted pyramid,—having its summit, which is two hundred times broader than the base, surmounted by three swelling cones,—the highest of these cones transpiercing upper vacancy with three golden peaks, on which are situated the favourite residences of the sacred Triad. At its base, like so many giant sentinels, stand four lofty hills, on each of which grows a mango tree several thousand miles in height,—bearing fruit delicious as nectar, and of the enormous size of many hundred cubits. From these mangoes, as they fall, flows a mighty river of perfumed juice; so communicative of its sweetness, that those who partake of it, exhale the odour from their persons all around to the distance of many leagues. There also grow rose apple trees, whose fruit is 'large as elephants,' and whose juice is so plentiful, as to form another mighty river, that converts the earth, over which it passes, into purest gold!"

The base of Meru was supposed to rest upon the abyss of the world-fountain; and regarding the mountain as the cradle of the world, the Hindus not only attached to it peculiar sanctity, but on the sides they excavated little Merus, and inscribed the inside with the hieroglyphical symbols of their faith and hopes. "It was their firm conviction," says Mr. Gross, "that a portion of the essential attributes of the true Godhead lay concealed in the bowels of this Oriental Alp, and that its profound chasms attested his presence and proclaimed his energy. This idea, apparently so extravagant, will cease to excite our surprise, if we steadily bear in mind that this mountain is the Hindu world-mountain; ay, the infinite mundane pillar, or Siva-pillar, in which the divinity of Siva was cosmogonically embodied, and from which the god went forth in the display of his omnipresence and power: as the sun, he rose and set on Meru, and during his reign above the horizon, he was the south pole; while in his subterranean orbit, he represented or expressed the north pole of the Meru-world. Within the profound recesses of this mysterious and wonderful mountain, the gods prepared the life-drink, the prima materia or atomic germs of organic life. Pervaded and animated by an invisible, divine power, it was here that the embryo-world originated, which, when it was fully developed, revealed God in space as the nature of things."

When Shiva first appeared in the beginning of the Kali age, he had come down in a pillar of fire to settle a dispute among the gods upon the subject of precedence. To commemorate this event, the god converted his pillar of fire into the mountain of Meru, that it might be a symbol of his divine presence and protection. The Buddhists, also, have transferred to their system the myth of Meru, which they hold, according to the doctrines of the Puranas, is in the centre of the earth, and under it they believe the Asurs, or giants of Buddhism, reside, while the Yakás or demons dwell upon it. The Tamul nations of Ceylon believe, that, in the earliest wars of the gods, three of the peaks of Meru were thrown down, and driven to different parts of the world; one of them is Trincomalee, which became equally with Kálasa the abode of Shiva. The Hindu tradition is somewhat different. It alleges that at the marriage of Shiva and Parvati, all the gods were present, and the heavens were left empty. Seizing this opportunity, the god of the winds flew to Meru, broke the summit of the mountain, and hurled it into the sea, when it became the island of Lanká or Ceylon. The Buddhists allege, that around and above the summit of Meru are the déva and brahma lókas, the abode of those beings who, in their different states of existence, have attained a superior degree of merit.

MESATEUS, a surname of Dionysus, derived from the town Mesatis, where he was said to have been educated.

MESAUION. See ATRIM.

MESCHIA AND MESCHIANEE, ancestors of the human race, according to the system of the ancient Persians. Ahriman and Ormuzd were the primary principles of creation, and from the antagonism which the universe thus presented man was the only exception. Ahriman, the evil principle, had no other resource but to slay Kaiomorts, the primitive human being, who was at once man and woman. From the blood of Kaiomorts, when put to death, sprang, by means of transformations, Meschia and Meschianee, who were soon seduced by Ahriman, and became worshippers of the Devs, to whom they offered sacrifices. Thus was evil introduced into the world, and the conflict between the good and evil principles extended also to man.

MESONYCTION (Gr. mesos, middle, nyx, the night), the midnight service of the Caloyers or Greek monks, which occupies two hours.

MESSALIANS. See EUCHTES.

MESSAPEUS, a surname of Zeu, under which he was worshipped between Amyclæ and Mount Taygetus.

MESSIAH (Heb. the Anointed), an appellation given to our blessed Lord in the Old Testament Scriptures, answering to the Greek word Christos (which see) in the New. The advent of the Messiah was the frequent and almost favourite subject of ancient prophecy, and at the time of his appearance, a very general expectation prevailed throughout the world, that a remarkable Personage would soon appear in the East, whose coming would be a blessing to mankind generally. In several Pagan writers, accordingly, we find reference to such an individual. Thus Virgil, who lived about the commencement of the Christian era, addresses a poem to his patron, Pollio, who at that time held the office of consul, and in that poem he describes with some minuteness a child who was expected to be born during his consulate, and whose nativity would be an important era in the history of the world. The child was to be of heavenly descent, to bestow universal peace, and to command the whole world; he was to destroy the serpent, and to confer blessings even upon the brute creation. The general expectation to which we have referred, is very strikingly noticed by Suetonius and Tacitus. "An ancient and settled persuasion," says the former writer, "prevailed throughout the East, that the Fates had decreed that Judea about this period was to give birth to such as should attain universal empire;" and almost to the same effect Tacitus says:—"Many were persuaded that it was contained in the ancient books of the priests, that at this very time the East should prevail, and that some power should proceed from Judea and possess the dominion of the world."

While a vague expectation of an important Personage likely to appear, was thus entertained by the heathen, the Jews also fondly cherished the idea of a coming Deliverer, to rescue them from the oppression of the Idumean Herod and his Roman allies. Their views of the approaching Messiah were not a little coloured by the peculiar circumstances in which they were placed. This is ably pointed out by Neander in these words: "By the consciousness of the declining condition of the Theocracy, it is true, that the yearning after the promised epoch of its glorious restoration, and by the feeling of distress under the yoke of foreign and domestic tyrants, the longing after the Deliverer, after the appearance of Him from whom that glorious restoration was to come, the Messiah, had been aroused to greater activity. But the same grovelling sense which led to a misapprehension of the nature of the Theocracy generally, could not fail to lead also to a misapprehension of this idea, which forms the central point and mark towards which the whole Theocracy was aiming. From that worldly sense which was attached to the idea of the Theocracy, and that worldly turn of the religious spirit generally, could only result a secularizing also of the idea of the Messiah. As the great mass of the people were bowed down by the sense of outward much more than of inward wretchedness, disgrace, and bondage, it was chiefly a deliverer from the former whom they expected and yearned after, in the Messiah. The inclination to the supernatural took here an altogether worldly shape; the supernatural, as it pictured itself to the imagination of the worldly heart, was but a fantastic imitation of the natural magnified to the monstrous. Thus the deluded Jews, destitute of a sense for the spiritual apprehension of divine things, expected a Messiah who would employ the miraculous power, with which he was divinely armed, in the service of their earthly lusts; who would free them from civil bondage, execute a severe retribution on the enemies of the Theocratic people, and make them masters of the world in a universal empire, whose glory it was their special delight to set forth in the fantastic images suggested by their sensuous desires."

When the Messiah actually appeared in the commencement of the last year of the reign of Herod the Great, the circumstances connected with his birth corresponded in a remarkable degree with the predictions of the Jewish prophets. Thus he belonged to the tribe of Judah, and was of the house of David. The prophet Micah had fixed upon Bethlehem as the place of the birth of the Messiah, and events over which his earthly parents had no control, led to the literal fulfilment of this specific prophecy. Daniel had pointed out the precise time when the Messiah should come, and when Jesus Christ appeared, the seventy prophetic weeks were approaching to their termination. The prophet Isaiah had foretold that Messiah should be born of a virgin, that he should be "despised and rejected of men, a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief;" and to whom did these predictions apply, but to Jesus of Nazareth? "The correspondence," says Bishop McIlvaine, "between the several particulars related of the death of Christ, and the predictions scattered through the Bible, is extremely striking. The evangelists, in this respect, are but echoes of the prophets. I can give but a rapid sketch. These predictions include the treachery and awful end of Judas; the precise sum of money for which he betrayed his Master; and the use to which it was put. They specify not only the sufferings of Christ, but of what they should consist. That his back should be given to the smiters, his face to shame and spitting; that he should be put to death by a mode which would cause his hands and his feet to be pierced; that he should be wounded, bruised, and scourged; that, in his death, he should be numbered with transgressors, and in his sufferings, have gall and vinegar given him to drink; that his persecutors should laugh him to scorn, and shake their heads, reviling him, and saying: 'He trusted in the Lord that he would deliver him; let him deliver him.' Although it was the custom to break the bones of those who were crucified, and although the bones of the thieves crucified with him were broken, yet it was predicted that 'not a bone of him should be broken;' and moreover, that his garments should be divided, and lots cast for his vesture; that while he should 'make his grave with the wicked,' as he did in being buried like the wicked companions of his death, under the general leave for taking down their bodies from the cross—he should at the same time make his grave 'with the rich,' as was done when they buried him in the sepulchre of Joseph of Arimathea."

In Jesus Christ, and in Him alone, have all the Old Testament predictions concerning the Messiah been fulfilled to the very letter; so that all pretended Messiahs are convicted of imposture. Only one Messiah is spoken of throughout the whole Jewish Scriptures, from the first promise in Genesis to the closing predictions of Malachi. Nor have the prophets limited themselves to general statements, but they have descended to minute particulars, detailing with precision what the Messiah was to do and to suffer. In addition to the character of the incidents and events which compose the history of the life and death of the promised Messiah, they have also connected them with certain times and places, thus making it next to impossible that they could be imitated by a false Messiah. "It was requisite, for instance," as has been well remarked, "that the true Messiah should come into the world before the destruction of the second Temple, because he was to teach there. It was necessary that he should lay the foundations of the church in Jerusalem, because from Mount Zion it was to be diffused over the whole world. It was necessary that the Jews should reject him before their dispersion, because such dispersion was to be the punishment of their wilful blindness. Finally, it was necessary that the conversion of the Gentiles should be his work or that of his disciples, since it is by this visible mark that the prophets point him out. Now that the Temple is no more, Jerusalem is possessed by strangers, the Jews are dispersed, and the Gentiles are converted, it is clear that the Messiah is come; but it is not less manifest that no one else can repeat the proofs which he has given of his coming; and consequently, no one else can accomplish what the prophets foretold would be fulfilled by the Messiah."

Besides, it is plainly intimated in the Old Testament Scriptures, that when the Messiah should appear, the sacrifices and rites of the law of Moses would come to an end. Now, it is a well-known fact, that since the death of Christ, both sacrifice and oblation have ceased. That this is an actual reality no Jew can possibly deny, and he finds it impossible to give a satisfactory explanation, except on the supposition that the Messiah has already appeared. Many moderate Rabbis, accordingly, admit that the Messiah is come, but that on account of the sins of the Jews he lies concealed. Others issue an anathema against every man who shall venture to calculate the date of his coming. Some Jewish writers allege, that a twofold Messiah is to be expected; one who shall appear in a state of poverty and suffering, and another who shall appear in grandeur and glory. The first, it is alleged, will proceed from the tribe of Ephraim, fight against Gog, and be slain by Armilus: the second will arise from the tribe of Judah and family of David, will conquer and kill Armilus, bring the first Messiah to life again, gather together all Israel, and rule over the whole world.

MESSIAHS (FALSE). The prominence which the Jews have always given to the notion of a Messiah, and the constant state of expectation in which they have professed to live, have given rise to many attempts at fraud and imposture, by individuals, who, from time to time, have assumed the title of Messiah, and have, in consequence, found numerous followers among the Jews. That such impostors would appear, our blessed Lord expressly predicted in these words, Matth. xxiv. 11. "Many false prophets shall arise, and shall deceive many." The first in time, as well as the most distinguished in power and influence, was BARCOCHAB (which see), who, assisted by Rabbi Akiba, revolted against the Emperor Hadrian. In the fifth century, another false Messiah appeared in the island of Crete, who received the name of Moses Cretensis. This audacious impostor gave himself out as another Moses, who had come down from heaven to deliver the Jews, by leading them through the sea to the Promised Land. It is scarcely credible that such pretensions should have met with the slightest encouragement. Yet we are informed by the historian Socrates, that so great was the infatuation throughout the towns and villages of Crete, that multitudes followed in the train of this would-be deliverer. On an appointed time, Moses having collected his followers on the top of a rock, multitudes of the men, women, and children plunged headlong into the sea, expecting to be miraculously preserved. But as, of course, many perished in the waters, those who were still safe became aware that they had been the dupes of a flagrant imposture. Meanwhile, Moses found it convenient to secure his own safety by a hasty retreat, leaving his followers to wonder at their own credulity.

During the reign of the Emperor Justinian, in A. D. 530, a false Messiah arose in the person of Julianus, whom the Jews and Samaritans set up as their king. Justinian, however, having attacked the rebels, killed many of them, and taking their pretended Messiah prisoner, beheaded him. In the commencement of the seventh century, Mohammed appeared in Arabia, and finding the Jews a very powerful people in that country, he endeavoured to win them over to his side by professing to be their long-expected Messiah. As long as he had any hope of enlisting the Jews among his followers, he made the site of Jerusalem the spot to which they should turn in prayer; but when he despaired of receiving countenance or support from the Jews, he appointed the Kaaba to be the sacred place towards which the worshippers should ever look. When the Jews rejected him, he fell from his claims to be the Messiah, and declared himself to be the prophet of God sent to restore the only pure faith, that of Abraham, the father at once of their nation and of his own.

Another false Messiah appeared in Spain in the eighth century, under the name of Sercnus, who attracted numerous followers, promising to conduct them to Palestine. The career of this impostor, however, was speedily cut short, he and many of his followers having been put to death by the Saracens. After this no similar pretender appeared for a long period. At length, in the twelfth century, several false Messiahs successively arose in different countries. In A. D. 1137, one appeared in France, and at about the same time another in Persia. Both of them were successful in attracting crowds of ardent admirers, who, however, were speedily dispersed, and the impostors themselves slain. At Cordova in Spain, a Jewish enthusiast occasioned no small commotion in A. D. 1157, by claiming to be the Messiah; and in A. D. 1167, the Jews, in the kingdom of Fez, were visited with severe persecution, in consequence of the appearance of another individual who made similar pretensions, while, in the same year, an Arabian impostor attempted to support his claims to the Messiahship, by pretending to work miracles. Many were caught in the delusion and subjected to severe punishment. Soon after a false Messiah arose beyond the Euphrates, who founded his pretensions on the circumstance, that he was cured of a leprosy in a single night. In A. D. 1174, a magician and impostor, called David Almasser, arose in Persia, who alleged that he was the Messiah, and as a proof of it, he pretended that he could render himself invisible. Notwithstanding this power of escaping from the hands of his enemies, however, he was soon taken and put to death, and a heavy fine was laid upon the Persian Jews. Another of these false Christs made his appearance in Moravia in 1176, and his imposture being readily detected, he was slain. In 1199, a learned Jew came forward in Persia calling himself the Messiah. This impostor, who was called David el David, headed an army, but was taken and imprisoned, and having escaped he was afterwards arrested and beheaded. Maimonides mentions another Jew who made similar claims; but he enters into no details as to the history and doings of this pretender. It would appear that, in the course of the twelfth century, no fewer than ten false Messiahs arose and brought severe trials and persecutions upon the Jews in different parts of the world.

After this period several impostors from time to time appeared, who claimed to be the Messiah promised to the fathers, but they made little impression on the minds of their brethren the Jews. Thus a Jew, named Ismael Sophus, deceived a few persons in Spain in 1497, but he soon perished, and his few followers were dispersed. Three years afterwards a German Jew, called Rabbi Lemlein, declared himself to be the forerunner of the Messiah, and promised his brethren that in the course of a year they should be transferred in a body to Palestine. The disappointment of his expectations in this matter effectually cured him of his delusion. In 1509, a Jew of Cologne alleged himself to be the Messiah; and the same claim was put forth by Rabbi Solomon Malcho, but his fraudulent pretensions were visited with capital punishment by Charles V., the king of Spain. In 1615, a false Messiah arose among the Portuguese Jews in Hindustan; and another appeared in the Low Countries in 1624, who made great pretensions, promising to destroy Rome, and to overthrow the kingdom of antichrist and the Turkish empire.

It is a remarkable fact in the history of the modern Jews, that there are calculated to have arisen since the dispersion no fewer than sixty-four false Messiahs. The most remarkable perhaps of the whole number was Sabbathai Sevi of Smyrna, who declared himself publicly A. D. 1648, to be Messiah of the house of David, who should soon deliver Israel from the dominion of Christians and Mussulmans. "The Messiah," he declared, "is at hand, and ere long will assume the turban and crown of the Sultan as the Cabbala has declared. Then, for some time he will disappear, to seek, in company with Moses, the ten tribes hidden beyond the river Sabbathan, and to bring them back. Then, riding on a lion, descended from heaven, whose tongue is like a seven-headed serpent, he will enter Jerusalem in triumph, after having destroyed a multitude of his enemies by the breath of his mouth. Then will take place the descent of the Jerusalem from on high, adorned with gold and precious stones, in which Messiah himself will offer sacrifices; then shall happen the resurrection of the dead, with many other events which cannot now be revealed." The fame of the false Messiah of Smyrna spread rapidly throughout both Europe and Asia, so that the Jews unwittingly fulfilled the declaration of the true Messiah, John v. 43, "I am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not: if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive." Sabbathai Sevi ended with embracing the faith of Islam, which he openly professed for ten years before his death. From this man arose a sect combining Cabbalistic Judaism with Mohammedanism, under the name of SABBATHAISTS (which see), who survived their founder more than a century; and from them sprung the CHASIDIM (which see) or saints.

The last false Messiah who attracted any considerable number of followers was Rabbi Mordecai, a German Jew, who first set forth his claims in 1682. For a time he succeeded in deluding many, but the fraud was soon detected, and he was under the necessity of escaping from Italy to Poland, where he was lost sight of, and his history from that period is unknown.

MESS-JOINS, a name given formerly in England to chaplains who resided in the houses of the wealthy.

METAGETNIA, a festival celebrated at Melite by offering sacrifices to Apollo, and supposed to be kept in memorial of the emigration from Melite to Dionis.

METANGISMONITES. See HIERACITES.

METATRON, an angel frequently mentioned by the Rabbinical writers, and to whom they ascribe more illustrious prerogatives than to any others of the heavenly host. One Rabbi says, "The angel Metatron is the king of angels." Another alleges that this angel "ascends up to the throne of glory above nine hundred firmaments to carry up the prayers of the Israelites." He is supposed to have been the angel who conducted the Israelites through the wilderness. It has been alleged by some writers that the Rabbies must have regarded the Metatron as a divine and eternal subsistence, in essence and quality corresponding with what Christians understand by the second personality of the Godhead. Various Rabbies consider Enoch to have been Metatron, and one tells us, that when this ancient prophet was in the course of ascending to heaven, the various orders of angels "smelled the scent of him 5,380 miles off, and were somewhat displeased at the introduction or intrusion of a human being into their superior world, till God pacified them by explaining the cause of his translation."

METAWILAH, a heretical sect of Mohammedans, who maintain that the allegorical and not the literal meaning of the Koran is to regulate the opinions of the faithful. These Mohammedan allegorists are principally to be found in the district lying to the south and east of Tyre. Some of them are found also in the regions contiguous to the sources of the Jordan, and in Celo-Syria proper. Like the Persians they are Schütes, and recognize the supreme Imánate of Ali. Dr. Wilson tells us that they are nearly as scrupulously observant of the rites of caste in regard to cleanness and uncleanness as the Hindus.

METHODISTS, a name of considerable antiquity. It was applied in the first instance to a class of physicians who arose about a century before the Christian era, and were so-called because they introduced greater precision and order into the science of medicine. The word was not introduced, however, into ecclesiastical use until the seventeenth century, when it came to be applied to a class of Romanists, who sought to be more precise in their controversies with Protestants. In the same century, we find the term used to denote also certain Protestants who were more strict and regular in their general bearing. Dr. Calamy says, "They called them who stood up for God, Methodists."

For more than a century past the word Methodists is used to denote certain specific societies or denominations of Christians in Great Britain and America.

METHODIST (AFRICAN) EPISCOPAL CHURCH, IN AMERICA. This church is commonly known by the name of the Zion Wesley Methodist connection. The mother church of this denomination was founded in the city of New York in 1796. It arose in consequence of the coloured members connected with the Methodist Episcopal Church in New York feeling their privileges and usefulness diminished by the prejudices entertained against coloured people by the whites. After bearing for a time their degraded situation among their fellow-Christians, they resolved to have a separate meeting on an independent footing. Bishop Asbury gave his consent to the movement, and a temporary place of worship for the coloured people connected with the Methodists was speedily obtained, where the services were conducted stately by three licensed preachers in the interval between the Sabbath services in the white Methodist Church. In this way they avoided all interference with the regular hours of worship among their brethren, while they enjoyed the privilege of a separate service of their own. At length in 1799, the number of coloured members had increased to such an extent, that they resolved after mature deliberation to form themselves into a separate and distinct religious body, under the name of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, though still under the government of the Methodist Episcopal Church. A place of worship was erected by them accordingly in New York by the name of the Zion Church.

The African Methodist Episcopal Church having been now established as a separate religious body, an agreement was formally entered into, whereby they were rendered distinct from the whites in their temporalities, but under the spiritual control of the white General Conference. Matters continued in this state for a number of years, and the coloured Methodists rapidly increased both in numbers and influence. At length, in 1820, the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church passed a resolution, the effect of which would be, were it carried into effect, to give the preachers more power over the temporalities of the church. This resolution was received with great dissatisfaction by a large body of the white Methodists, and it was viewed with still greater alarm by the coloured Methodists, who felt convinced that it would prove a serious hindrance to their prosperity and success, by transferring their property into the hands of Methodist preachers in Conference. To protect themselves, accordingly, against this dreaded result, the coloured Methodists lost no time in withdrawing Zion church from the control of the white bishops and Conference.

Thus rendered entirely independent of their white brethren, the African Methodist Episcopal Church proceeded to make their own ecclesiastical arrangements. Not having ordained ministers among them to take pastoral charges, they elected elders to act in place of ministers. At the same time they appointed a committee to form rules of discipline drawn from those of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The body was now joined by several other churches, and on the 21st June 1821, the first Annual Conference of the African Methodist Episcopal Church was held in Zion church in New York. The number of ministers in attendance was twenty-two, and the number of members reported at the Conference was 1,426. At the next Conference elders were ordained by the laying on of hands. In 1838, the Conference elected the Rev. Christopher Rush to the office of permanent superintendent for four years; and the office has been continued ever since, the superintendent being elected every four years by the suffrage of the members of the General Conference.

The doctrines of this body of American Methodists are of a low Arminian character. Thus, in their authoritative statement of principles, they mention Christ as "having made full redemption for all men, on the condition of obedience to God." They say also, that "we produce good works as our duty to God; and then the merits of Christ are bestowed upon us." Among the sacraments they enumerate holy matrimony, placing it on the same footing with baptism and the Lord's Supper. They practise entire temperance, all use of spirituous liquors being prohibited, except in case of necessity. They bind themselves to avoid all traffic in slavery in any way.

The General Conference of the body, which meets every four years, is composed of all the travelling ministers of the connection. The Annual Conference consists of the travelling ministers of a district. There is an Annual Conference held in New York; another in Philadelphia; a third in Boston; and a fourth in Baltimore. There is also a Quarterly Conference, a Monthly Meeting of the trustees of each church, and a Leaders' Meeting, which meets monthly, and is composed of all the class leaders and class stewards.

The ecclesiastical functionaries of this church are, 1. The superintendent. 2. The elder. 3. Deacon. 4. The licensed preacher. 5. The exhorter. 6. The class leader. Besides these there are trustees and stewards, who are strictly temporal functionaries.

METHODIST (AFRICAN) EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN AMERICA. This church was founded in Philadelphia in 1816. Its organization was effected in a convention held for ecclesiastical purposes by a large number of coloured persons who had seceded from the Methodist Episcopal church, both in Philadelphia and Baltimore. Like the church described in the last article, this church had its origin in the oppression and ill-treatment which the coloured Methodists endured at the hands of their white brethren. For many years, indeed, they were subjected to a systematic persecution on the part of those who professed to be their fellow-Christians.

At last a General Convention was held in Philadelphia, which was largely attended by coloured people from Baltimore and other places, and taking into consideration their grievances, they passed a resolution that the people of Philadelphia, Baltimore, and all other places, who should unite with them, should become one body under the name and style of the "African Methodist Episcopal Church."

As the separation of this church from the Methodist Episcopal Church involved no difference in doctrine or practice, the Convention held in Philadelphia in 1816, adopted the same doctrines, discipline, and general government as the church they had left. They differ only in a few not very important particulars. Thus they have no presiding elders, simply because they are not able to maintain them. Their local preachers, also, are eligible to membership in the Annual Conference, and as such are entitled to all the privileges of the itinerant members. The most important point of distinction, however, between the African Methodist Episcopal Church and the church from which it seceded, is, that their local preachers have a seat, voice, and vote in the General Conference, when sent there as delegates from the Annual Conferences to represent the lay members of the church. For every four hundred lay members there is one local preacher in the General Conference.

The first Annual Conference of the body was held at Baltimore in 1818, when the whole number of preachers in the connection was twenty-three, and the whole number of members was 6,778. In 1847 there were upwards of 300 preachers, seven Annual Conferences, and upwards of 20,000 members, extending over thirteen States.

METHODISTS (CALVINISTIC), a class of Methodists in England which derive their name from their profession of adherence to the Calvinistic views of Whitefield, as opposed to the Arminian views of Wesley. Both these eminent servants of Christ, animated with an earnest desire to revive the cause of true vital godliness in the land, laboured with unbroken harmony for several years in preaching the gospel, and labouring for the conversion of souls, both in Britain and America. It was not, indeed, until 1748, that the two great founders of Methodism separated from one another, thus dividing the Society of Methodists into two distinct communities. Mr. Whitefield had all along been known to entertain those opinions on the great doctrines of Christianity, which are usually termed, in their aggregate form, Calvinism; but Mr. John Wesley, in the course of his preaching tours, often avowed Arminian sentiments, and even boldly attacked the doctrine of election. For a time various attempts were made to reconcile their conflicting opinions, and bring about a complete agreement between the parties, but this was found to be impracticable, and an open rupture took place, Wesley steadily and skilfully constructing the elaborate system of Wesleyan Methodism, and Whitefield prosecuting his great work as an itinerant missionary of the cross, without the slightest desire to be the founder of a sect. Though separated from his former coadjutor in the evangelistic work, he continued to labour with the utmost ardour and assiduity, while thousands flocked to listen to his powerful ministrations, and he was thus the means of enlarging the congregations of many dissenting ministers, as well as evangelical clergymen in the Established Church. On one occasion he preached at Moorfields in the midst of the multitudes who were assembled there at the fair on Whit-Monday, and so manifestly did the Lord bless his labours, that he says in speaking of it, "We retired to the Tabernacle with my pockets full of notes from persons brought under concern, and read them amidst the praises and spiritual acclamations of thousands, who joined with the holy angels in rejoicing that so many sinners were snatched in such an unexpected, unlikely place and manner, out of the very jaws of the devil. This was the beginning of the Tabernacle Society."

In the winter of 1755, Mr. Whitefield was asked by some friends to preach regularly at a licensed chapel in Long Acre. He consented to preach twice a-week and to read prayers. Crowds attended, and the enemies of the truth were so enraged that they made systematic efforts to annoy and insult the preacher. In consequence of the difficulties thus thrown in his way, it was resolved by some of his friends and followers to build a place of worship sufficient to accommodate a large number of people, and where he might officiate without any likelihood of being disturbed in the proclamation of his Master's message. Tottenham Court Chapel, accordingly, was erected, and formally opened for public worship in November 1756. In addition to the two great chapels thus built in the metropolis by the followers of Whitefield, additional places of worship in the same connection have since been built in different towns throughout England, in many of which the English Church Service continues to be read.

After the apostolic labours of Mr. Whitefield had been brought to a close by his death in New England in 1769, the Calvinistic Methodists not being united into a sect, continued individually, or in separate congregations, to hold the opinions of their founder. It has been alleged by Dr. Haweis, that their numbers in 1800 amounted in the aggregate to as many as the Arminian Methodists. The congregations are formed on the Independent principle, each defraying its own expenses and managing its own concerns. The Tabernacle in Moorfields, and the Tottenham-court chapel, are managed by trustees; but their affairs are arranged on the Congregationalist plan. It is difficult indeed to distinguish the body generally from the Congregationalist Dissenters.

With the exception of the few separate congregations scattered throughout different towns in England who hold the Calvinistic principles of Whitefield, his followers are found under two distinct denominations; the one called HUNTINGDON'S (COUNTESS OF) CONNEXION (which see), and the other the WELSH CALVINISTIC METHODISTS. See METHODISTS (WELSH CALVINISTIC).

METHODISTS (CAMP), a name given to those members of the Methodist body in the Western States of North America, particularly Kentucky, who towards the beginning of the present century adopted Camp-Meetings as a means of promoting revivals of religion. Dr. Miller of Princeton College states it as his opinion that these meetings began in the Presbyterian church; that they were first adopted from a kind of necessity in a country where houses for public worship were few and of small size, and of course altogether insufficient for receiving the great crowds which collected on particular occasions, and who were in a state of mind which prompted them to remain a number of days at the place of meeting. In such circumstances encampment in the open air seemed to be unavoidable. But what was begun from necessity was afterwards continued from choice; Camp-Meetings being found to furnish admirable means for the propagation of strong excitement. The Methodists in Kentucky adopted the practice from their Presbyterian brethren, and retained it for many years, thus giving rise to the name of Camp-Methodists. The meetings which gave origin to the name were often scenes of the most painful excitement. Persons were occasionally seen to fall to the ground as suddenly as if they had been pierced through the heart with a bullet or a sword; others when falling would utter a shriek and lie during hours still and silent; others would weep and moan mournfully. Throughout the United States, Camp-Meetings are far more rarely resorted to even in seasons of revival than they were in the early part of the present century.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN AMERICA. Methodism may be considered as having arisen in America at as early a period as in England. Both the founders of Methodism, John Wesley and George Whitefield, laboured for a long time as clergymen of the Episcopal Church in Georgia. The first Methodist Society in America was established in New York in 1766. The circumstances which led to its original formation are deeply interesting. They are thus described by the Rev. Dr. Bangs: "A few pious emigrants from Ireland, who, previously to their removal, had been members of the Methodist society in their own country, landed in this city. Among their number was Mr. Philip Embury, a local preacher. Coming among strangers and finding no pious associates with whom they could confer, they came very near making 'shipwreck of faith and a good conscience.' In this state of religious declension they were found the next year on the arrival of another family from Ireland, among whom was a pious 'mother in Israel,' to whose zeal in the cause of God they were all indebted for the revival of the spirit of piety among them. Soon after her arrival she ascertained that those, who had preceded her, had so far departed from their 'first love,' as to be mingling in the frivolities and amusements of the world. The knowledge of this painful fact excited her indignation; and, with a zeal which deserves commemoration, she suddenly entered the room in which they were assembled, seized the pack of cards with which they were playing, and threw them into the fire. She then addressed herself to them in terms of expostulation, and turning to Mr. Embury, she said: 'You must preach to us, or we shall all go to hell together, and God will require our blood at your hands!' This pointed appeal had its intended effect, in awakening his attention to the peril of their condition. Yet, as if to excuse himself from the performance of an obvious duty, he tremblingly replied: 'I cannot preach, for I have neither a house nor congregation.' 'Preach in your own house first, and to our own company,' was the reply. Feeling the responsibility of his situation, and not being able any longer to resist the importunities of his reprover, he consented to comply with her request, and accordingly he preached his first sermon 'in his own hired house,' to five persons only. This, it is believed, was the first Methodist sermon ever preached in America.

"As they continued to assemble together for mutual edification, so their numbers were gradually increased, and they were comforted and strengthened by 'exhorting one another daily.' Notwithstanding the fewness of their number, and the secluded manner in which they held their meetings: they very soon began to attract attention, and they accordingly found that they must either procure a larger place, or preclude many from their meetings who were desirous to attend.

"This led them to rent a room of larger dimensions in the neighbourhood, the expense of which was paid by voluntary contributions. An event happened soon after they began to assemble in this place, which brought them into more public notice, and attracted a greater number of hearers. This was the arrival of Captain Webb, an officer of the British army, at that time stationed in Albany, in the State of New York. He had been brought to the knowledge of the truth, under the searching ministry of the Rev. John Wesley, in the city of Bristol, England, about the year 1765; and, though a military character, such was his thirst for the salvation of immortal souls, that he was constrained to declare unto them the loving kindness of God.

"His first appearance as a stranger among the 'little flock' in the city of New York, in his military costume, gave them some uneasiness, as they feared that he had come to 'spy out their liberties,' or to interrupt them in their solemn assemblies; but when they saw him kneel in prayer, and otherwise participate with them in the worship of God, their fears were exchanged for joy, and on a farther acquaintance they found Captain Webb had 'partaken of like precious faith' with themselves. He was accordingly invited to preach. The novelty of his appearance in the badges of a military officer, excited no little surprise. This, together with the energy with which he spoke in the name of the Lord Jesus, drew many to the place of worship, and hence the room in which they now assembled, soon became too small to accommodate all who wished to assemble. But what greatly encouraged them was, that sinners were awakened and converted to God, and added to the little Society.

"To accommodate all who wished to hear, they next hired a rigging-loft in William Street, and fitted it up for a place of worship. Here they assembled for a considerable time, and were edified in faith and love, under the labours of Mr. Embury, who was occasionally assisted by Captain Webb.

"While the Society was thus going forward in their 'work of faith and labour of love' in New York, Captain Webb made excursions upon Long Island, and even went as far as Philadelphia, preaching wherever he could find an opening, the gospel of the Son of God; and success attended his labours, many being awakened to a sense of their sinfulness through his pointed ministry, and were brought to the 'knowledge of salvation by the remission of sins.' In consequence of the accession of numbers to the Society, and the continual increase of those who wished to hear the word, the rigging-loft became also too small, and they began to consult together on the propriety of building a house of worship.

"But in the accomplishment of this pious undertaking many difficulties were to be encountered. The members in the Society were yet but few in number, most of them of the poorer class, and, of course, had but a limited acquaintance and influence in the community. For some time they were in painful suspense. But while all were deliberating on the most suitable means to be adopted to accomplish an object so desirable, the elderly lady, whose pious zeal has been already mentioned, while earnestly engaged in prayer for direction in this important enterprise, received, with inexpressible sweetness and power, this answer, I, the Lord, will do it. At the same time a plan was suggested to her mind, which, on being submitted to the Society, was generally approved of, and finally adopted. They proceeded to issue a subscription paper, waited on the mayor of the city and other opulent citizens, to whom they explained their object, and received from them such liberal donations, that they succeeded in purchasing several lots in John Street, on which they erected a house of worship sixty feet in length, by forty-two in breadth, calling it, from respect to the venerable founder of Methodism, Wesley Chapel. This was the first meeting-house ever erected for a Methodist congregation in America; this was in the year 1768; and the first sermon was preached in it October 30, 1768, by Mr. Embury. This, therefore, may be considered as the beginning of Methodism in this country."

While this church was in course of being built, the members of the Methodist body in New York addressed a letter to Mr. Wesley, urging upon him to send from Europe a supply of preachers. Two were accordingly despatched to America, namely, Richard Boardman and Joseph Pilmore. These were the first regular itinerant preachers who crossed the Atlantic. On their arrival, Mr. Boardman was stationed in New York, and Mr. Pilmore in Philadelphia, from which cities they made occasional excursions into the surrounding country. About the same time, Mr. Robert Strawbridge, another local preacher from Ireland, emigrated to the United States, and settled in Frederick county, Maryland. The Methodist cause now made rapid progress, and in 1771 Mr. Wesley sent over from England Mr. Francis Asbury and Mr. Richard Wright to the help of their brethren in America. The arrival of these energetic and efficient labourers lent great additional impulse to the work. Mr. Asbury in particular, by itinerating through the country, and preaching in the cities, roused his fellow-labourers to greater earnestness and activity; and hence many new Methodist Societies were established in various parts of the country.

Thus the good work went on until the arrival of Mr. Rankin, who having been appointed to supersede Mr. Asbury as general superintendent, held the first Conference in Philadelphia on the 4th of July 1773, at which time there were ten travelling preachers, and 1,160 members in the various societies. At this Conference they adopted the Wesleyan plan of stationing the preachers, and taking minutes of their proceedings. Matters now went steadily forward, and a Methodist meeting-house was built in the city of Baltimore early in the year 1774. Year after year the Conference reported an increase to the number both of preachers and of members. Towards the commencement of the American war of independence, persecution arose against the Methodists throughout the States generally. The ostensible pretext for annoying them was that most of the preachers were from England, and that some of them had openly avowed their want of sympathy with the American movement, while Mr. Wesley the founder of Methodism had himself written against the American principles and measures. So violent in fact did the persecution become, that all the English preachers, except Mr. Asbury, returned to England before the end of the year 1777, and Mr. Asbury also was obliged to retire from public notice for nearly a whole year. Nor was the persecution confined to the native Englishmen; the native Americans also who had laboured as itinerant preachers among the Methodists were exposed to the most cruel treatment, and even imprisonment. But amid all opposition the cause flourished, and at the Conference of 1783, when the war of the revolution had come to a close, the body consisted of 43 preachers, and 13,740 members.

The year 1784 was the commencement of a new era in the history of Methodism in America. The American colonies had declared themselves independent; and the Episcopal Church in America being thus entirely disassociated from that of England, Mr. Wesley felt that the difficulties of the case could only be met by a departure from the usual church order. He, therefore, though only a Presbyterian of the Anglican Church, on his own responsibility in 1784 ordained Dr. Coke bishop or superintendent of his American Methodist Societies, and by this act gave them the character of an independent religious body, which has since borne the name of the Methodist Episcopal Church. At the same time, Mr. Wesley, who had already reached the advanced age of eighty, made an abridgment of the Common Prayer Book and the Thirty-Nine Articles, as a directory for the worship and doctrine of this new ecclesiastical Society.

Thus furnished with proper credentials, Dr. Coke, in company with Messrs. Whatcoat and Vasey, sailed for America; and on their arrival a Conference was held at Baltimore, in which the measures devised by Mr. Wesley were unanimously approved of; Dr. Coke acknowledged as superintendent; Mr. Asbury consecrated as joint superintendent; twelve of the preachers were consecrated as deacons and elders, and three others as deacons. At the same Conference Mr. Wesley's Abridgment of the Book of Common Prayer was adopted, and also twenty-five articles of religion which he had sent along with various other rules for the regulation of the ministers and members of the newly-formed church. Thus the Methodist Episcopal Church of America was fully organized.

The first General Conference of the body was held in the year 1792. It was composed of all the travelling elders in full connection, who were appointed to meet in Conference every four years, with power to devise rules for the regulation of the church. At this General Conference a secession took place, headed by James O'Kelly, a presiding elder in Virginia, because he was dissatisfied with the power which the bishop claimed of stationing the preachers, and pleaded for an appeal to the Conference. O'Kelly had influence enough to cause considerable disturbance in some parts of Virginia and North Carolina; but the excitement was only for a time, and his influence having gradually diminished, his party became scattered, and finally disappeared, while the Methodist Episcopal Church rapidly increased both in numbers and influence, having on its roll, soon after, 266 travelling preachers, and 65,980 church members. Circuits were now formed, and societies established throughout nearly every State and Territory in the Union, and also in Upper Canada.

The number of travelling elders was every year on the increase, and in the course of a short time the General Conference became so large that it was judged expedient to reduce the number. This was done by adopting the representative system. The first delegated Conference assembled in the city of New York in 1812, in which year an increase of members was reported to the amount of 10,700. This Conference was composed of one member for every five members of each annual conference. In 1819 the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church was formed, its declared object being "to assist the several annual conferences to extend their missionary labours throughout the United States and elsewhere." This department of their work has been prosecuted with remarkable energy and success. It comprises missions to those who speak the English language in the destitute or new portions of the country; and also missions to foreigners who have settled together in various portions of the country, and in particular quarters of cities. In addition to these, there is an interesting mission to New Mexico. Of the various Domestic Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church, those to the Germans are the most numerous and successful; but they have also missions to the Swedes, Danes, Norwegians, Welsh, and French, who have settled in the United States. Missions have also been established in Oregon and California, and with such success, that they have each of them been organized into a regular independent annual Conference.

The prosperity of this energetic Christian denomination in America has not however been unclouded. From time to time within her pale, individuals have arisen who have offered strong objections to the government, and some of the usages of the church, and finding that their views met with no general response, they have seceded and attempted to form separate communities. Besides the secession already referred to under O'Kelly, the most considerable of these secessions has been that which took place in 1830, and which led to the formation of the 'Methodist Protestant Church.'

Since 1847 the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States has been divided into two almost equal parts, a Northern and a Southern. These have broken off all communion with one another, and have recently had a vexatious lawsuit about the division of the common property. The sole cause of the separation was slavery. The Methodists of the Northern and Western States are mostly abolitionists, and they refused to permit their brethren in the South to hold, buy, and sell slaves. A separation accordingly took place, and an independent Society was set up called the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

The government of this Methodist body, as may be learned from its name, is strictly Episcopal; and in its general arrangements it almost entirely conforms to the rules laid down by Mr. Wesley for the Methodist Societies in England. "All the members are received into the church on a probation of six months; during which time they have ample opportunity to make themselves acquainted with all the doctrines and usages of the church; and the church has also an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the Christian experience and the general character of the probationers: at the end of the probation, if there is a mutual agreement between the probationers and the church, they are received into full connexion; but in case there is a disagreement, probationers can withdraw, or the church can drop them without the formality of a church trial.

"Whenever there is a sufficient number of persons in a place, who wish to unite with the Methodist Episcopal Church, it is customary for the preacher to form them into a class, and to appoint one of their number a leader, whose duty it is to take a special oversight of them, and to meet them once a-week for the purpose of religious instruction and improvement. Classes thus formed are united into a church, and the church is placed under the charge of a travelling preacher. The churches are situated on circuits or stations, and they are annually supplied by a preacher from the conference.

"On each circuit or station there is a quarterly conference, consisting of the presiding elder of the district, all the travelling and local preachers, exhorters, stewards, and leaders of the circuit or station, and none else. This conference possesses an appellate jurisdiction over the members of the church on the circuit or station, who may have appealed from the decisions of the church, and its decisions in all cases are final. It also attends to the general business of the church, both temporal and spiritual, which cannot so well be attended to by the members of the church in their more private capacity. It is properly a connecting link between the church and the annual conference, and all the business of the church with the annual conference is prepared and forwarded by this body.

"A number of circuits and stations form districts, over which an elder is appointed to preside. And a number of the districts form a conference, which meets annually for the transaction of its appropriate business. And then, again, delegates from these several annual conferences form a general conference, which meets once in four years.

"There are three orders of ministers recognised in the Methodist Episcopal church; bishops, elders, and deacons; and the duties pertaining to each are plainly defined in the Discipline." (See METHODISTS, WESLEYAN.)

According to the last census, the Methodist Episcopal denomination in the United States has 12,464 church edifices, with accommodation for 4,209,333 persons. Up to 1831 this church had no foreign missions except that to the North American Indians. That year, however, they commenced a mission to Liberia in Africa, and since that time they have established missions in Africa, China, and South America, besides recently making arrangements for new mission stations in Turkey and Hindustan. In the year 1843—the year before the division of the church—the number of foreign missionaries in connection with the body was about 60. After the division the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was formed, its operations being conducted independently upon the same general principles as the original Society. In 1854 the Methodist Episcopal Church, in both its northern and southern divisions, had seventy-eight missionaries labouring in foreign parts.

It is remarkable to what an extent Methodism flourishes in the United States. In seventy years the whole body of Methodists in that country has grown from 13,000 to 1,200,000 members, besides the many hundreds that have died during that time. "The Methodist," says Dr. Schaff, "is one of the most numerous denominations in America, perhaps the most numerous, and in the state of Indiana it even controls the political elections. It has uncommon energy and activity, and enjoys an organization eminently fitted for great general enterprises, and systematic, successful co-operation. Its preachers have, in general, little or no scientific culture, but, on an average, a decided aptness for popular discourse and exhortation, and they often compensate by fidelity and self-denial for their want of deeper knowledge. They are particularly fitted for breaking the way in new regions, for aggressive missionary pioneer service, and for labouring among the lower classes of the people. Their zeal, however, is very frequently vitiated by impure motives of proselytism, and indulges in the boldest aggressions on other churches, thinking that it alone can really convert. Amongst the negroes, too, both free and slave, Methodism has most influence, and seems, with its emotional excitements, well adapted to their sanguine, excitable temperament. Formerly, appealing to the apostles and evangelists of the primitive church, it used to condemn learning and theology from principle, as dangerous to practical piety; and to boast, that its preachers had 'never rubbed their backs against the walls of a college,' and yet knew the better how to catch fish in the net of the kingdom of God. But in this respect a considerable change has been, for some years, going on. The Methodists are now beginning to establish colleges and seminaries, to publish scientific periodicals, and to follow the steps of the culture of the age. But it is a question whether they will not thus lose more in their peculiar character and influence with the masses than they will gain in the more cultivated circles." In 1853 there were enrolled in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, 1,659 travelling preachers, 4,036 local preachers, and 529,394 members; while the same church, North, enrols 5,100 travelling preachers, 6,061 local preachers, and 732,637 members under seven bishops.

METHODIST (PRIMITIVE) CONNEXION, a

Society of Methodists which arose in England out of the revivals of religion which took place about the commencement of the present century among the workmen at the potteries in Staffordshire. One of the pious and worthy men with whom this denomination of Christians originated was William Clowes, who was himself engaged in the pottery business. Throughout his apprenticeship he seems to have pursued an unbroken career of sin and folly, not, however, without occasional misgivings, and inward strivings of the Spirit. In his twenty-fifth year he was brought under the saving influence of the truth as it is in Jesus; and this joyful event in his history was speedily followed by the conversion of his wife. The house of this humble pair now became the resort of the godly and devout among their neighbours. William became emphatically a man of prayer, and the peace of God flowed through his soul like a mighty river. "My soul feasted," he says, when speaking in his Journals of this period of his spiritual history, "on the hidden manna, and drank the wine of the kingdom. My soul rose in spiritual greatness, and I felt withal such a burning sympathy for souls, and saw their lost and perishing condition with such vividness, that I went into the streets among the licentious and profane, and addressed them in the name of the Lord. The rebels against God were stricken with surprise and astonishment whilst I bore witness against them, and cleared my soul of their blood. Indeed, the fire of God's love became so hot in my soul, as frequently to constrain me to shout and praise aloud, as I went along the road. On one occasion I was praising my God aloud, as a happy inhabitant of the rock, (it was near midnight,) and a woman, who had formed the dreadful resolution to drown herself, was actually approaching the water-side for the purpose, when hearing me shouting glory to God, she was instantly arrested in her purpose. She reflected upon the rash and awful deed she was about to perpetrate: and said to herself, 'Oh what a wicked wretch am I, and what a happy man is he that shouts and praises God yonder!' This poor creature was, therefore, mercifully diverted from her intention, and returned home. My soul enjoyed such ecstasy, both night and day, that the time I spent in sleep was comparatively trifling, notwithstanding my daily labours and religious exercises were very great; for, after the toil of the day, I attended a meeting every evening, and usually laboured till my strength failed. My Sabbath labours were also unremitting. In the first place, there was the prayer-meeting at six o'clock in the morning; another followed at nine; preaching at eleven; band-meeting at one; preaching at two; visiting the sick at four; preaching again at six; afterwards a prayer-meeting at my own house,—besides reading the Scriptures, family and private prayer, and other occasional duties. In the midst of all this ponderous labour, I felt strong, active, and unspeakably happy in God."

The prayer-meetings which were held about this time at William Clowes' house were attended by great numbers of people, many of them under deep spiritual concern. The work of God now made rapid progress among the workpeople at Tunstall, Harsieahead, and the neighbourhood. At this period two other kindred spirits, Daniel Shubotham and Hugh Bourne, became frequent visitors at the house of William Clowes, for the purpose of conversing upon spiritual and divine things. Finding that the prayer-meetings were blessed to not a few, William and some of his praying friends resolved to make still further efforts to accomplish the conversion of sinners. With this view they "agreed that the person who should first address the throne of grace should believe for the particular blessing prayed for, and all the other praying labourers should respond Amen, and believe also; and if the blessing prayed for was not granted, still to persevere pleading for it, until it was bestowed. We conceived we were authorized and justified by the Scriptures in praying and believing for certain blessings, and receiving them in the act of believing; but that it could not answer any useful purpose in the exercise of praying to God, to ask perhaps for hundreds of blessings, and finally to go away without receiving any." As the result of this plan, "we began," says Clowes, "to see immediate good done in the name of the Lord, acting in accordance with those views of the word of God which it is calculated to inspire; for seldom a meeting took place but souls were saved and believers sanctified to God."

In addition to the prayer-meetings, a local preachers' meeting was also established for mutual improvement, and the discussion of theological subjects. This meeting was very profitable, serving as a school in which many preachers were trained for more enlarged spheres of usefulness than they occupied before. Clowes now became a class-leader at a place called Kidsgrove, where, through his instrumentality, many of the roughest colliers were brought to God. Hugh Bourne was also much prospered in his labours at Harsieahead, and one of his earliest converts, Daniel Shubotham, was eminently useful as a class-leader in the district. One of the most important moral results which followed, on the earnest exertions of these humble but devoted men, was the suppression, to a considerable extent, of Sabbath-breaking, which was a very prevalent vice in the Staffordshire potteries. An association was formed for this important object, and speedily a powerful check was put upon Sunday trading, and other violations of the Christian Sabbath. A tract-distributing Society was organized in the town of Burslem, which sent pious men, two and two, round both town and country, to deliver Bibles, Testaments, and Tracts, to all who would receive them, and afterwards to call again and exchange the tracts for fresh ones. On these occasions the tract distributors embraced the opportunity of conversing with the people on the necessity of directing their thoughts to their spiritual concerns, generally concluding their visit with earnest prayer for the conversion of every inmate of the house. By such means a spirit of inquiry was excited, first prayer-meetings were established, then class-meetings, and subsequently preaching stations set up. Much opposition was offered, but the work of conversion went forward, promoted not a little by the arrival in the district of a remarkable individual named Lorenzo Dow, who preached with power and great success.

At this point in the history of the work of revival, it was resolved to hold a camp-meeting after the example of the American Methodists in Kentucky. Such a meeting, accordingly, was announced to take place on Sabbath, May 31, 1807, on Mow-hill, near the boundary-line which divides Cheshire from Staffordshire. This was the first camp-meeting ever held in England, and from its close bearing on the rise of Primitive Methodism, we quote an account of it as given by William Clowes, who was himself present: "The morning, a rainy one, was unfavourable. On my arrival about six o'clock, I found a small group of people assembled under a wall, singing. I immediately joined them, and several of us engaged in prayer. When we had concluded the singing and praying services, a Peter Bradburn preached, and an individual from Macclesfield followed. The people now began to be strongly affected, and we began another praying-service. During the progress of these labours the people continued increasing in large numbers, but as they came from various places to the hill, many did not know to what point they should make. At last a person named Taylor, from Tunstall, suggested that a flag, or something of the kind, should be hoisted as a guide and rallying point. Accordingly, E. Anderson, from Kilham, in Yorkshire, unfurled something like a flag, on a long pole, in a conspicuous and elevated position, which became the centre of attraction. It was about this time that I stood upon the stand to address the people. I began my address by giving the people a statement of my Christian experience, and an explanation of the motives which had influenced me to attend the meeting; then I followed with an exhortation for all immediately to look to the Lord by faith for a present salvation; and whilst I was warning sinners to flee from the wrath to come, Jones, from Burslem, a man in the crowd, cried out, 'That's right, Clowes, clear thy blood of them!' During this period of the meeting, the unction of the Holy Spirit rose with great power. Several appeared in distress; and the praying labourers engaged most zealously in pleading with the mourners. But this movement in the meeting did not stay the word of exhortation; it rather gave greater energy and effect. Accordingly, a second stand was fixed, and a person from Ireland gave an exhortation. When this individual had concluded, Edward Anderson, already referred to, followed; reading a part of his life and experience in verse, interspersed with sentences of exhortation. As the people still increased, a third stand was fixed, and in the afternoon, a fourth was erected; and all were occupied with preachers, preaching at the same time; at this period the weather was very fine, and the crowds of people immensely large. The first day's praying on Mow-hill then presented a most magnificent and sublime spectacle. Four preachers, simultaneously crying to sinners to flee from the wrath to come; thousands listening, affected with 'thoughts that breathed, and words that burn'd;' many in deep distress, and others pleading with Heaven in their behalf; some praising God aloud for the great things which were brought to pass, whilst others were rejoicing in the testimony they had received, that their sins, which were many, had been all forgiven. The camp-meeting continued full of glory and converting power. About four o'clock in the afternoon, the numbers of people were prodigiously large! but after this time many began to move off, and homewards; yet the power of the Highest continued with undiminished force and effect to the very last. Towards the conclusion, the services were principally carried on by praying companies, and at the close, which took place about half-past eight o'clock in the evening, several (six) souls were set at liberty. The glory that filled my soul on that day far exceeds my power to explain. Much of the good wrought at this great meeting remains; but the full amount of that good, eternity alone will develop to the myriads of the angelic and sainted inhabitants, who will everlastingly laud the eternal Majesty on account of the day's praying on Mow-hill!"

A second camp-meeting was held at the same place on the 19th of July; and a third at Norton on the 23d of August. The design of these two latter is described as having been to "counteract the effects resulting from the 'wakes' or annual parish feasts, at which much riot and sensuality usually took place; and at such seasons, not unfrequently, professors of religion were drawn from their steadfastness. To stay the torrent of evil, to preserve God's people, and to effect the conversion of sinners to God, were the ruling motives which influenced us in arranging these meetings."

All the persons who were mainly concerned in planning and conducting these camp-meetings were thus far connected with the Wesleyan Methodist Society, but their proceedings met with decided disapprobation from the Wesleyan preachers in the Burslem circuit, who after a time expelled them from their body, simply on the ground that they attended camp-meetings, which were alleged to be contrary to the Methodist discipline. This act was regarded as being in accordance with a minute passed by the Wesleyan Conference in 1807, which declared, "It is our judgment, that even supposing such meetings to be allowed in America, they are highly improper in England, and likely to be productive of considerable mischief; we disclaim all connexion with them." William Clowes, thus driven out from the Wesleyan body, still continued along with his friends, to labour with unwearied energy in preaching, holding prayer-meetings, and other operations of a nature fitted to advance the spiritual good of men. The burden, however, of the camp-meetings which were held from time to time, chiefly rested upon H. and J. Bourne, and exposed them to much obloquy, besides involving them in various difficulties, and almost ruining them in their worldly circumstances.

The brethren carried on their classes and missionary labours with great zeal and success, but in separate and detached parties, without any particular bond of union or organization. On the 30th of May 1811, however, the work assumed, for the first time, a regular connexional aspect, for at that date quarterly society tickets were ordered to be printed, and given to the members of all the classes, and regular visitations of all the societies to take place. The introduction of tickets was followed by a regulation tending still more to unite the various Societies which had now become both numerous and wide-spread. Hitherto the whole expenses of the missionary and other operations had been borne by four individuals, but as these men were wholly dependent for their support upon the labour of their hands, it had now become necessary to devise some other means of raising money to meet the increasing expenses of the movement. The people generally were quite willing to assist, but had never been called upon to subscribe. A general meeting, accordingly, was held at Tunstall on the 26th of July 1811, when it was resolved that money should in future be regularly raised in the Societies to meet the expenditure of the Connexion. A preachers' plan about this time was formed, and preaching appointments regularly arranged. There were now on the list 2 travelling preachers; 15 local preachers; 200 members, and 17 preaching places.

Early in the following year a meeting was held at Tunstall, which is thus noticed in Hugh Bourne's Journal, "Thursday, February 13, 1812, we called a meeting, made plans for the next quarter, and made some other regulations; in particular, we took the name of the PRIMITIVE METHODIST CONNEXION." The reason assigned for taking this name is stated to have been, "because we wish to walk as closely as we can in the steps of John Wesley." An attempt was now made by the Wesleyan body in the Burslem circuit, to persuade the newly-formed Society to return to the Old Connexion, assigning as an inducement that it would be for the glory of God, and would spread more the kingdom of Christ in the world. The letter containing this invitation was taken into serious consideration, and the proposal was respectfully but firmly declined.

The Primitive Methodist Connexion was now organized as a separate and independent body of Christians. Arrangements were made for holding regular quarterly meetings for the management of their affairs. A code of rules was drawn up for the use of the Connexion at large, and having been submitted for approval to the Societies by the preachers, they were carefully revised according to the suggestions made and printed in their authorized form early in 1814. In this same year an important step in advance was made by the establishment of the office of Superintendent Preacher. The Connexion was now extending its labours over a wide extent of country, but particularly in Derbyshire, where it was joined by large numbers of the labouring population. At Belper, in that county, several prayer meetings were conducted with great success. Hugh Bourne tells us, that "when these very powerful meetings were closed, the praying people in returning home were accustomed to sing through the streets of Belper. 'This circumstance,' he says, 'procured them the name of Ranters; and the name of Ranter, which first arose on this occasion, afterwards spread very extensively.' It is very improper and utterly unchristian to apply opprobrious terms to any class of men who are seeking according to the light given them to advance the cause of Christ. The Primitive Methodists as a body, have ever shown themselves to be an earnest, laborious, self-denying class of men, whose efforts have doubtless been blessed in many cases to the conversion of souls.

The missionary labours of William Clowes now extended into Nottinghamshire, and thence into Leicestershire. The camp meetings, however, which in their commencement had been so successful, began about this time to decline in their influence and usefulness. Hugh Bourne, who had hitherto taken a special interest in this department of the work, carefully examined the matter to discover if possible the causes of this decline, and coming to the conclusion that too much importance was attached to preaching, and too little to praying, he resolved to take a hint on this point from the American Camp Meetings, and, accordingly, he arranged that each hour devoted to preaching, should be followed by an hour devoted to prayer, and that this practice should be continued throughout the whole day. This change restored in a great measure the former efficiency of the meetings, which were attended by thousands of people.

In 1819, the work extended into Yorkshire, and to carry forward operations in this quarter, William Clowes was stationed at Hull. At this time was introduced the system of dividing circuits into branches, which could easily, when judged proper, be formed into new circuits. And as the entire connexion was increasing rapidly, another important step was taken in advance by the institution of regular Annual Meetings, the first of which was held at Hull on the 2d of May 1820. These were appointed to consist of three delegates from each circuit, one of whom was to be a travelling preacher. The report of the connexion now stood as follows:—8 circuits; 48 travelling preachers, 277 local preachers, and 7,842 members. At the Conference in 1821 several important resolutions were adopted. It was decided that a printing-press should be established for the connexion, and also a Book-room. The cause was now making such encouraging progress, that at the Conference in 1822 the number of members was reported to have risen to 25,218.

Mr. Clowes, by his ardent missionary zeal, had rendered the Hull circuit one of the most prosperous in the whole body, and having been so successful in Yorkshire, he extended his operations into Northumberland, and afterwards into Cumberland. In 1824, he proceeded to London, but the work went heavily and slowly on in the metropolis. He next proceeded by invitation into Cornwall, and after labouring there for a time, returned to the northern counties of England, where he was so prosperous in his missionary efforts, that great numbers were enrolled as members of the Society, and not a few seemed to give evidence of having been savingly converted.

The doctrines of the Primitive Methodists are declared in their Deed Poll to be "those contained in the first four volumes of Wesley's Sermons, and certain Notes by him on the New Testament." In the leading articles of Christianity, therefore, they agree with the Wesleyan Methodists as set forth in their published standards. The characteristic doctrine, however, of Primitive Methodism, is, as one of the body alleges, "that of a full, free, and present salvation," and they believe in the doctrine of instantaneous conversions. In defending this doctrine, they argue that "sudden conversions are in accordance with Scripture. In the Acts of the Apostles, we find that ordinarily conversions were sudden under their ministry. The 3,000 conversions on the day of Pentecost all appear to have taken place during the sittings of one assembly; and all the subsequent outpourings of the Spirit with which the first age of Christianity was blessed seemed to have been characterized by conversions of this sort. Though Saul was three days seeking the Lord, yet the jailer of Philippi and all his house were converted in one hour! And we have reason to believe that such conversions were every day taking place under the ministry of the apostles. Not only the example of Scripture, but the general spirit and genius of the Bible are favourable to sudden conversion. The Bible calls upon men to repent now! It does not instruct them to adopt a course of action preparatory to their doing so, but allows of no delay. Its language is, 'Behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation.' Sudden conversions are neither unphilosophical, unscriptural, nor unusual."

This body of Christians, at least the great majority of its preachers and members, is unfavourable to all national establishments of religion. They maintain the doctrine and follow the practice of infant baptism, but they reject the dogma of baptismal regeneration. One of the connexional rules is, "that the preachers and members use every prudential means to encourage Temperance Societies;" and another that "none of the preachers shall be allowed to make speeches at parliamentary elections, or at political meetings."

The condition on which members are admitted into the Society of the Primitive Methodists, is simply that the applicant is animated by "a desire to flee from the wrath to come." Three months' probation is required before full admission is granted into fellowship. Members can only be excluded from communion by a proved wilful immorality; or absence from class four weeks successively without assigning sufficient reason for such absence. The Connexion is composed of classes, one member of which is called the Leader, and usually another called the assistant. The members of each class have their names entered in a class-book; and further, each member holds a Society ticket which is renewed quarterly. A member removing from one place to another is furnished with credentials. The lay-officers of the body are, the "Leader," corresponding to the "Elder" of the New Testament; and the "Society Steward," corresponding to the "Deacon." It is regarded as an indispensable qualification of a preacher among the Primitive Methodists, that he give satisfactory evidence of a scriptural conversion to God, and of a Divine call. In the induction of preachers to the ministerial office, there is no ceremony or laying on of hands as in the case of ordination in other churches. From the period of a preacher being "called out," he enters on a probation of four years; after which, if successful, he is admitted into full connexion. The salary allowed to a preacher of the gospel is proverbially small, so that there is no temptation to any one to undertake the ministerial office from mere worldly motives.

The object of the Primitive Methodist Connexion is "to aid in extending the kingdom of Christ throughout the world by preaching the gospel in the open air, private houses, and public edifices, and by holding various religious services throughout its societies, congregations, circuits, branches, and missions." The constitution of the body is thus described by Mr. Church in his 'Sketches of Primitive Methodism:' "A number of societies or classes in different places form what is called a mission; or when self-supporting, a circuit. This generally includes a market town, and the circumjacent villages, to the extent of ten or twenty miles. Two, three, or more preachers, are annually appointed to a circuit; one of these is called the superintendent. This circuit is their sphere of labour for at least one year, and not exceeding three years; while the superintendent may probably remain five or six years in the same circuit. This constant change of preachers is an excellent rule. Some indeed, have imagined that this is a hindrance to the work of God; but long experience in every part of the kingdom proves to the contrary.

"A number of circuits, from five to ten, more or fewer, according to circumstances, compose a district. The Primitive Methodist Connexion is divided into 14 districts. Each district has an annual meeting, preparatory to the Conference. It is attended by a travelling preacher, or a lay delegate from each of the circuits belonging to the district, and also by a delegate from the general or 'Connexional Committee.' 'The district meeting,' according to the Various Regulations of 1836, 'inquires respecting the conduct and success of each travelling preacher; and whether any trespass on the rules respecting preaching, or are negligent in ministerial family visiting, or in other duties, and notes the same on the minutes.'

"Six delegates from each district attend the Conference. 'They shall consist,' says the Deed Poll, 'of the travelling preachers, one-third; and the other two-thirds shall consist of those members who shall sustain each the office of local preacher, class-leader, or circuit steward.' The majority, therefore, is as two to one in favour of the people. Laws made at the Conference govern the Connexion. The Conference is the supreme church court. It also examines the number of members, finances, &c., and stations the preachers for the ensuing year."

Open-air worship is frequently practised by the Primitive Methodists. At the risk of imprisonment and persecution they "go out into the highways and hedges to compel souls to come in," and be saved. Love-feasts are observed from time to time, at which bread and water are distributed in token of Christian fellowship. Watch-nights also, after the manner of the vigils of the ancients, are held on the last night of the year; and on these occasions the services consist of prayer, praise, and exhortation by preachers. Silence is usually observed a few minutes before midnight, and until the new year has commenced, when the services are ended. Protracted meetings, which originated in America, were introduced into England by a Primitive Methodist preacher in 1838, and they have ever since been resorted to by the body generally, as a favourite means of bringing about a revival of religion. The ordinary worship of the Society is characterized by great liveliness and excitement, the people being accustomed to utter hearty responses with loud voices in the course of the devotional exercises. In not a few of their congregations instrumental music has been introduced, though others are much opposed to what they regard as an unwarranted innovation on the primitive simplicity of Christian worship.

The Primitive Methodists have from their first rise admitted of a practice which is unknown in other denominations, with the exception of the Friends, that of female preaching. It has been sometimes argued in defence of this practice, that it is not specifically condemned in Scripture, and has in many cases been blessed for the good of souls. But while in several circuits females are still employed occasionally as local or lay preachers, female preaching is greatly on the decline throughout the Connexion generally. In this and a few other particulars the Primitive Methodists differ from other churches, but with all their peculiarities, they are a body of simple-hearted and devoted Christians, whose predominant desire is to win souls to Christ.

The Primitive Methodist Magazine commenced in 1818. Subsequently it was edited by Hugh Bourne until 1843, when a new series was begun under the editorship of John Flesher, and under the present arrangement a new editor is appointed every five years. "Hitherto," says Mr. Church, referring to 1844, "the Connexion has been isolated in its missionary operations. Each circuit, which has been able, has employed a missionary, and, with few exceptions, has had to support him with its own resources. In the youth of the Connexion this plan appears to have been best adapted for the diffusion of its energies through the land; but growing events seem to demand a different state of things, and hence arrangements were made at the Conference to concentrate our missionary energies in part, that we may try, on a partial scale, whether the plan is not better suited to the altered condition of the Connexion. In April, two missionaries set out for America. During the same month an association of Sunday-schools was formed to support a missionary to and at Adelaide, South Australia." The following year an association of Sunday-school teachers was formed to sustain a missionary in New Zealand. The Connexion now organized a foreign missionary Society, adopting Canada, New Zealand, and Australia, as their fields of labour. The total number of their foreign missionaries throughout the world is at present 40; of whom 22 are in Canada, 14 in Australia, and 4 in New Zealand. The whole number of members in their foreign stations is 3,363. From the General Minutes of the Annual Conference held in June 1857, we learn that the travelling preachers of the whole Connexion amount to 598, the local preachers to 10,205, and the members, including the Home and Foreign Missions, in connection with the British Conference, to 110,683. The Primitive Methodists have uniformly taken a very lively interest in the religious education of the young. Their Sabbath schools were reported at the last Annual Conference to be 1,692, with 25,403 teachers, and 139,486 scholars.

METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH IN AMERICA, a respectable body of seceders from the Methodist Episcopal Church, who formed themselves into a regularly organized church in 1830, the first General Convention of the body having been held in that year in the city of Baltimore, State of Maryland. It would appear that at an early period in the history of Methodism in America, exception was taken by not a few members of the body to a peculiar feature in the government adopted by the Conference in 1784, which consisted exclusively of preachers. The obnoxious feature was that which secured to the itinerant ministers the entire exercise of the legislative, executive, and judicial powers of the church to the exclusion of all other classes of ministers, as well as the whole membership of the body. The spirit of dissatisfaction which so soon manifested itself, continued every year to gain ground, until at length, in 1820, the feelings of the Reforming party found vent in a periodical which was instituted, called the 'Wesleyan Repository.' Numerous petitions were now presented to the Conference from all quarters of the country, praying for a representation of both ministers and laymen in the rule-making department; but no change either in the principles or practical operations of the body could be obtained. At length, at the close of the Conference in 1824, a meeting of the reforming party was held in Baltimore, at which it was determined to publish a periodical pamphlet, entitled 'The Mutual Rights of the Ministers and Members of the Methodist Episcopal Church,' for the purpose, as was alleged, of giving the Methodist community a suitable opportunity to enter upon a calm and dispassionate discussion of the subjects in dispute. The meeting also determined to resolve itself into a Union Society, and recommended similar societies to be formed in all parts of the United States, in order to ascertain the number of persons in the Methodist Episcopal Church friendly to a change in her government. These steps exposed the reformers to much persecution and annoyance, but their views were adopted by a large body of zealous Methodists. The further history of the controversy, until the secession actually took place, is thus stated by the Rev. Thomas F. Norris: "Sometime during the spring of the year 1826, the Baltimore Union Society recommended state conventions to be held in the several States, for the exclusive purpose of making inquiry into the propriety of making one united petition to the approaching General Conference of 1828, praying for representation; and to elect delegates to meet in a General Convention for the purpose. Conventions were accordingly held, and delegates elected; in consequence of which, reformers, in different parts of the country, were made to feel the displeasure of men in power. In North Carolina, several members of the Granville Union Society were expelled for being members thereof. In the fall of 1827, eleven ministers were suspended, and finally expelled from the Methodist Episcopal Church in this church in Baltimore, and twenty-two laymen, for being members of the Union Society, and supporters of mutual rights. The members expelled, and others who saw fit to secede, organized under Mr. Wesley's general rules, taking the title of Associated Methodists.

"In November 1827, the General Convention assembled in Baltimore, composed of ministers and lay delegates, elected by the State Conventions and Union Societies. This Convention prepared a memorial to the General Conference of May 1828, praying that the government of the church might be made representative, and more in accordance with the mutual rights of the ministers and people. To this memorial the General Conference replied, in a circular, claiming for the itinerant ministers of their church an exclusive divine right to the same unlimited and unamenable power, which they had exercised over the whole church from the establishment of their government in 1784. Soon after the rise of the General Conference, several reformers in Cincinnati, Lynchburg, and other places, were expelled for being members of Union Societies and supporters of the mutual rights.

"The reformers, now perceiving that all hope of obtaining a change in the government of the church had vanished, withdrew, in considerable numbers, in different parts of the United States, and called another General Convention to assemble in Baltimore, November 12, 1828. This Convention drew up seventeen 'Articles of Association,' to serve as a provisional government for the Associated Methodist churches, until a constitution and book of discipline could be prepared by a subsequent Convention to be held in November 1830."

The first General Convention, accordingly, at which the Methodist Protestant Church was regularly organized, was held at Baltimore in 1830. The meeting commenced on the 2d of November, and continued in session till the 23d inclusive. It was attended by eighty-three ministerial, and a large number of lay representatives of about 5,000 members of the respective associated Methodists, a large majority of whom had already withdrawn from the Methodist Episcopal Church on account of her government and hostility to lay representation. In this important Convention, a form of constitution and discipline for the newly organized church was considered and approved. The principles on which the Secession proceeded are thus stated in the preamble and articles which precede the constitution: "We the representatives of the Associated Methodist churches in General Convention assembled, acknowledging the Lord Jesus Christ as the only head of the church, and the Word of God as the sufficient rule of faith and practice, in all things pertaining to godliness; and being fully persuaded, that the representative form of church government is the most scriptural, best suited to our condition, and most congenial with our views and feelings as fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God; and whereas a written constitution, establishing the form of government, and securing to the ministers and members of the church their rights and privileges, is the best safeguard of Christian liberty: We, therefore, trusting in the protection of Almighty God, and acting in the name and by the authority of our constituents, do ordain and establish, and agree to be governed by the following elementary principles and constitution :

" 1. A Christian church is a society of believers in Jesus Christ, and is a divine institution.

" 2. Christ is the only Head of the church ; and the Word of God the only rule of faith and conduct.

" 3. No person who loves the Lord Jesus Christ, and obeys the gospel of God, our Saviour, ought to be deprived of church membership.

" 4. Every man has an inalienable right to private judgment, in matters of religion ; and an equal right to express his opinion, in any way which will not violate the laws of God, or the rights of his fellow-men.

" 5. Church trials should be conducted on gospel principles only ; and no minister or member should be excommunicated except for immorality ; the propagation of unchristian doctrines ; or for the neglect of duties enjoined by the Word of God.

" 6. The pastoral or ministerial office and duties are of divine appointment ; and all elders in the church of God are equal ; but ministers are forbidden to be lords over God's heritage, or to have dominion over the faith of the saints.

" 7. The church has a right to form and enforce such rules and regulations only, as are in accordance with the Holy Scriptures, and may be necessary or have a tendency to carry into effect the great system of practical Christianity.

" 8. Whatever power may be necessary to the formation of rules and regulations, is inherent in the ministers and members of the church ; but so much of that power may be delegated, from time to time, upon a plan of representation, as they may judge necessary and proper.

" 9. It is the duty of all ministers and members of the church to maintain godliness, and to oppose all moral evil.

" 10. It is obligatory on ministers of the gospel to be faithful in the discharge of their pastoral and ministerial duties ; and it is also obligatory on the members, to esteem ministers highly for their works' sake, and to render them a righteous compensation for their labours.

" 11. The church ought to secure to all her official bodies the necessary authority for the purposes of good government ; but she has no right to create any distinct or independent sovereignties."

Lay representation being adopted as an essential element in the constitution of the Methodist Protestant Church, its General Conference, which meets every seventh year, is composed of an equal number of ministers and laymen, being one minister and one layman for every thousand persons of its membership. The Annual Conferences consist of all the ordained itinerant ministers, and of one delegate from each circuit and station within the bounds of the district, for each of its itinerant ministers. The Quarterly Conferences are the immediate official meetings of the circuits and stations. The leaders' meetings, and, indeed, all the other arrangements, are similar to those of the church from which they seceded. The only difference between the two churches lies in government, the Methodist Episcopal Church rejecting lay representation, and adopting an unlimited episcopacy, while the Methodist Protestant Church admits lay representation, and a parity in the ministry.

METHODIST (REFORMED) CHURCH IN AMERICA. This body sprung out of a feeble secession which took place from the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1814. The original seceders amounted to no more than fourteen persons belonging to the towns of Whitingham and Readsborough, Vermont, who felt straitened in their religious rights and privileges under the Episcopal mode of church government. Having represented their grievances to the General Conference, and meeting with no favourable answer, they formally separated from the church, and on the 16th of January 1814 met in convention at Readsborough. At this Convention they formed themselves into a church under the name of the "Reformed Methodist Church," and appointed a Conference to be held on the following 5th of February, at which they adopted articles of religion and rules of church government.

The Reformed Methodists agree with the Methodist Episcopal Church in regard to the fundamental doctrines of the gospel. Their system of church government is essentially Congregational in its character, all power being considered as vested in the primary bodies, the churches. The leading men among the Reformed Methodists have generally maintained, that the same faith would produce the same effects it did in primitive times. They believe that the church has apostatized ; that as all blessings given in answer to prayer are suspended upon the condition of faith, therefore, faith is the restoring principle. They dare not limit faith except by a "thus saith the Lord," and hence they believe that the sick are often restored to health in answer to their prayers. Another peculiar tenet which they maintain is, that it is possible for a believer to attain perfection in this world or complete sanctification of heart and life through faith in the atoning blood of the Lord Jesus Christ. They hold that the church of Christ is a spiritual body, and that members ought to be admitted into the church, not by subscribing certain doctrines, but by exhibiting clear evidence of the forgiveness of their sins, and the renewal of their heart. They are conscientiously opposed to war, both offensive and defensive, and also to slavery and slaveholding. An article has been added to their Discipline excluding all apologists for slavery from church membership.

Reformed Methodism was planted in Upper Canada in 1817 or 1818, and its introduction was signalized by a remarkable revival of religion. Both in Canada and the United States it has made steady progress ; but it had no periodical organ until 1837, when the 'South Cornwall Luminary' was started by the New York Conference, in the first instance, and after a short time became the organ of the whole church. In 1839 this periodical changed its name to that of the 'Fayetteville Luminary.' In 1841 an association was formed between the Reformed Methodists, Society Methodists, and local bodies of Wesleyan Methodists, the object of which was harmoniously to co-operate, without, however, merging the various bodies into one church. By the terms of the association the name of the 'Luminary' was again changed to that of the 'Methodist Reformer,' which became the organ of the association, while the property of the periodical still belonged to the Reformed Methodists. After the organization of the Wesleyan Methodist Church in America in 1843, the subscription list of the 'Methodist Reformer,' by an arrangement on the association principle between the Reformed Methodists and the Wesleyans, was transferred to the periodical called the 'True Wesleyan,' published at Boston, Massachusetts, as a preliminary step to the union of the two bodies. Latterly the Reformed Methodists have become completely merged in the Wesleyan Methodist Church.

METHODIST SOCIETY IN AMERICA (True). This body of Christians was first composed of a small body of seceders from the Methodist Episcopal Church in the city of New York in 1820. The point on which the Secession arose, was the circumstance of the ruling preacher, so called, insisting on receiving the money collected in the different churches under his charge, through stewards of his own appointment, instead of by the trustees appointed according to law, and in accordance with the practice of the church in all time previous. In addition to this objectionable practice, the Seceders dissented from certain resolutions passed by the New York Annual Conference of ministers, to petition the legislature for a law recognizing the peculiarities of the church discipline, by which the whole property of the church would have been placed under the supervision and control of the body of ministers, who, according to their discipline from the bishop downwards, are to take charge of the temporal and spiritual business of the church. Having left the Methodist Episcopal Church, the Seceders erected a new place of worship, and a congregation of about 300 members was organized under the Rev. William M. Stilwell, who withdrew from the travelling connexion, and became the pastor of this new church. The brief history of the Methodist Society is thus stated by Mr. Stilwell: "In the course of the three years following their first formation as a separate body, they had erected two other places of worship, and formed a discipline, in which the general principles, as taught by the Methodists, were recognized; but in the government of the church there was a difference: 1. No bishop was allowed, but a president of each Annual Conference was chosen yearly, by ballot of the members thereof. 2. All ordained ministers, whether travelling or not, were allowed a seat in the Annual Conferences. 3. Two lay delegates from each Quarterly Conference could sit in the Annual Conference, with the ministers. 4. No rules or regulations for the church could be made unless a majority present were lay members. 5. A preacher could remain with a congregation as long as they agreed. 6. Class meetings, love feasts, &c., were to be attended; the leader of each class being chosen by the members. 7. The property of the Societies to be vested in trustees of their own choice, and the minister to have no oversight of the temporal affairs of the church. They prospered greatly for a few years, when some of the preachers and people, being desirous to have a more itinerant connexion, thought it best to unite with a body of Seceders from the Methodist Episcopal Church, who held a Convention in Baltimore, and took the name of Protestant Methodist Church; since which the Methodist Society have not sought to enlarge their body so much, as to supply such congregations as may feel a disposition to enjoy a liberty, which the other bodies of dissenting Methodists, as well as the Methodist Episcopal Church, do not see fit to grant to the laity."

METHODISTS (ROMISH). This name was applied to certain Romish Controversialists in the seventeenth century, who arose in France, and attempted by ingenious sophistry to silence the Huguenots in argument. These Methodists are arranged by Mosheim under two classes. The first class attempted to foreclose the argument by demanding from the Protestants a direct proof of their doctrines, and calling upon them to adduce explicit declarations of the Holy Scripture. By this mode of conducting the argument, it was assumed at the very outset of the controversy, that the Church of Rome was an ancient church, and in possession of a system of doctrines which she had held unmolested for ages; and, therefore, the Protestants, being on this theory innovators in religion, the burden of proof lies upon them, and it behoves them to adduce not indirect and inferential, but direct and positive statements of the Bible in favour of their novel doctrines. To this class of Romish Methodists belonged Veron, Nihusius, and Peter and Adrian von Walenburg. The second class of Controversialists of this kind refused to encounter the Protestants, by arguing with them on the various points in detail, but they sought to overwhelm them by urging certain great principles or general arguments involving the whole subject. One of the most dexterous reasoners of this class was the celebrated Peter Nicole, the Jansenist, and the illustrious Cardinal Richelieu. The most distinguished, however, of all these Romish Methodists was Father Bossuet, the author of the 'Histoire des Variations des Eglises Protestantes,' who lays it down as a fundamental principle, that whatever church frequently modifies and changes its doctrines, has not the Holy Spirit. The ingenious author seems to have been blinded to the important fact, that the weapon which he had so carefully forged against Protestantism bore with equal, if not more, effect against Romanism. This is very ably and conclusively shown in a work entitled 'Variations of Popery,' compiled as an answer to Bossuet by the late Rev. S. Edgar, one of the ministers of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland.

METHODISTS (WELSH CALVINISTIC). This large and efficient body of Methodists dates its origin from 1735. A gentleman of Trevecca in Brecknockshire, by name Howell Harris, had entered one of the colleges of Oxford with the view of taking holy orders in the Church of England. Disgusted with the immorality and unprincipled conduct which then prevailed at that seat of learning, he left it and returned home. His own mind being deeply impressed with a sense of divine things, he began to visit from house to house in his native parish, pressing home upon the people the necessity of attending without delay to the things which belonged to their eternal peace. Not confining his labours to household visitation, he commenced public preaching. Crowds flocked to hear him, and many individuals, as well as whole families, were spiritually awakened. He now established a school at Trevecca, which was largely attended, and where the young were carefully instructed in the great truths of the gospel. Feeling that his labours for the good of both old and young met with the most encouraging success, he proceeded to establish meetings for religious conversation in various places; and thus commenced those Private Societies which have ever formed a prominent feature in the arrangements of the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. Mr. Harris now devoted much of his time to preaching, being engaged in this important work three, four, and even five times a day. And his labours were eminently successful, multitudes being awakened, and not a few savingly converted. A spirit of opposition now arose against this devoted man. "The magistrates threatened to punish him; the clergy preached against him; and the common rabble were generally prepared to disturb and to pelt him." In the midst of persecution, however, the cause continued to prosper, and in 1739, though he had laboured only four years, and that too single-handed and alone, he had established about 300 Societies in South Wales. The revival which had thus commenced among the Methodists attracted the attention of good men in all Christian denominations, and Mr. Harris's hands were eminently strengthened by the efficient assistance which he received from the Rev. Daniel Rowland of Llangetho, Cardiganshire, whose popularity and eloquence attracted crowds from great distances to wait upon his ministrations. In a short time several pious ministers of the Establishment seceded and joined the Methodists. A considerable band of itinerant missionaries was now formed, who, with apostolic zeal, wandered from place to place throughout the principality, proclaiming the glad tidings of salvation through a Redeemer. A revival of a most refreshing kind now took place among the different religious denominations; and the new sect daily rose in popularity and influence, being joined in seven years from its commencement by no fewer than ten ministers of the Church of England.

The first chapel built by the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists was erected in 1747 at Builth in Brecknockshire. In the following year two others were built in Carmarthenshire. The cause made steady progress in South Wales; but it was much hindered in North Wales by the keen opposition to which its ministers and adherents were exposed. Shortly after this time Providence raised up one who was made an eminent instrument in advancing the spiritual interests of large masses of the Welsh population. We refer to that devoted servant of Christ, the Rev. Thomas Charles of Bala, Merionethshire, to whose exertions and influence the Societies of Calvinistic Methodists in North Wales are chiefly indebted for their organization and present flourishing condition. Though in his early days he had experienced occasional serious impressions, it was not until his eighteenth year that he was brought to a saving knowledge of the truth, through the powerful preaching of Mr. Rowland. His thoughts were now turned towards the ministry, and having passed through the usual preparatory studies, he entered upon a curacy, the salary of which was only forty-five, and was afterwards reduced to thirty pounds. The fervent piety and devotedness with which he discharged the duties of the ministerial office gave great offence to many of the careless and ungodly among the people. On this account he was under the necessity of removing from place to place, and at length, in 1784, he resolved to leave a church which was fettered with so many forms, and to enjoy the free air and the open fields of Methodism. The Welsh principality was at this time one vast moral wilderness, and although, by the labours of Harris, Rowland, and the other Methodist preachers, much good had been effected, the most lamentable ignorance and ungodliness still pervaded the great mass of the people. A Bible could scarcely be found in any of the cottages of the peasantry, and in some parishes very few persons were able to read it. Such was the state of the principality when Mr. Charles commenced his labours in connexion with the Calvinistic Methodists.

The manner in which this faithful and earnest minister of Christ entered upon the wide field of Christian effort which was thus opened up for him, showed the comprehensiveness of his mind, and his anxiety to overtake the spiritual destitution of the country in a systematic way. He inquired into the moral statistics of the entire principality, and set himself to devise a system of spiritual machinery suited to the peculiar condition and habits of the people. On a strict examination into the whole matter he resolved to establish "circulating schools," which might be transplanted from one place to another at the end of a definite period, say nine or twelve months. Two serious difficulties, however, presented themselves, the want of money and the want of teachers. But Mr. Charles could not easily be deterred by any obstacles from carrying out his benevolent plans. He trained the first teachers himself, and went to England, where he succeeded in raising a considerable sum towards defraying the expenses of his project. The mode in which he managed to establish his circulating schools, and the benefits which accrued from them, he afterwards described thus: "In my travels through different parts of North Wales about twenty-three years ago, I perceived that the state of the poor of the country in general was so low as to religious knowledge, that in many parts not one person in twenty was capable of reading the Scriptures, and in some districts hardly an individual could be found who had received any instruction in reading. I found then and still do find daily proofs of the ignorance of the poor people who cannot read, and have never been catechetically instructed, even where constant preaching is not wanting. This discovery pained me beyond what I can express, and made me think seriously of some remedy, effectual and speedy, for the redress of this grievance. I accordingly proposed to a few friends to set a subscription on foot to pay the wages of a teacher, who was to be moved circuitously from one place to another; to instruct the poor in reading, and in the first principles of Christianity by catechising them. This work began in the year 1785. At first only one teacher was employed. As the funds increased, so in proportion the number of teachers was enlarged, till they amounted to twenty. Some of the first teachers I was obliged to instruct myself; and these afterwards instructed others sent to them to learn to be schoolmasters.

"The fruits of these circulating schools are our numerous Sunday Schools all over the country; for without the former, we could not have found teachers to carry on the latter. Although, through the present general prevalence of Sunday Schools, conducted by gratuitous teachers, the circulating schools are not so much wanted as formerly, yet I still find we cannot go on without some of them. There are yet many dark places in different parts of the country, where none are found able or willing to set up Sunday Schools. My only remedy therefore is, to send there the circulating schools, with a view of raising up by degrees Sunday Schools to succeed them, and to keep on the instruction after they are removed. Besides, I find it absolutely necessary that the circulating schools should occasionally revisit those places where the Sunday Schools are kept, to revive them and reanimate the teachers and people in the work of carrying them on; else, in time, they gradually decline in country places, where the children are scattered far from one another. So that now I constantly employ from six to ten teachers; and several more might be usefully employed did our finances enable us to engage an additional number."

The schools were soon highly appreciated by the people. Both parents and children in many cases eagerly availed themselves of the opportunity thus afforded of obtaining instruction. The Sunday Schools in particular proved a singular blessing to multitudes of children, and through them to their parents. At Bala in 1791, the Sunday Schools were made instrumental in giving rise to an awakening. Seasons of revival indeed were experienced in different parts of the country; and it is remarkable that there was something of a periodical character in many of these awakenings, for several of them occurred at the interval of seven years.

In 1799, a religious periodical entitled 'The Spiritual Treasury,' was started by Mr. Charles, which, as the people had now acquired a taste for reading, was intended to supply them with interesting and useful information, wholly of a religious nature. Hitherto there had been a lamentable scarcity of Bibles in North Wales in the vernacular language, and the desire of supplying this want led to the formation in 1804 of the British and Foreign Bible Society. No sooner was this invaluable institution organized, than it issued an edition of Welsh Bibles and Testaments, which were eagerly received throughout the Principality as a boon of the most precious kind. For several years longer, Mr. Charles continued to prosecute the work of a laborious minister and evangelist, but in 1814 his labours were brought to an end, and the country was called to mourn the loss of one of its greatest benefactors, one who had done more than almost any other man to advance the cause of the Redeemer in North Wales.

In the organization of the Welsh Calvinistic Methodist Society, Mr. Charles took an active and prominent part. At an Association held at Bala in 1790, he drew up certain Rules for conducting the Quarterly Meetings of the North Wales Association, consisting of the preachers and leaders; which Rules form the basis of the present system of church government of the whole Society. In 1801, 'Rules of Discipline' were first published, laying down the order and form of the church government and discipline. To these were added several regulations in 1811, which were framed chiefly with the view of rendering the denomination permanently independent, in its organization and ministry, of the Established Church.

In 1823 the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists adopted and published a Confession of Faith, which was unanimously agreed upon at the Associations of Aberystwith and Bala. The doctrines of this Confession are decidedly Calvinistic, and accord with the Thirty-Nine Articles and the Westminster Confession in all the essential points of Christian doctrine and practice. Their church government is neither Episcopalian on the one hand, nor Congregationalist on the other, but approaches somewhat to the Presbyterian form. The private Societies are subordinate to the Monthly Meetings, and these again to the Quarterly Associations, at which the general business of the body is transacted. Their preachers itinerate from one place to another, and being rarely men of education, they are generally dependent on some secular employment for their subsistence.

In the course of the revivals which occurred so frequently in Wales during the last half of the eighteenth century, the practice seems to have been occasionally followed of "jumping, accompanied by loud expressions of praise, during the solemnization of public worship." (See JUMPERS.) This practice, however, has never been encouraged by the preachers of the Connexion, but is affirmed to be "a mere accident or non-essential of Welsh Calvinistic Methodism;" and it is now of rare occurrence, though the members of the Connexion have not given it a direct opposition. Of late years the Welsh Methodists have turned their attention towards the importance of an educated ministry. Accordingly in 1837 a college for the purpose of training theological students was established at Bala, and in 1842 another was established at Trevecca.

The ministers of the Connexion are selected by the private Societies, and reported to the Monthly Meetings, which examine them as to their qualifications, and permit them to commence on trial. A certain number only who must previously have been preachers for at least five years, are ordained to administer the sacraments, and this ordination takes place at the Quarterly Associations. The preachers are expected each to itinerate in a particular county; but generally once in the course of a year they undertake a missionary tour to different parts of Wales, when they preach twice every day, on each occasion at a different chapel. Their remuneration is derived from the monthly pence contributed by the members of each congregation; out of which fund a trifling sum is given to them after every sermon. Some have a stated stipend.

The number of chapels returned at the Census of 1851 as pertaining to the Welsh Calvinistic Methodist body, amounted to 828, containing accommodation for 211,951 persons. In 1853 the number in ministers was reported to be 207, and that of preachers 234, while the number of communicants was stated to be 58,577.

In 1840, this active and energetic body of Christians formed an association for sending missionaries to the heathen, and towards the end of that same year, a mission was commenced among one of the hill-tribes in the north-east part of Bengal. They have also a mission station in Brittany, south of France, the language of that country being a sister dialect of the Welsh; and they have besides a mission to the Jews. The operations of the Home Mission of this denomination are carried on among the English population inhabiting the borders between England and Wales. There are several Societies in England belonging to the Connexion, for instance, in London, Liverpool, Manchester, Bristol, Chester, Shrewsbury, whose worship, public and private, is performed in the Welsh language. There is also a small congregation among the Welsh miners in Lanarkshire in Scotland, who have the gospel preached to them in their own language. In some parts of Wales, and on the borders of England where the English language is most prevalent, worship is conducted in that tongue.

METHODIST (THE TRUE WESLEYAN) CHURCH IN AMERICA. This Methodist body was constituted at a convention held at Utica, New York, on the 31st May 1843. The convention was composed of ministers and laymen who were summoned to meet for the purpose of forming a Wesleyan Methodist Church free from bishops, intemperance, and slavery. After a lengthened and harmonious deliberation, a Discipline was drawn up, called "the Discipline of the Wesleyan Methodist Church in America," granting to all men their rights, and making them free and equal according to the Word of God, and the preamble of the Declaration of Independence of the United States. They also organized six annual Conferences, including the chief portions of the Northern and Eastern States. This church thus differed in several points from both the Episcopal and Protestant Methodist Churches. From the former, it differed in holding that all elders in the church of God are equal, and from the latter, in disowning all connection with slavery as it exists in America. The Articles of Faith maintained by this Christian denomination are in accordance with those held by orthodox churches generally. The six Conferences of which it consists, include about 300 ministers and preachers who itinerate, and upwards of 300 other ministers and preachers to whom stations have not been allotted, and about 20,000 communicants.

METHODISTS (WESLEYAN), a very large, energetic and influential body of Christians, originated by a great religious movement which commenced at the beginning of the second quarter of last century. John Wesley, the founder of Methodism in England, was born at Epworth in Lincolnshire in 1703, his father being rector of that parish. While yet a child he experienced a remarkable providential deliverance, having narrowly escaped from destruction in the flames of his father's house, which was on fire. This Divine interposition in his behalf made a deep impression on his mind, which seems never to have been effaced during life. The first rudiments of his education were received from his mother, who was the daughter of the Rev. Dr. Ammery, an eminent nonconforming minister; and it is highly probable that from this devoted Christian woman he imbibed those religious principles and feelings which throughout his whole life so eminently characterized him. At the age of eleven he was sent to Charter House school in London, where he signalized himself above his fellows by diligence and progress in his studies. Being destined for the church, he proceeded, along with his brother Charles, to the University of Oxford. After prosecuting his studies with the most exemplary diligence and success, John Wesley was ordained a deacon in 1725, and in the following year, he was chosen Fellow of Lincoln College, and obtained priest's orders. After assisting his father at Epworth for a short time, he returned to Oxford in 1729. Here the two brothers first began to exhibit that earnestness in religion which was ever after so marked a feature in their character. Associating themselves with a few of their fellow-students who were like-minded, they held meetings for prayer and religious conversation. The marked propriety and strictness of their behaviour made them objects of ridicule and reproach among the irreligious and ungodly, who were accustomed to taunt them with being Methodists, a name which was meant to indicate that they were precise and scrupulously attentive to religious duties and exercises. Among those who shared with the Wesleys in this obloquy were James Hervey and George Whitfield, to whose after-labours in their Master's cause, evangelical religion in England owes a deep debt of obligation.

John Wesley continued to reside at Oxford till the death of his father, which took place in 1735; and although his friends wished him to apply for the living at Epworth, which was in the gift of the chancellor, he declined to yield to their entreaties, however urgent. About this time an event occurred which opened up for him a wide sphere of usefulness in a distant land. A colony had just been founded by Governor Oglethorpe in Georgia, who, having concluded a treaty with the Creek Indians, was anxious to establish a mission among them. John and Charles Wesley were prevailed upon to undertake the management of the mission, and in October of the same year in which their father died, they left England for America. On reaching the colony they entered upon their missionary labours with much zeal, but unexpected obstacles were thrown in their way, and after spending two years in fruitless endeavours to carry the gospel to the Indians, they abandoned the mission and returned home in 1738. While resident in Georgia, however, John Wesley had become intimately acquainted with several settlers who belonged to the Moravian church, and in particular with David Nitschman, a bishop of that persuasion. The principles and practices of this interesting community attracted his special favour, and suggested doubtless to his mind many of those arrangements which he afterwards laid down for the regulation of the Methodist Societies.

The intercourse which John Wesley enjoyed with the Moravians in Georgia led to more serious impressions of divine things than he had ever before experienced. He tells us that one thing he had learned by his mission to the Indians, that he who had gone to America to convert others had never been converted himself. The anxiety which he now began to feel about his own personal state continued to agitate his mind throughout his voyage homeward; but through the instructions of Peter Böhler, a Moravian minister in London, he was enabled to exercise a simple faith in the merits and mediation of Jesus. He dated his conversion from the 24th of May 1738, and having obtained peace and joy in believing, he burned with ardent desire that others should become partakers of like precious faith. The momentary relief which he himself had obtained under the teaching of Böhler, led him to entertain the opinion which he afterwards delighted to proclaim of the possible instantaneousness of conversion—a doctrine which, as held by the followers of Wesley, only implies that they maintain the act of conversion to be sometimes, though not always, instantaneous.

John Wesley now sought access to the pulpits of some of the most evangelical ministers of the Establishment, and wherever he was permitted, he preached justification by faith in the Lord Jesus, which had now become his favourite doctrine. One after another, however, excluded him from their pulpits. Private meetings, accordingly, were forced upon him. About fifty persons agreed to meet once a-week in small companies or bands of from five to ten persons each for mutual conversation, with occasional love feasts. "The first rise of Methodism," says Wesley, "was in November 1729, when four of us met together at Oxford; the second was at Savannah in April 1736; the third at London on this day, May 1st, 1738."

A small society of earnest religious persons met in Fetter Lane, London, and of this little band Whitfield and the two Wesleys were members. To become still better acquainted with the rules and habits of the Moravian Brethren, John Wesley paid a visit to their settlement at Herrnhut in Germany. On his return to London, he and his followers were associated at Fetter Lane with the Moravians; but several Societies wholly composed of Methodists met in London, Bristol, and other places. Whitfield and Wesley now commenced outdoor preaching, and with the most wonderful success. Wherever they went crowds flocked to hear from their mouths the glad tidings of salvation through a Redeemer. In his diary, Wesley frequently mentions that thousands waited upon his ministry in the open fields, and although the service might commence amid annoyance and persecution, he generally succeeded ere long in subduing his audience to quietness and attention. Thus was Methodism at its first outset beset with difficulties and much opposition. But the great founder of the system was unwearied in his exertions to advance the good cause. For a time he took particular pleasure in co-operating with the Moravians, whose simplicity of faith and purity of life he had learned to admire. But the more closely he examined the doctrines and precepts of the Brethren, his admiration diminished, and at length he became disgusted with their mysticism, their exclusiveness, and their tendency to Antinomianism. He therefore published a protest against their tenets and practices, and retired with his followers to the Foundry in Moorfields.

About the same time Wesley separated from Whitfield in consequence of a difference of opinion which arose between them on the subject of election. The Wesleys had for some time evinced a decided leaning towards Arminian views, while Whitfield entertained a strong partiality for Calvinistic sentiments. The contest was carried on with the utmost ardour, and even unseemly bitterness, on both sides, though not by the leaders in the controversy, at least by their subordinates. John Wesley was most unwilling that a rupture should take place, and to prevent such an unhappy result, he drew up certain statements in regard to the three disputed points, unconditional election, irresistible grace, and the final perseverance of the saints, hoping that both he and his opponents might still have it in their power to continue their united labours in the cause of Christ. The difference of opinion, however, was found to be such as to call for their friendly separation, which accordingly took place in 1740, without however diminishing the respect and esteem which Wesley and Whitfield entertained for each other.

Up to this period, the great founder of Wesleyan Methodism seems never to have contemplated the formation of a church or separate denomination of Christians. Strongly attached to the Church of England, he continued to minister within her pale as long as he was allowed to do so, and even when prevented from officiating in her pulpits, he recommended his followers to adhere to her doctrines and worship. In forming Societies, his primary wish seems to have been to gather together little bands of earnest Christian men, whose simple design was mutual edification. The Societies were at first accordingly separate and detached, with no other uniting bond than a common object or end. As they increased in number, however, certain regulations were framed for their guidance. These are regarded by the Wesleyan Methodists as binding upon the body to this day. In the preamble to the Rules, Mr. Wesley thus describes the origin of the Societies: "In the latter end of the year 1739, eight or ten persons came to me in London, who appeared to be deeply convinced of sin, and earnestly groaning for redemption. They desired (as did two or three more the next day) that I should spend some time with them in prayer, and advise them how to flee from the wrath to come, which they saw continually hanging over their heads. That we might have more time for this great work, I appointed a day when they might all come together, which from thenceforward they did every week, viz., on Thursday in the evening. To these, and as many more as desired to join with them (for their number increased daily), I gave those advices from time to time which I judged most useful for them, and we always concluded our meetings with prayer suitable to their several necessities."

Methodism under Mr. Wesley now began to assume a regularly organized system. Money was collected; meeting-houses were built or rented in different places for the accommodation of the members of the United Society; and that each individual might be an object of careful instruction, the Societies were divided into classes of twelve persons, each class having its distinct superintendent or class-leader, whose duty is thus laid down. 1. To see each person in his class once a-week, at least, in order to inquire how their souls prosper; to advise, reprove, comfort or exhort, as occasion may require; to receive what they are willing to give towards the poor, or towards the gospel. 2. To meet the minister and the stewards of the Society once a-week, in order to inform the minister of any that are sick, or of any that walk disorderly and will not be reprov'd; to pay to the stewards what they have received of their several classes in the week preceding; and to show their account of what each person has contributed.

The only condition required of any person who wishes to be admitted into a Methodist Society, is, in the words of Wesley, "a desire to flee from the wrath to come; to be saved from their sins." Such a desire, wherever it truly exists, will of course manifest itself by its fruits, and accordingly those who in joining the Methodist Societies declare that they are animated by a desire for salvation, are expected to give evidence of it by the following traits of character and conduct:

"First, by doing no harm; by avoiding evil in every kind; especially that which is most generally practised, such as taking the name of God in vain; the profaning the day of the Lord, either by doing ordinary work thereon, or by buying or selling; drunkenness; buying or selling spirituous liquors, or drinking them, unless in cases of extreme necessity; fighting, quarrelling, brawling; brother going to law with brother; returning evil for evil, or railing for railing; the using many words in buying or selling; the buying or selling uncustomed goods; the giving or taking things on usury; i. e. unlawful interest.

"Uncharitable or unprofitable conversation; particularly speaking evil of magistrates or of ministers.

"Doing to others as we would not they should do unto us.

"Doing what we know is not for the glory of God; as the putting on gold or costly apparel; the taking such diversions as cannot be used in the name of the Lord Jesus.

"The singing those songs, or reading those books, which do not tend to the knowledge or love of God; softness and needless self-indulgence; laying up treasure upon the earth; borrowing without a probability of paying, or taking up goods without a probability of paying for them.

"It is expected of all who continue in these Societies that they should continue to evidence their desire of salvation,— "Secondly, by doing good; by being in every kind merciful after their power, as they have opportunity; doing good of every possible sort, and as far as possible, to all men; to their bodies, of the ability which God giveth; by giving food to the hungry, by clothing the naked, by visiting or helping them that are sick, or in prison; to their souls, by instructing, reproving, or exhorting all we have any intercourse with; trampling under foot that enthusiastic doctrine of devils, that, 'We are not to do good, unless our hearts be free to it.'

"By doing good, especially to them that are of the household of faith, or growing so to be; employing them preferably to others; buying one of another; helping each other in business; and so much the more, because the world will love its own, and them only; by all possible diligence and frugality, that the gospel be not blamed; by running with patience the race set before them, denying themselves, and taking up their cross daily; submitting to bear the reproach of Christ; to be as the filth and off-scouring of the world, and looking that men should say all manner of evil of them falsely for the Lord's sake.

"It is expected of all who desire to continue in these Societies, that they should continue to evidence their desire of salvation,—

"Thirdly, by attending on all the ordinances of God; such are, the public worship of God; the ministry of the word, either read or expounded; the supper of the Lord; family and private prayer; searching the Scriptures; and fasting and abstinence."

Such were the general rules drawn up for the Methodist Societies by John and Charles Wesley. No formal creed was adopted, and persons of all denominations were welcome to join the body provided simply they were willing to conform to the regulations now stated. As yet it is quite plain that Wesley had no intention to form a separate sect. His whole feelings were in favour of the Church of England, and it would have afforded him peculiar satisfaction if the clergy of that church would have taken the members of the Methodist societies throughout the country under their spiritual oversight. The greatest coolness, however, was manifested on the part of the Established clergy towards Wesley and his followers. Hence the necessity arose for lay agency in order to secure the instruction and supervision of the converts. Pious and experienced men were accordingly selected to discharge this important duty. At first they were permitted only to expound the Scriptures in a plain familiar style; but in course of time lay preaching was reluctantly sanctioned. Thus there was sent forth a large staff of zealous men, who proclaimed the glad tidings of salvation with such energy and success, that many new converts were added to the ranks of Methodism. Several clergymen also connected themselves with the movement, who, along with Wesley and a large body of lay assistants, carried on a regular system of open-air preaching, which was attended everywhere by immense crowds of eager and attentive hearers.

The rapid growth of the Methodist Society called for some further steps towards union and system. By the invitation of the Wesleys, therefore, the leaders were invited to meet in London, and in June 1744 the first Conference was held. See CONFERENCE (WESLEYAN). Hitherto the preachers had carried on their operations simply under the direction of Mr. Wesley, but without any intercourse with one another. But by uniting them in Conference they were enabled to adopt a regular and systematic arrangement. At the first Conference only six persons were present, of whom five were clergymen of the Established Church. With this small Convention originated a thoroughly organized ecclesiastical structure, which has proved itself one of the most potent influences in the religious history of England. The Methodist movement was now reduced to order. The country was divided into circuits, each with its assistant or superintendent. All chapels were conveyed to lay trustees; travelling preachers were allowed a stated sum for support, and regulations were laid down for the guidance of the different officers of the Society: all, however, being under the undisputed control of John Wesley, Charles, his younger brother, having withdrawn from the active management of affairs in consequence of his disapproval of lay-preaching.

The Conference met regularly every year, and one improvement after another was introduced into the system of Methodism according as peculiar circumstances seemed to demand. One point Wesley kept in view in all his arrangements, to prevent if possible the separation of the Societies from the Church of England. It was with the utmost reluctance that he deviated even in the slightest degree from church order. Even when the numbers of his adherents were very large, and their preachers had obtained great influence over the people, the sacraments were received only in the parish churches. Many years elapsed before the sacraments were administered, or pastoral authority exercised by the Wesleyan preachers. This of itself is a sufficient indication how unwilling Mr. Wesley was to dis sever his adherents from the Church of England, or to establish a separate and independent sect.

How rapidly the Methodists increased in number after the organization of the body, may be seen from the fact, that, in 1749, there were twenty circuits in England, two in Wales, two in Scotland, and seven in Ireland. In 1765 the circuits in England had increased to twenty-five, those in Scotland to four, and those in Ireland to eight. Methodism had now become an important agency in reviving Christianity in England, and both in doctrine and discipline it had assumed a regular and consistent form, not by any preconcerted plan on the part of Mr. Wesley, but simply by the leadings of Providence. "Our venerable Founder," says the Conference of 1824, "kept one end only in view,—the diffusion of scriptural Christianity throughout the land, and the preservation of all who had believed, through grace, in the simplicity of the Gospel. This guiding principle he steadily followed; and to that he surrendered, cautiously, but faithfully, whatever, in his preconceived opinions, he discovered to be contrary to the indications of Him whose the work was, and to whom he had yielded himself up, implicitly, as his servant and instrument. In the further growth of the Societies, the same guidance of providential circumstances,—the same 'signs of the times,'—led to that full provision for the direction of the Societies, and for their being supplied with all the ordinances of the Christian Church, and to that more perfect pastoral care which the number of the members, and the vastness of the congregations, (collected not out of the spoils of other churches, but out of 'the world' which lieth in wickedness,) imperatively required. Less than this, the demands of piety and conscience would not allow; more than those interests required, has not been aimed at. The object has, at no time, been to make a sect, but to extend the Christianity of the Scriptures throughout the land; not to give currency to a mere system of opinions, but to bring men everywhere under the effectual influence of the 'truth which is according to godliness;' and, in the degree to which God should give his blessing to these efforts, to fold the gathered flock from danger, and to supply to it wholesome and sufficient pasture. These, beloved brethren, are the principles which lead us to God alone, who has made us 'a people who were not a people,'—and which constantly remind us of the purposes for which we were thus gathered in His name, and that our only business on earth is to show forth the praises of Him, 'who hath called us out of darkness into marvellous light.'"

The year 1784 constituted one of the most important eras in the history of Wesleyan Methodism. It was at this period that, in order to secure the stability and government of the connexion after his removal, Mr. Wesley got a "Deed of Declaration" drawn up and regularly enrolled in the High Court of Chancery, which established a legal description or definition of the term "Conference of the people called Methodists." Without this legal instrument the Conference would have become, at Wesley's death, a complete nonentity in the eye of law. But another event which, by its importance and manifold bearings, signaled the year 1784, was, that, in the course of it, Mr. Wesley, for the first time, assumed and exercised the power of ordination in the case of Dr. Coke, whom he appointed superintendent of the Methodist Societies in North America. In this act he was assisted by other ordained ministers; and in taking upon himself this power, though only a presbyter of the Church of England, he justified himself by an appeal to the exigencies of the case, many of his adherents in the southern provinces of North America being greatly distressed for want of ministers to administer the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper according to the usages of the Church of England. On the same principle, in 1787, three of the English preachers were ordained for Scotland.

Happily for the interests of Wesleyan Methodism, its founder lived till he had reached the advanced age of eighty-seven, and thus enjoyed the high privilege of seeing the cause which he had originated fully consolidated, and in vigorous operation, exercising an influence over the religion of the English people second only to that of the National Establishment itself. Wesley's death, in 1791, necessarily produced a great alteration in the relations of the people and the Conference. Throughout his life he had acted as the arbiter between these two parties, and such was the respect, and even veneration in which he was held, that his decisions invariably commanded instant and cordial submission. The Conference naturally imagined that after his death the power and authority which he possessed might safely be exercised by them; but there being no one now to moderate or restrain its exercise, considerable dissension existed from 1792 to 1797, when at length certain rules, a portion of which were called "The Rules of Pacification," were agreed to by the Conference, placing some limitation upon the power of the preachers, and increasing that of the people.

The death of the founder of Methodism was deeply deplored by the whole connexion. It was felt by multitudes to be the loss of their spiritual father. He was the final arbiter in all disputes which arose throughout the body, and even the Conference itself had been wont to bow with implicit submission to his will. No wonder, therefore, that the removal of such a man,—a man so universally honoured, respected, and beloved,—should have been mourned as an almost irreparable loss. And all the more deeply was his departure regretted, that no sooner was he withdrawn from them than the most painful dissensions broke out among his followers. Difficulties began to arise as to the rights of trustees over the chapels, and over the appointment of ministers; and a question was now agitated for the first time as to the right of the laity to participate in the spiritual and secular government of the body. It had been the anxious desire of Wesley throughout his life, to obviate any chance of a collision between the Methodists and the Established Church. No such delicacy, however, was felt by his followers after his decease. The people urged upon the Conference their "right to hold public religious worship at such hours as were most convenient, without being restricted to the mere intervals of the hours appointed for service in the Established Church."

And not only so, but the popular demands rose still higher. The members of the Methodist body were no longer contented with occupying the comparatively humble position of a Society, beyond which the ambition of their founder had never risen; they demanded that Methodism should be recognized as a church, ordaining ministers, dispensing sacraments, and administering discipline.

For several years the Methodist Societies were in a state of the utmost confusion and insubordination; and this was aggravated by an attempt, on the part of the travelling preachers, to exercise over the people the same power which Wesley had exercised during his life. Year after year the Conference had under their serious consideration the alarming state of matters in the body generally, and the necessity of discovering some efficient remedy. At length, in 1795, a Plan of Pacification was devised by the Conference, which, for a time at least, allayed the widespread discontent, by yielding to a certain extent to the demands of the people. Thus it was decided, that the ministerial office should no longer be limited in its duties to the preaching of the gospel, but should include also the dispensation of the sacraments, by those only, however, who were authorized by the Conference, and at such times and in such manner only as the Conference should appoint. In regard to the claims of the chapel trustees and the laity generally, the Plan of Pacification declared the absolute right of the Conference to appoint preachers, and the inability of the trustees to refuse their admission into the chapels. While thus resisting, to a certain extent, the demands of the trustees, the Conference formed a new court, for purposes of Discipline, consisting of all the preachers of the district and all the trustees, stewards, and leaders of the circuit; and before this court any accusation against a preacher could be laid, while it had power to suspend him from his office until next Conference, to whom the case must be referred.

The Plan of Pacification thus framed in 1795 continues in force among the Wesleyans down to the present day. The framework of Methodism was now set up, and the body thoroughly organized, though great numbers of its people still remained in communion with the Church of England. The following concise and comprehensive view of the entire system of Wesleyan Methodism is given by the Rev. R. Spence Hardy, in his 'Memorials of Jonas Sugden: "No one is regarded as a member of this church who does not meet in class. Each class consists of from twelve to twenty persons, who are under the care of a leader. They meet together every week to relate their spiritual exercises, and receive advices from the leader, commencing and concluding with singing and prayer, and, at the same time, a small sum is given towards the sustentation of the ministry. The class-meeting is regarded as the most precious and efficient of the arrangements peculiar to Methodism; its safeguard, its power, and its hope. The leaders of each Society meet together weekly, and then pay in the contributions they have received to their own steward. Another meeting is held quarterly, of local preachers, leaders, stewards, and trustees of chapels, from all the Societies in the circuit, when the Society-stewards hand over the contributions from the classes to the circuit-stewards, through whom the ministers receive their stipend. A circuit comprises the portion of country under the care of the same ministers, who officiate alternately in all the chapels within its limits. They are assisted by local preachers, a useful and honourable class of men, who, without fee or earthly reward, preach the gospel on the Sabbath, but on the week-days follow a secular calling. They are more numerous than the ministers; there being at present in the Keighley circuit, three ministers and thirty-five local preachers. No minister can remain in the same circuit more than three years. Several circuits form a district, all the ministers and circuit-stewards of which meet together annually, for the transaction of business preparatory to the Conference; and the ministers, in a committee of their own, examine character, receive candidates for the ministry, and inquire into the spiritual state of each circuit, taking account of the number of members in Society. In England there are 439 circuits and 29 districts. The minister having charge of a circuit is called the superintendent; and of a district, the chairman. The highest ecclesiastical court is the Conference. It meets annually in one or other of the principal towns in England, and is attended by from three to five hundred ministers. At this time ministers are admitted and ordained; every minister's name in the whole connexion, in whatever part of the world resident, is read aloud, and relative to each the question is asked, if there be any objection to his character, and the representative of the district in which he lives must return an answer, founded on previous investigation, in each separate case; cases of discipline are examined; the ministers are appointed to the circuits in which they are to labour during the following year; each of the connexional institutions and Societies passes under review; officers and committees are appointed; and all business is transacted that relates to the general interests of this branch of the Church of Christ. Previous to the sitting of the Conference, all matters connected with finance are arranged, in preparatory committees, composed of ministers and of the principal laymen in the Connexion. To the uninitiated stranger, Methodism may appear like a tissue of meaningless anomalies; but on a nearer acquaintance he would find that it is a wonderful system of nice adjustment and adaptation; in no other church is lay agency employed to the same extent, and yet in no other church are the ministers more independent of any influence that might deter them from the declaration of unwelcome truth, or the exercise of a godly discipline; and its efficiency is made manifest in nearly every place in which its course is not obstructed by those who have previously rendered themselves amenable to the censure of its courts, or by the members of other churches who would seek to assimilate it to their own institutions."

Besides the Classes, to which the Wesleyan Methodists attach much importance as the very life of their system, there are also still smaller collections of four or five persons called "Bands," which were first established by Mr. Wesley in 1742. These little companies were instituted to afford an opportunity to the members of the Society of a more private and unrestrained confession to each other, in accordance with the Apostolic exhortation, "Confess your faults one to another." The persons forming each "band" are all of the same condition; either married women or single women, married men or single men. The rules of the "Bands" are (1.) That nothing spoken in the Society be spoken again; (2.) That every member submit to his minister in all indifferent things; (3.) That every member bring once a-week, all he can spare to a common stock. The four following questions are to be proposed to the members separately at every weekly meeting: 1. What known sins have you committed since our last meeting? 2. What temptations have you met with? 3. How were you delivered? 4. What have you thought, said, or done, of which you doubt whether it be a sin or not?

The classes attached to each Wesleyan chapel are termed as a whole, a "Society," which corresponds to a church or congregation in other denominations; and a number of Societies within a certain range are termed a "circuit." In each circuit there are two descriptions of preachers, regular and local. The regular are separated entirely to the work of the ministry, and are supported by the weekly and quarterly contributions of members in their classes, and the proceeds of what are called Quarterly Collections, made in every congregation once in three months. From one to four "itinerant preachers," as the regular ministers are called, are appointed for a term not exceeding three years in immediate succession to the same circuit. They are expected not to confine their ministry to one place, but to itinerate throughout the circuit. There are probably about 1,000 Wesleyan itinerant preachers in Great Britain. The local preachers follow a secular calling, and preach on the Sabbaths according to a plan which is laid down every quarter. The number of these local preachers is about 15,000.

The public worship of the Wesleyan body varies considerably in different places. In some, more especially of the larger chapels in London, and other large towns in England, the Liturgy of the Church of England is in regular use; while in many chapels the service is conducted wholly in an extemporary form. When the Liturgy is used, it is according to a revised form, which was prepared by Wesley for his adherents. The thirty-nine articles also of the Church of England are reduced in the hands of the Wesleyans to twenty-five. The rite of confirmation is not practised by the body, but many parents belonging to the Connexion send their children to be confirmed by an English bishop. The Lord's Supper is usually administered according to the rubric of the Church of England. Love Feasts are occasionally celebrated; and a solemn Watch-night or midnight meeting at the close of each year is regularly observed. There is also a practice observed in the beginning of the year, called the "renewing of the covenant," when the members of the Society dedicate themselves anew to the Lord. The hymn-book forms an important element in the worship of the Wesleyan Methodists, and where instrumental music is used in any of their chapels, the utmost care is taken that the congregation be encouraged to join with heart and voice in singing the praises of God. A quarterly fast is enjoined to be kept by each member of the Society.

No feature of Wesleyan Methodism has given rise to more frequent and more violent disputes than the exclusively clerical composition of the Conference. Towards the end of the last century, when a love of change and an impatience of restraint was so strongly engendered by the French Revolution, a class of people arose among the followers of Wesley, who, enthusiastic for liberty, demanded that the laity should be represented in the Conference as well as the clergy. And this cry for popular rights was not only raised without, but also within the Conference, and under the leadership of Mr. Killam a secession on this account took place in 1796. The question as to the admission of lay-delegates was carefully discussed at the next meeting of Conference, and after mature deliberation it was decided "that they cannot admit any but regular travelling preachers into their body, either in the Conference or in district meetings, and preserve the system of Methodism entire; particularly the itinerant plan which they are determined to support." This decided refusal on the part of the Conference to allow the introduction of the lay element into their body, gave rise to the formation of a new society of Methodists, commonly known by the name of Killhamites, or as they styled themselves, the METHODIST (WESLEYAN) NEW CONNEXION (which see).

The agitation of the subject of lay delegation, and the secession which followed, led the Conference to grant several concessions, handing over a portion of the authority which they themselves had hitherto exercised in financial and other secular matters, to the quarterly and district meetings. The laity were also admitted to a share in the exercise of discipline both in the matter of the admission and the expulsion of members. In consequence of these concessions, harmony was restored, and for thirty years peace reigned throughout the whole of the original Connexion. Every year the Wesleyans increased in numbers, and grew in influence and political importance. In several public questions they took an active interest, more especially in the suppression of the slave trade, and in the emancipation of the slaves.

In 1827 a controversy arose, which gave rise to much unseemly contention. The trustees of a chapel in Leeds being desirous of introducing an organ, made application to the District Meeting for permission to do so, which, however, was refused. Accordingly, the Trustees appealed to the Conference, who reversed the decision of the District Meeting, and granted the request. A discussion now commenced throughout the Society on the question, whether the Conference possessed the right of overruling the decision of a District Meeting. About the same time the question was revived and keenly discussed as to the power of preachers to expel members from the Society; and as this power was both claimed and exercised by the preachers, several thousand members left the Connection.

A still more serious secession took place from the Wesleyan Methodists in 1835, giving rise to the Wesleyan Methodist Association. This additional rupture arose out of the case of Dr. Warren, who, in consequence of his active opposition to some measures adopted by Conference, was suspended by the Manchester District Meeting. Against this sentence he appealed to the Court of Chancery, which decided against him, and affirmed the power of the District Meeting to suspend, and declared that in the circumstances they had acted legally. The Conference, in a formal resolution, recorded their fervent gratitude to the Great Head of the Church for the gracious interpositions of his providence in this decree of the Court of Chancery, "securing to the preachers appointed by the Conference the inalienable occupation of our pulpits; recognising the pastoral supervision and authority of the Conference as the supreme tribunal of Methodism, through the medium of its district committees, and affording the ample security of British law to the general economy of Wesleyan Methodism."

Not even by this third secession was the inherent strength or vitality of Methodism to any considerable extent diminished. The year 1839 was celebrated as the centenary of the Society, and during the hundred years which had passed since its foundation, the number of regular chapels had risen to the large number of 3,000, in addition to the numerous preaching stations where no chapels had been built. The ministers of the Wesleyan body were reported in that year to amount to 1,019, the local preachers to about 4,000, and the members to 296,801. Such is the vigour and efficiency of this compact body of Christians, that on the occasion of celebrating their centenary, they contributed a sum amounting to £216,000, which was expended in the erection of the Theological Institutions, the Centenary Hall and Mission House in London, and the Centenary Chapel in Dublin; the purchase of a Missionary ship; the reduction of Chapel-debts to a large extent; the formation of the Education Fund for the extension of Day-schools, and of the Worn-out Ministers and Ministers' Widows Fund, with other important objects.

Amid all the rejoicings and congratulations of the jubilee year, however, new trials were preparing for Wesleyan Methodism. The idea very generally prevailed throughout the Societies that the legitimate influence which had once belonged to the Leaders' Meetings and the Quarterly Meetings was seriously abridged, and that the Conference, or rather a small party in the Conference, ruled with uncontrolled and despotic authority. The feelings of discontent and dissatisfaction which were entertained in many quarters, found vent in several tracts, which appeared at intervals between 1844 and 1848, under the name of the 'Fly Sheets.' These tracts, which were published anonymously, were evidently the production either of a member of Conference, or at all events of one who was acquainted with all its proceedings; and their chief object seemed to be not a change in the constitution of the Wesleyan body, but a change in the mode of its administration. Such severe and even scurrilous attacks as were contained in the 'Fly Sheets,' were fitted only to produce irritation in the minds of those whose proceedings were so freely canvassed, and the Conference therefore proceeded to take steps for the discovery of the persons who had been implicated in the preparation and publication of the 'Fly Sheets.' To facilitate the discovery of the guilty parties, the question was put to each of the suspected parties, whether he was the author of the obnoxious tracts. Three of the brethren declined to reply to the question, and were in consequence expelled, while two other ministers were censured and degraded from the office of superintendent, but not expelled. These prompt and decisive measures appeared for a short time to restore order and quiet throughout the Societies; but in the course of two years more the Conference found it necessary to expel another minister for countenancing the "unrighteous agitation." The general prosperity of the body, however, was unimpaired by all that had happened, the members actually admitted having increased by 9,000 in the year 1850, while 20,000 more had been taken on trial.

A serious crisis now seemed to be rapidly approaching. The agitation which had so long been spreading secretly among the people, found vent in numerous memorials to the Conference, which were only answered by an avowal of the determination of that court to adhere to the true principles of Methodism. Four hundred delegates from the discontented parties throughout the kingdom held a meeting in London previous to the meeting of Conference, and when the supreme court assembled, petitions, with more than 50,000 signatures, were laid upon the table, praying for the redress of certain grievances, and the concession of certain rights. Finding that matters had assumed an aspect so alarming, the Conference resolved to act with firmness, and, accordingly, with an unsparing hand, they cut off from all connexion with the Society every individual who had been in any way concerned in the meeting of delegates, and all even to the extent of whole classes and societies who had been accessory to those disturbances which were threatening the very existence of Methodism in England.

The Conference of 1851 conducted its proceedings in a spirit of undiminished firmness. The delegates again assembled and sought an interview with the supreme court, but were refused. Still a step in advance was gained, for several memorials having been presented from the disaffected, the Conference appointed a large committee of their number to "examine the suggestions contained in them, and to report on the same." The president was also authorized, if he saw fit, to invite a number of suitable laymen "to confer with them on the results to which they had attained." It was all the more necessary to adopt such conciliatory measures, the Connexion having lost in the course of the year the enormous number of 56,000 members by expulsion and secession.

With so large a body of members alienated from her communion in the course of a single year, the Wesleyan Methodist Church had now evidently reached a crisis in her history. But the Conference refused to be driven from the position they had taken up, and in their annual address they declared their determination "to hold the pastoral crook with steady and unfaltering hand." Firmness, however, did not avail to check the growing dissatisfaction. A large assembly of members and office-bearers of the Society was held at Birmingham in December 1851, to deliberate upon "the present disastrous state of Methodism;" and on this occasion a document was signed by more than 700 trustees, leaders, and local preachers, containing a detailed enumeration of the grievances which it was expected the Conference would take steps to redress. Yet the agitation, far from being repressed, was as violent as ever when the Conference met at Sheffield in 1852, determined, although in the course of two years the Societies had lost 77,000, still to preserve the spirit of resistance by which it had hitherto been animated. The Declarationists, who had now reached the large number of 2,000, presented a respectful petition to the Conference praying to be heard by deputation. This request was refused, and the irritation thereby excited was aggravated by the circumstance that the President, while he had invited 745 laymen to meet with the Committee of Conference, had carefully excluded from the number every individual whose name was attached to the Birmingham declaration. By the conjoint labours of the Committee, and the laymen thus selected to deliberate along with them, several alterations were made with the view of conciliating the agitators.

But all was of no avail; the breach only became wider and wider as time rolled on. Another protest was issued in December 1852, denying "the right of itinerant ministers to excommunicate members without the sanction of the church or of its local officers; nor to depose officers without the sanction of their peers." "We cannot admit," it is added, "the right of either ministers, pastors, or others to select whom they please for special conference on matters upon which all are equally concerned. We cannot admit the right of any class of men to fetter all other classes in the church for the prevention of a free and honest expression of opinion on matters of church polity and discipline, put forth in a peaceable and godly manner." This protest, which was laid upon the table of the Conference at its meeting in 1853, was rejected, though the secession had been enlarged in the course of the previous year by the addition to its numbers of 10,000 Methodists.

The shock which the Wesleyan body has received of late years by the large secessions which have from time to time been thinning its ranks, shows the masculine strength and vigour of the Society, which after all continues to be one of the most powerful and influential religious denominations in England. The seceding bodies of Methodists are evidently disposed to maintain their position with firmness and perseverance; but none seem to push their distinctive principles to so great a length as the Wesleyan Reformers, a class of people which, though they have not assumed the form of a regular sect, hold opinions which are completely at variance with the fundamental principles of Wesleyan Methodism, as these are understood by the Conference. Thus they assert that the right of admitting members into the church, and excluding them from it, is vested only in the church-members, who are entitled to be present at all meetings in which the business of the church is transacted. They hold also that it belongs to the church to nominate and elect all office-bearers, and that the local courts should be independent of the Conference, and their decisions reckoned final. The Reformers still account themselves as Wesleyan Methodists, and instead of seceding from the Society and forming a new sect, they direct their whole efforts towards a complete change in the constitution of the original Connexion; and insist, as essential to the restoration of peace and harmony, that all preachers, officers, and members, who have been expelled in consequence of recent proceedings, should be restored. But although by the dissensions of late years Wesleyan Methodism is calculated to have lost 100,000 members, or one-third of the whole, the Conference and the remnant body maintain that the proceedings of Conference have been thoroughly in accordance with the constitution of the Society as laid down in the poll-deed, and besides, carry with them the warrant of Scripture. Such assumptions, of course, are strongly denied by the various seceding bodies, and the Conference is condemned as ex-exercising a clerical despotism from which the mind of Wesley would have revolted, and which is thought at variance not only with special passages, but with the whole spirit and tenor of the Word of God.

The Wesleyan Methodist Society is rapidly repairing the losses it has sustained by the retirement and expulsion of so many of its members, the number at present in communion with the Society being, according to the latest accounts in Great Britain, 270,095, being an increase during the last year of 6,260. The number of ministers in Great Britain is reported on the same authority to be 1,295, and preachers on trial, 83. In Ireland the members are 19,287, the ministers, 107, and the preachers on trial, 18. "The Wesleyan missions were commenced in 1786, and were until 1813 confined chiefly to British North America and the West Indies. In the December of that year, however, Dr. Coke, accompanied by a band of young missionaries, embarked for India. Up to this period, Dr. Coke had mainly raised the funds needed to carry on the Methodist Missionary operations. The additional evangelistic enterprise now entered upon made new arrangements and exertions necessary. Various plans were suggested; but that which originated with the late Rev. George Morley and the Rev. Dr. Bunting, then stationed in Leeds, and sanctioned by several of the ministers in that town and neighbourhood, was adopted by the ensuing Conference. That scheme has been greatly owned of God. In 1814 the income of the Missionary fund was below £7,000; there were 70 Missionaries, and the number of members under their care was 18,747. Now, there are, according to the last returns, 114,528 accredited church-members, besides 6,922 on trial for membership, under the care of 632 Missionaries; and the income is £119,205 8s. 2d."

METHODIST (WESLEYAN) ASSOCIATION.

The most frequent source of the dissensions which have agitated the Societies of the Wesleyan Methodists has involved the question, Where lies the power of expelling members from the body? Is it with the preachers solely? as the Conference affirms; or with preachers and class leaders jointly? as the movement party maintain. The controversies which have been raised upon this point have almost uniformly terminated in a secession. One of the most recent of these disputes led to the formation of the Wesleyan Methodist Association. In 1834 a discussion commenced as to the propriety of establishing a Theological Institution, and a minister, named Dr. Warren, having publicly expressed his disapproval of the measure, and published a pamphlet against it, was expelled from the Connexion by the District meeting at Leeds. Several parties who held and avowed similar sentiments were also cut off. Such summary proceedings, on the part of the local courts, led to a keen controversy throughout the Wesleyan Societies generally, affecting the government of the church. Matters had now assumed so threatening an aspect that the Conference in 1835 took action on the subject. They refused to yield the point which they had always maintained, that the ministers have the exclusive power of passing sentence on convicted members; but at the same time they deemed it expedient to introduce certain limitations which tended to modify the disciplinary authority which they held as essentially belonging to the pastoral office. The limiting clauses enacted at this time professed to guard accused members against unfair treatment. Thus it was enacted (1.) That the sentence should not be pronounced till a week after the trial. (2.) That in difficult cases the superintendent should consult the leaders and others. (3.) That cases of proposed expulsion should be brought before the weekly meeting of preachers; and (4.) That an appeal should be allowed by either party to a "minor district meeting," composed of five preachers, two selected by the superintendent, two by the accused, the fifth being universally the chairman of the district. Other conciliatory measures were also passed by the Conference, which, however, left the entire government of the Connexion, at least in all essential matters, exclusively in the hands of the ministers. The movement party, therefore, having failed to obtain the reforms they sought, seceded, and in 1835 became a separate and independent Methodist Society.

The Wesleyan Methodist Association differs from the original Connexion neither in doctrine nor worship, but solely in constitutional arrangements. The principal peculiarities are thus stated in their own published 'Regulations': "The Annual Assembly (answering to the Old Wesleyan Conference) is distinguished by the introduction of the laity as representatives. It consists of such of the itinerant and local preachers, and other official or private members, as the circuits, societies, or churches in union with the Association (and contributing £50 to the support of the ministry) elect. The number of representatives is regulated by the number of constituents. Circuits with less than 500 members send one; those with more than 500 and less than 1,000 send two; and such as have more than 1,000 send three. The Annual Assembly admits persons on trial as preachers, examines them, receives them into full connexion, appoints them to their circuits, and excludes or censures them when necessary. It also directs the application of all General or Connexional Funds, and appoints a committee to represent it till the next Assembly. But it does not interfere with strictly local matters, for 'each circuit has the right and power to govern itself by its local courts, without any interference as to the management of its internal affairs.'"

It is a distinctive feature in the ecclesiastical government of the "Association," that in matters of discipline the laity are permitted to exercise more influence than in the original Wesleyan Connexion.

Accordingly, it is provided that "no member shall be expelled from the Association except by the direction of a majority of a leaders' society, or Circuit Quarterly Meeting." The Methodist Association has made rapid progress, and is now a large and increasing body. In 1857 there were in England ninety three preachers. The members in England and Scotland were 20,873; in Wales, 250; in Ireland, 34; and on foreign stations, 1,185.

METHODIST (WESLEYAN) NEW CONNEXION. This large body of seceders from the Wesleyan Methodist Society owes its origin to the Rev. Alexander Kilham. This Methodist minister, who was a native of Epworth in Lincolnshire, the birth-place of the Wesleys, first rendered himself conspicuous by claiming the right of the people to meet for worship in church hours, and to receive the sacraments from their own ministers. In a pamphlet which he published under the name of the 'Progress of Liberty,' he advocated warmly the necessity of the laity being admitted to a share in the government of the church. The expression of such opinions rendered him obnoxious to the Conference, who, in 1796, expelled him from the Connexion. A large number of Wesleyan Methodists, amounting to 5,000, sympathized with the sentiments of Kilham, and his expulsion accordingly led, in 1797, to the formation of a separate body, called the New Connexion. The New agrees with the Old Connexion in doctrine, and in all its distinctive features. It has the same ecclesiastical machinery, including classes, circuits, districts, and the Conference. The chief difference between the two lies in the degree of power allowed in each communion to the laity. In the Original Connexion all authority is virtually vested in the preachers, who not only exclusively compose the Conference, but exercise the chief influence in the inferior courts. The New Connexion, on the contrary, admits in all its courts the influence of the laity, giving them a share along with the preachers in all matters of church government; candidates for membership must be admitted, not by the minister alone, but with the consent of the whole of the existing members; members cannot be expelled even on a charge of immorality, without the concurrence of a leaders' meeting; officers of the body, whether leaders, ministers, or stewards, are elected by the church and ministers conjointly; and both in District Meetings and the Annual Conference lay delegates to the same number as ministers are present, freely chosen by the members of Societies.

In 1847 the Jubilee of the New Connexion was celebrated, and in honour of the occasion a large sum of money was raised, which has to a great extent reduced the debt on their chapels, and thus removed a heavy incumbrance from their congregations. They have a Magazine published monthly, which has a circulation of several thousands; a 'Juvenile Instructor' for the use of the young, and a weekly newspaper called the 'Methodist Pilot,' which is the organ of the denomination. At the Conference of 1857 there were reported as being in England 10 districts, 52 circuits, and 4 missions, 112 preachers, and 19,247 members; and in Canada 57 circuit preachers, and 4,405 members. Both in England and Canada this denomination is steadily on the increase.

METHODIST (WESLEYAN) REFORMERS, a considerable party of Methodists, who, though they have not formally seceded from the Original Wesleyan Connexion, nor formed themselves into a separate sect, occupy the position of a party who have been expelled by Conference from the Society, yet protest against their expulsion as illegal, and demand the restoration of all preachers, officers, and members, who have thus been, in their view, contrary to law and justice excluded. The proceedings of Conference which led to the formation of this party, took place in 1849, several ministers having been in that year expelled in consequence of their real or supposed connexion with the publication of a series of pamphlets called 'Fly Sheets,' in which some points of Methodist procedure were discussed in strong and, as it was deemed, scurrilous language. See METHODISTS, (WESLEYAN.) The chief point on which the complaints of the Reformers who sympathize with the expelled ministers turns, refers to ministerial authority in matters of church discipline. On this point their opinions are at complete variance with those of the Conference. In 1852 they published a 'Declaration of Principles,' which is as follows:

"(1.) That 'the Church of Christ is the whole body of true believers.'

"(2.) That Christ is head over all things to His church, and His Word the only and sufficient rule both of its faith and practice.

"(3.) That no rules or regulations should be adopted but such as are in accordance with the Holy Scriptures, and have received the full concurrence of the church.

"(4.) That the admission of members into the church, the exercise of discipline upon them, and their exclusion from the church, are rights vested solely in the hands of church members, to be exercised by them, either directly or representatively; and that it is the right of members to be present at all meetings for the transaction of the general business of the church.

"(5.) That the nomination and election of all office-bearers is the inalienable right of the church.

"(6.) That, while desirous of maintaining the connexional principle, we hold that all local courts should be independent, and their decisions affecting internal economy final.

"(7.) That any restriction upon discussion and free interchange of opinions on matters affecting the interests of the church is an unwarranted interference with its liberties and with the rights of private judgment.

"(8.) That preachers of the Gospel are not 'lords over God's heritage,' for 'one is your master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren.'

"(9.) That the restoration of all preachers, officers, and members who had been expelled in consequence of the recent proceedings of the Conference is essential to the future peace and prosperity of the Connexion."

In accordance with these principles, they have set in operation a distinct machinery of Methodism, though still claiming to be considered not as a seceding body, but as Wesleyan Methodists who have been illegally excluded from the Society. The Census in 1851 reports 339 chapels as then in connection with the movement, but this gives a very imperfect idea of the real state of the Reforming party, which in its present state is calculated to include at least one-half of the 100,000 members which the Wesleyan Methodist Connexion has lost in consequence of the controversies which have successively agitated the denomination for many years past.

METHYMNÆUS, a surname of Dionysus, supposed to be derived from Methymna, which was rich in vines.

METONIC CYCLE. At the beginning of the Common Prayer Book of the English Church are several astronomical tables, most of them simply calculations of the day on which Easter will fall on any given year, as well as the moveable feasts which depend upon it. In the early Christian church, as we have already shown under the article EASTER (which see), disputes arose on this point between the Eastern and the Western Churches. The subject was brought under the consideration of the council of Nice in the fourth century, when they came to a decision on which the following rule was founded;—"Easter-day is always the first Sunday after the full moon, which happens upon or next after the twenty-first day of March; and if the full moon happens on a Sunday, Easter-day is the Sunday after." Proceeding on this rule, it is necessary in the first instance to discover the precise time of the full moon, and to calculate accordingly. This would be an easy matter if the solar and the lunar years were exactly of equal length, since in such a case Easter would always fall on the same day. But the lunar year being shorter than the solar by eleven days, Easter must for a course of years always fall at a different time in each successive year. Accordingly, the council of Nice adopted the Metonic Cycle, which enabled them to calculate these changes with tolerable accuracy. From the high value attached to this cycle, its numbers were usually written in letters of gold in the calendar, and hence it was called the Golden Number.

METROPOLITAN, the bishop who presides over the other bishops of a province. In the Latin Church it is used as synonymous with an archbishop. In England, the archbishops of Canterbury and York are both Metropolitans. In the Greek Church it is applied only to a bishop whose see is a civil metropolis. This, it is probable, was the earliest use of the word, those bishops being exclusively so termed who presided over the principal town of a district or province. The title was not in use before the council of Nice in the fourth century. What has been termed by ecclesiastical historians the Metropolitan Constitution, in all probability arose gradually in the Christian church. Proclaimed first by the Apostles in cities, Christianity was thence spread to the other provincial towns. Thus naturally the churches of a province came to constitute a whole, at the head of which stood the church of the metropolis, whose bishop would of course occupy an honourable place among the bishops of the province. The progress of the Metropolitan Constitution in the fourth century is thus detailed by Neander: "On the one hand, to the metropolitans was conceded the superintendence over all ecclesiastical affairs of the province to which their metropolis belonged; it was decided that they should convoke the assemblies of provincial bishops, and preside over their deliberations; but, on the other hand, their relation to the entire collegium of the provincial bishops, and to the individuals composing it, were also more strictly defined, so as to prevent any arbitrary extension of their power, and to establish on a secure footing the independence of all the other bishops in the exercise of their functions. For this reason, the provincial synods, which were bound to assemble twice in each year, as the highest ecclesiastical tribunal for the whole province, were to assist the metropolitans in determining all questions relating to the general affairs of the church; and without their participation, the former were to be held incompetent to undertake any business relating to these matters of general concern. Each bishop was to be independent in the administration of his own particular diocese, although he could be arraigned before the tribunal of the provincial synods for ecclesiastical or moral delinquencies. No choice of a bishop could possess validity without the concurrence of the metropolitan; he was to conduct the ordination; yet not alone, but with the assistance of at least two other bishops; and all the bishops of the province were to be present at the ordination of the metropolitan."

The rise of the authority of Metropolitans seems to have taken place without any distinct interference on the part of the church. The council of Nice was the first to give an express deliverance on the subject, particularly with reference to the Alexandrian church. The sixth canon of that council ran in these terms: "Let the ancient custom which has prevailed in Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis, that the bishop of Alexandria should have authority over all these places, be still maintained, since this is the custom also with the Roman bishop. In like manner, at Antioch, and in the other provinces, the churches shall retain their ancient prerogatives." This canon refers evidently not to the ordinary person of a Metropolitan, but to a peculiar dignity or rank which seems to have been awarded to Alexandria, along with Rome and Antioch, the three great capital cities of the Roman Empire—a rank which was afterwards recognized under the name of PATRIARCHS (which see). It is not improbable that the power of the Metropolitans would have become excessive had it not been checked by the rise of the patriarchal system, which, though its foundation was laid before the fourth century, was not fully developed until the middle of the fifth. The appointment of patriarchs gave to the Metropolitans a subordinate place. But what tended above all to weaken the Metropolitan constitution was the disorganization of the Roman Empire by the descent of the barbarous tribes upon Italy. This, of course, introduced confusion into the limits of Metropolitan provinces. Difficulties also arose to prevent the redistribution of ecclesiastical provinces, which had thus become necessary for the maintenance of the Metropolitan system. A revival, indeed, of the Metropolitan authority was attempted by Pepin and Charlemagne; and it took effect in France and Germany with certain limitations and restrictions. But this institution, though on a reformed footing, never took firm root in the new states; partly in consequence of the dominant power of the sovereign, and partly in course of time, because it was overshadowed by the rising power of the Pope. Thus the Metropolitans gradually lost their power over the diocesan bishops of their provinces, and became little more than their titular superiors. Many of the bishops, accordingly, were quite prepared to throw off their authority, more especially as they were frequently chargeable with an unjust interference in diocesan affairs. In such a state of matters, the principles of the false decretals were the more readily adopted, as these laid down the doctrine that it belonged to the Pope alone to take cognizance of affairs in which bishops were concerned.

The Metropolitan power now underwent a rapid decline; and ere long the Metropolitans were placed merely in the position of papal delegates, and only retained so far as they promoted the interests of the Roman see. "The popes often, at pleasure," says the Rev. J. E. Riddle, in his History of the Papacy, "interfered with their ancient right of consecrating provincial bishops. As late as the eleventh century, this was regarded as the indefeasible right of Metropolitans, which could not be questioned or disturbed. Even Gregory VII., although he consecrated some provincial bishops under peculiar circumstances and as exceptional cases, made no attempt to invade the right of Metropolitans in this respect; so that, for example, when Robert entreated him to consecrate a new bishop of Malta, he wrote back word to him, that he must first show him that Malta did not belong to the Metropolitan province of Reggio, since in that case he would be unable to comply with his request, inasmuch as by so doing he would be infringing the right of the archbishop, and give inexcusable offence to all his brethren the bishops. Under the successors of Pascal II., however, it became a common practice for bishops elect to run to Rome for consecration from different provinces; and the Popes now began to perform the ceremony without even offering an apology to the Metropolitan for so doing. The right of Metropolitans to consecrate provincial bishops was not denied; but as soon as it was maintained that the right belonged also to the Pope, 'from the fulness of his power,' it was, to a great extent, taken practically out of their hands. Some Metropolitans sought to indemnify themselves for their loss by exercising an immediate jurisdiction within the dioceses of their provincial bishops; but the bishops found themselves protected from this invasion by Rome; and such attempts at immediate jurisdiction were expressly prohibited by Innocent III."

MEVLEVIES, the most remarkable of the rigid orders of Mohammedan monks. A thousand and one days is the mystic number prescribed by the noviciate, and the candidate receives his preliminary training in the kitchen of the convent. During his noviciate he is called "the scullion," and he is presented by the head-cook to the abbot or superior for admission into the order. The cook assists at the ceremony of initiation, holding the head of the novice while the superior pronounces some verses over him; a prayer is then chanted, after which the chief or abbot places upon the head of the novice the cylindrical cap worn by the Mevlevies; the candidate then sits down beside the cook, while the superior pronounces a form of admission, enumerates the duties incumbent upon him in connection with the order, and recommends the new member to the prayers and wishes of his brethren.

The doctrines of this order of Moslem monks are chiefly those of the Persian SUFIS (which see). In accordance with their extravagant opinions they have adopted not only new, but even forbidden practices. Thus music and dancing were strictly prohibited by the Prophet; but the Mevlevies insisted that the exercise of these in a mystic sense was an acceptable form of devotion. The mystic dances of the Mevlevies differ from those of other orders of Mohammedan monks. They are thus described by Dr. Taylor in his History of Mohammedanism: "Nine, eleven, or thirteen of the fraternity squat down on sheep-skins in a circle: the floor of the dancing-room is circular, its design being manifestly borrowed from a tent. They remain for nearly an hour perfectly silent, with their eyes closed, as if absorbed in meditation. The president then invites his brethren to join in reciting the first chapter of the Koran, 'to the honour of God, his prophets, especially Mohammed, the saints, Mohammed's wives, disciples, and descendants, the martyrs, the Khaliphs, the founder of the order, &c.' Prayers are then recited in chorus, and afterwards the dance begins. All quitting their places at the same time, range themselves on the left or their superior, and slowly advance towards him, with folded arms and downcast eyes. When the first of the Dervishes comes nearly opposite the president, he salutes, with a low bow, the tablet in the wall over his head, on which is engraved the name of the founder of the order; he then with two springs gets to the right side of the president, and having humbly saluted him, begins his dance. This consists in turning on the heel of the left foot, with closed eyes and extended arms, advancing slowly, and making as it were insensibly the round of the apartment. He is followed by the second and third Dervishes; after which all begin spinning on the foot, and moving round, taking care to keep at such a distance that they may not interfere with each other's motions. This fatiguing process continues two hours, interrupted only by two brief pauses, during which the Superior chants some short prayer. When the performance draws toward a close, the Superior joins in the dance, and the whole concludes with a prayer for the royal family, the clergy, the members of the order, and the faithful throughout the world."

The Mevlevies are the best endowed of all the orders of Moslem monks; yet they use only the coarsest fare and the plainest raiment, while they distribute their superabundant revenues to the poor. These Mevlevies or Maulavies are the Dancing Dervishes of Turkey, who date their origin from the early part of the thirteenth century. They chiefly consist of the higher class of Turks, and have a large monastery at Galata, and another at Teoninn.

MEXICO (RELIGION OF ANCIENT). Before the arrival of Columbus and the Spaniards in South America, Mexico formed the most powerful and populous, and with one doubtful exception, the most civilized empire of the western world. The traditions of the Toltees, handed down by the Aztecs or Mexicans proper, inform us that they migrated from an unknown country called the primitive Tapallan, about A. D. 544, and advancing southwards settled in Mexico about A. D. 642. The Mexicans proper, issuing from the far north, did not reach the borders of Anahuac till the beginning of the thirteenth century, and only fixed their habitation near the principal lake in 1325. At the beginning of the sixteenth century, just before the arrival of the Spaniards, the Aztec dominion reached across the continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific. In regard to the religion of the ancient Mexicans, the question has been raised, whether they were worshippers of many gods or of only one God. One thing is certain, that they had a general name for the Divine Being whom they termed Teo-tl. The kindred word Teot was used by the aboriginal population of Nicaragua to denote both the superior gods and also the Spaniards. That the Teo-tl of the Mexicans was the invisible, incorporeal Being, the Supreme Spirit, the Cause of causes, and the Father of all things, is plain from the fact that he was identified with the Teo-tl or sun-god. This one God of highest perfection and purity was only recognized by superior minds, but never worshipped by the great mass of the people. Hence Mr. Prescott remarks, "The idea of unity, of a being with whom volition is action, who has no need of inferior ministers to execute his purposes—was too simple or too vast for their understandings; and they sought relief as usual in the plurality of deities, who presided over the elements, the changes of the seasons, and the various occupations of man."

The chief divinities of the ancient Mexicans were thirteen in number, at the head of whom stands Tezcatlipoca, almost equal in rank with Teo-tl, the Supreme Being, and his name being interpreted "shining mirror," he is represented on the monuments, and in the paintings, as encircled by the disc of the sun. It is not improbable, indeed, that this deity was an impersonation of the generative powers of nature, and hence the Mexican legend represents him as united to the primitive goddess, and first woman Chikuacohuall, who is always accompanied by a great serpent. The highest emblem of Tezcatlipoca was the sun, and annually, in the month of May, a human being, in the vigour of youth and of unblemished beauty, was offered up in sacrifice, and the heart of the victim still palpitating was plucked from his bosom, held up towards the sun, as if to propitiate him, and then thrown down before the image of the great divinity, while the people were engaged in solemn worship. The national divinity, however, of the Aztecs or Mexicans proper, was the terrible Huitzilopochtli, whose name Müller derives from huitzilin, a humming-bird, and opochtli, on the left; and in accordance with this name his gigantic image had always some feathers of the humming-bird on the left foot. This was the mighty warlike god who was recognized as the guardian of the country, which seems to have received the appellation Mexico, from one of his titles, Mexitli. His wife was called Teoyamiqui, from miqui, to die, and teoyao, divine war, because she conducted the souls of warriors, who died in defence of the gods, to the house of the sun, the Elysium of the Mexicans, where she transformed them into humming-birds. "The numerous altars of Huitzilopochtli," says Mr. Hardwick, in his 'Christ and other Masters,' "reeked continually with the blood of human hecatombs, and that in cities where, amid some cheering gleams of moral sensibility, the conquerors found no lack of goodly structures and of graceful ornaments, to indicate the progress made by the ferocious Aztec in the arts of social life. These desperate efforts to secure the favour of the gods by offering human victims were indeed by no means limited to ancient Mexico; for all the wild tribes of America had been wont from ages immemorial to sacrifice both children of their own and prisoners taken in their savage conflicts with some neighbouring people. Acting also on the rude belief, that such oblations would conduce to gratify the animal wants of their divinity, as well as to appense his wrath, they had contracted the vile habit of feasting on the remnant of these human sacrifices, and at other times proceeded to indulge in the most brutish forms of cannibalism. But when the Aztec rule eventually prevailed in every part of Anahuac, the sacrificing of all foreign enemies became a still more solemn duty. We are told that 'the amount of victims immolated on its accursed altars would stagger the faith of the least scrupulous believer;' while cannibalism, that dark accompaniment of human sacrifice in almost every country, was in Mexico peculiarly rife, and from the partial efforts to disguise it, had become peculiarly revolting."

The enormous extent to which human sacrifices were offered to the national god, appears from the startling fact, that 136,090 human skulls were found by the companions of Cortés within the temple of Huitzilopochtli. Such was the importance attached to the favour and protection of this deity, that, in the migrations of the Aztec tribes, a wooden image of the god was carried on the shoulders of four priests.

The water-god of the ancient Mexicans was Tlaloc, on whose altars children were usually offered. To his wife, Chalchincueje, all infants were presented immediately after birth for purification. One of the most important divinities, however, of the Aztec pantheon, was Quetzalcoatl, who appears, indeed, to have been worshipped at an earlier period by the Toltecs. His birth is said to have been miraculous, and he was destined to become the high-priest of Tula, the metropolis founded by the Toltecs when they passed into Mexico. Great were the benefits which he conferred upon the nation, constructing an equitable code of laws, reforming the calendar, instructing the people in the arts of peace, and setting his face against all war and bloodshed. This was the golden age of Anahuac, when all was prosperity, and comfort, and peace. But such a state of things was of short duration. The god Tecuhtlipoca directed all his efforts towards undoing all that Quetzalcoatl had accomplished, and compelled him to quit the scene of his benevolent labours. On his departure he wandered towards Cholula, where, for some years, he carried out his plans for the civilization and improvement of the people. It was at this place that he was first worshipped as a god, a temple being dedicated to his honour. He appears to have been a personification of natural energies, and his symbols were the sparrow, the fire-stone, and the serpent. He was worshipped by all persons concerned in traffic. Forty days before the festival of the god, the merchants purchased a beautiful slave, who, during that time, represented the deity, and was obliged to assume an appearance of mirth, and to dance and rejoice while devotees worshipped him. On the feast day they sacrificed him to Quetzalcoatl. At Cholula this deity was worshipped in a manner somewhat different, five boys and five girls being sacrificed to him before any martial expedition was entered upon. It appears from the monuments that the Mexicans exhibited their deities in temples under the symbols of serpents, tigers, and other fierce and destructive animals, which inspired the mind with gloomy and terrible ideas. They sprinkled their altars with human blood; sacrificed in the temples every captive taken in war, and employed various other means to appease the vengeance of their angry deities.

MEZUZZOTH, schedules for door-posts among the modern Jews. A Mezuzza is a piece of parchment on which are written, Deut. vi. 4—9, "Hear, O Israel: The Lord our God is one Lord: and thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might. And these words, which I command thee this day, shall be in thine heart: And thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. And thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes. And thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, and on thy gates;" and xi. 13—20, "And it shall come to pass, if ye shall hearken diligently unto my commandments which I command you this day, to love the Lord your God, and to serve him with all your heart and with all your soul, that I will give you the rain of your land in his due season, the first rain and the latter rain, that thou mayest gather in thy corn, and thy wine, and thine oil. And I will send grass in thy fields for thy cattle, that thou mayest eat and be full. Take heed to yourselves, that your heart be not deceived, and ye turn aside and serve other gods, and worship them; and then the Lord's wrath be kindled against you, and he shut up the heaven, that there be no rain, and that the land yield not her fruit: and lest ye perish quickly from off the good land which the Lord giveth you. Therefore shall ye lay up these my words in your heart and in your soul, and bind them for a sign upon your hand, that they may be as frontlets between your eyes. And ye shall teach them your children, speaking of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. And thou shalt write them upon the door-posts of thine house, and upon thy gates." The parchment is rolled up with the ends of the lines inward, the Hebrew word Shaddai is inscribed on the outside, and the roll is put into a cane or a cylindrical tube of lead, in which a hole is cut, that the word Shaddai may appear. This tube is fastened to the door-post by a nail at each end. The fixing of it is preceded by the repetition of the following benediction: "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe! who hast sanctified us with thy precepts, and commanded us to fix the Mezuzza." The most minute injunctions are given by the Rabbies as to the skins from which the parchments are to be made, the ink to be used, and the form observed in writing, the mode in which the parchment is to be inserted in the case, and the houses and rooms to the doors of which Mezuzzoth are to be affixed. It is believed that Mezuzzoth ought to be fixed on all the doors of dwelling-houses, whether parlours, bed-rooms, kitchens, or cellars, on the doors of barns, or store-houses, and on the gates of cities and towns. The Mezuzza is generally placed on the right hand of the entrance, and those who are deemed the most devout Israelites often touch and kiss it as they pass. The synagogue being a house of prayer, and not of residence, requires no Mezuzza.

MEZZACHULIANS, a Mohammedan sect who are represented as having believed that those who have any knowledge of God's glory and essence in this world, may be saved, and are to be reckoned among the faithful.

MIAS, temples for the worship of the CAMTS (which see) in Japan. They are usually built upon eminences, in retired spots, surrounded by groves, and approached by a grand avenue, having a gate of stone or wood, and bearing a tablet of a foot and a-half square, which announces in gilded letters the name of the Camî, to whom the temple is consecrated. So imposing an entrance might lead to the expectation of the inner temple being a correspondingly splendid structure, but within, we are told, "there is usually found only a wretched little building of wood, half hid among trees and shrubbery, about eighteen feet in length, breadth, and height, all its dimensions being equal, and with only a single grated window, through which the interior may be seen empty, or containing merely a mirror of polished metal, set in a frame of braided straw, or hung about with fringes of white paper. Just within the entrance of the enclosure stands a basin of water, by washing in which the worshippers may purify themselves. Beside the temple is a great chest for the reception of alms, partly by which, and partly by an allowance from the Dairi, the guardians of the temples are supported, while at the gate hangs a gong, on which the visitant announces his arrival. Most of these temples have also an antechamber, in which sit those who have the charge, clothed in rich garments. There are commonly also in the enclosure a number of little chapels, or miniature temples, portable so as to be carried in religious processions. All of these temples are built after one model, the famous one of Isje, near the centre of the island of Nipon, and which within the enclosure is equally humble with all the rest."

MICAH'S IMAGES. See TERAPHIM.

MICHAEL, one of the chief angels mentioned both in the Old and New Testaments. The Jewish Rabbies taught that he presided over the rest of the angelic host, and in proof of it they quoted Dan. x. 13, where he is termed "one of the chief princes." They represented him as the leader of that class of angels which is stationed on the right hand of the heavenly throne, and they ascribe to him in their writings many wonderful actions. The Mohammedans regard Michael as the patron of the Jews, who fights against God's enemies.

MICHAEL (ST.) FESTIVAL OF. See GABRIEL (ST.) and MICHAEL (ST.) FESTIVAL OF.

MICHAPOUS, a name given by some tribes of the North American Indians to the Supreme Being. They had some conception of a Deluge, and believed that Michapous created heaven, and afterwards all the animals, whom he placed upon a bridge laid over the waters. Foreseeing that his creatures could not live long upon the bridge, and that his work would be imperfect, he applied to Michinsi, the god of waters, and wished to borrow from him a portion of land on which his creatures might settle. The water-god denied his request, whereupon he sent the beaver, the otter, and the musk-rat to search for earth at the bottom of the sea; but he was only able to obtain, by means of the musk-rat, a few particles of sand, with which he constructed first a high mountain, and then the whole terrestrial globe. A spirit of discord arose among the animals, and Michapous in anger destroyed them, forming men out of the corrupted carcasses of the animals. One of the human beings having separated from the rest, discovered a hut in which he found Michapous, who gave him a wife, and pointed out the duties of both. Hunting and fishing were to be the employments of men; the kitchen and the cares of the household were allotted to the woman. He gave mankind power over the animals, and warned them that they must die, but that after death they would pass into a state of happiness. The men lived happy and contented for some centuries, but the men having greatly multiplied, it was necessary to seek for a new hunting country. Discord and jealousy broke out at length among the huntsmen, and hence the origin of war. In this myth the Diluvian predominates over the Cosmogonic element.

MICHE, the name of a priest of the god Prono of the ancient Slavonians.

MICHINISI, the god of the waters among some tribes of the North American Indians.

MICROCHEMI, the Proficients, one of the three ranks or degrees of the monks of the Greek church. See CALOYERS.

MICTLANTEUCTLI, the ruler of the infernal regions, in the mythology of the ancient Mexicans, who with his wife Mictlanhuatl were objects of great veneration.

MIDGARD, the mid-sphere or habitable globe of the ancient Scandinavian cosmogony. "According to Eddaic lore," says Mr. Gross, "it is necessary in order to form a correct idea of the typography of Midgard, to conceive the earth to be as round as a ring, or as a disk in the midst of the ocean, encircled by Jörmungand, the great Midgard-serpent, holding its tail in its mouth, the outer shores of the ocean forming the mountainous regions of Jötunheim—giant-home, assigned in fee-simple to the perverse Ymir race by the generous sons of Bór. In the centre of this terrestrial ring or disk, these indefatigable divinities erected a citadel from the eyebrows of Ymir, against the inroads of their belligerent frontier neighbours; and this is Midgard, the work of gods and the home of man. It is, therefore, the duty of the latter to defend and cherish it against all the boreal powers of evil,—the storms and hail, the ice and snow, as well as the gigantic mountains, which raise their threatening peaks in stern defiance above the clouds: in short, to keep watch and ward over it despite of every adverse physical influence. These latter are giants of the lofty alpine species, and hence we arrive at the origin of the elves, and the alp, or nightmare. In the German, the phrase Alpen-Druck still commemorates the myth of the elves of darkness. The clouds which float in the circumambient air above Midgard, are, as has been stated, the spongy productions of Ymir's brain flung into space. They loom up from the borderland of Ymir's race, and are variable and deceitful, like the source from which they are derived. Their dark hue and tempestuous character are emblematical of the gloomy thoughts and violent passions of Ymir. They borrow their brilliant tints from the luminaries of heaven, but their beauty is delusive; and there is continual strife between them and these bodies,—the resplendent and benign emanations of empyrean Muspellheim."

MIGONITIS, a surname of Aphrodité, from a place called Migonium, where she had a temple, and was worshipped.

MILK. In the early Christian church it was customary to give to the newly baptized a small portion of milk along with honey, as indicative that they were new-born babes in Christ. Jerome informs us that in some of the Western churches the mixture was made up of milk and wine. The use of milk on such occasions had reference to the saying of Paul, "I have fed you with milk, and not with strong meat," or to that of Peter, "As new-born babes desire the sincere milk of the word that ye may grow thereby." Clemens Alexandrinus takes notice of this custom, saying, "As soon as we are born we are nourished with milk, which is the nutriment of the Lord. And when we are born again, we are honoured with the hope of rest, by the promise of Jerusalem which is above, where it is said to rain milk and honey. For by these material things we are assured of that sacred food." We learn further from the third council of Carthage, that the milk and honey administered to the newly baptized had a peculiar consecration distinct from that of the eucharist.

MILLENARIANS, or CHILIASTS, those who hold that Christ, at his second coming, will reign with his glorified saints in visible majesty, yet without carnal accompaniments, over a renewed earth for a thousand years. It is held on all hands to be a doctrine of Sacred Scripture, that a time will come in the history of this world, when, for a thousand years, righteousness, truth and peace will prevail upon the earth. It is also held on all hands that there will be a second personal coming of the Lord Jesus Christ from heaven to earth. Both these doctrines are believed on the testimony of Scripture by all orthodox Christians. But the important point on which a great diversity of opinion has existed in the Christian church in all ages, respects the place which these two events are destined to occupy in the order of time. Some maintain that the second coming of Christ will precede the millennium, and these are called Pre-millennialists; while others, who are called Post-millennialists, allege that the second coming of Christ, and the resurrection of the saints, will not take place until the expiry of the thousand years which compose the millennium. Such is the precise state of the question as between the two great parties into which the Christian church is divided. No separate sect or denomination exists of Millenarians, as the Pre-millennialists are loosely termed, but individuals, and even considerable numbers of Christians, are found in connection with all denominations who hold and openly avow Pre-millennial sentiments.

The following six points are brought forward by the Rev. J. Cox in his 'Pre-millennial Manual,' as embodying the opinions of most of those who hold pre-millennial views: "1. That the present dispensation will never universally triumph in the conversion of men: its basis being sovereign election, and its object 'to gather out a people for God's name.' That like all other dispensations, it will end in apostasy and judgment. 2. That the people of Israel will be brought back to Canaan, inherit the land according to God's covenant with Abraham, and become a truly holy and highly honoured people. 3. That a resurrection of the saints will take place one thousand years before that of the rest of the dead. 4. That the nations which survive the fiery judgments that will precede and accompany the establishment of God's kingdom, will be converted by an abundant effusion of the Holy Spirit, and that then the earth shall be filled with the knowledge and glory of the Lord. 5. That the creation which is made subject to vanity, and which now groaneth and travaileth in pain, shall at the advent of the second Adam be brought into the glorious liberty of the children of God, and thus become happy, fruitful, and blessed. 6. That the Lord Jesus will come personally before the establishment of his kingdom, and in order to establish it; and that the overthrow of his enemies, the full restoration of the Jews, the conversion of the nations, and the jubilee of creation, will not take place before his personal appearing."

The Millenarians or Chiliasm allege that their distinctive doctrines run "like a golden thread from Genesis to Revelation," and have had believers in all ages of the Christian church. They maintain in particular, that for the first two centuries and a half, pre-millennialism was the universal doctrine of the church. Neander, on the other hand, denies that it can be proved with any certainty that Chiliasm had ever formed a part of the general creed of the church, but he endeavours to account for the existence of pre-millennial views, by asserting that "the crass images under which the earthly Jewish mind had depicted to itself the blessings of the millennial reign, had in part passed over to the Christians." Yet from whatever quarter the Millenarian opinions may have come, whether, as the early fathers alleged, they had been handed down by tradition from the Apostles, or as Neander imagines, they were the remnants of a carnal Judaism which had found its way into the Christian church, one thing at all events is clear, that, down to the end of the third or the beginning of the fourth century, the belief in millenarian views was universal and undisputed. Papias, Irenæus, Justin Martyr, a whole succession of fathers, indeed, onward to Lactantius, speak the same language as to their belief in the personal reign of Christ during, not after, the millennium. It has been attempted, by some writers, to throw discredit upon these opinions, by classing them among the heretical notions of Cerinthus; but the mere fact that they were held by a heretic, is more than counterbalanced by the far more undoubted fact that they were held by a large portion of the most orthodox fathers of these early times, even those of them who were most bitterly opposed to Cerinthus. One circumstance, however, which tended to destroy the reputation of millenarianism, was the extravagant representation of it which was given by the Montanists, and the violent opposition which was accordingly raised against this as well as the other doctrines of that grossly sensualistic school. The Gnostics generally had no more violent opponents than the Millenarians, who signalized themselves by their earnest contentings for the faith once delivered to the saints.

Now, however, a formidable opponent of the views of the Chiliasm arose in the fanciful Origen, whose allegorizing interpretation of Scripture was completely opposed to that literal system of interpretation on which their peculiar opinions mainly depended. From this time the credit of millenarianism gradually declined, and, with the exception of a general statement which occurs in the canons of the Council of Nice, A. D. 325, we hear little more of the doctrine until the lapse of centuries brought it again into discussion. Throughout the dark ages, when popery ruled with despotic sway over the minds and consciences of men, Chiliasm was utterly disowned, and it is a remarkable fact, that popery has not only omitted this doctrine from her creed, but testified against it as a heresy. During the first century after the Reformation, it rose again into notice, and was held by several men remarkable alike for their learning and their piety. One of its most violent opponents at this period was Socinus, who attacked it in a letter "against the Chiliasm." In the seventeenth century it was held by many eminent Nonconformist divines, and a large number of those who sat in the Westminster Assembly, including several Episcopalians, Presbyterians, and Independents, while Richard Baxter candidly acknowledges, "Though I have not skill enough in the exposition of hard prophecies to make a particular determination about the thousand years' reign of Christ upon the earth before the final judgment; yet I may say, that I cannot confute what such learned men as Mr. Mede, Dr. Twisse, and others after the old fathers have asserted." No doubt, the Pre-millenarian doctrine sunk in public estimation from the imprudent and fanatical conduct of the Fifth-Monarchy men, who had adopted it as an article of their creed. But far from being limited to men of extravagant and enthusiastic minds, it was held also by some of the most sober-thoughted men of the age.

The eighteenth century, and the early part of the nineteenth, were characterized by the prevalence of a remarkable decay of vital religion, not in one country only, but throughout all Christendom; and Chiliasm was almost entirely forgotten. For thirty years past, however, the interest which, at various periods in the history of the church, had been wont to be felt in the subject, has, to a great extent, revived, and works both for and against Pre-millennialism have issued in rapid succession from the press. The most able production in opposition to the Pre-millennial theory has been that of Dr. David Brown on 'Christ's Second Coming.' This treatise is characterized by remarkable acuteness and exegetical power; but, among others, the Rev. Walter Wood of Elie published a reply at great length, entitled 'the Last Things.' The points of difference between the Pre-millennialists and this recognized champion of Post-millennialism are thus stated by Dr. Bonar of Kelso, with his wonted clearness and precision:—

"1. We differ as to the position of the advent. He places it after the millennium; we before it. This is the great diverging point. It is the root of almost all our differences. We both believe in a millennium and an advent; but we arrange them reversely. It seems plain to us that the Lord Jesus is to come in person to introduce the millennium; and that just as there can be no kingdom without a king—no marriage-festival without the presence of the bridegroom, so there can be no millennium without Him who is its 'all in all.' We find the prophets and apostles frequently predicting both the advent and the kingdom; and they uniformly place the advent first, as that without which the latter could not be.

"2. We differ as to the nature of the millennium. Mr. Brown thinks that it will only be a sort of improvement upon the present state of things. There 'will be far less mixture than now,' he affirms; but that is all the length he goes. Satan, he thinks, is not bound, but merely the 'tables are turned' upon him. The good and bad fishes are still mingled together. The tares grow still plentifully, though not quite so plentifully as before; and the enemy is still as unrestrained and as busy in sowing them. The parable of the sower is still as lamentably true. There are still the foolish virgins, no less than the wise. The church is still 'miserable' without Christ. There is no change upon the earth. Creation still groans; the curse still blights the soil; and the animals are still ferocious and destructive.

"Here we differ from Mr. Brown. I think that Scripture warrants us in believing that the millennial state, though not absolutely perfect, will be one of unspeakably greater and larger blessedness, holiness, and glory, than he conceives. Any remnant of sin or death will only be as the spots upon the face of the sun; utterly hidden in the excellent splendour.

"3. We differ as to the binding of Satan. Mr. Brown maintains that Satan is not to be bound or restrained at all. Nothing in the way of positive restraint, or limitation of power, is to be understood as meant by the apostle, in the twentieth of Revelation. This means merely, says Mr. B., that 'he will not be able to form a party in the earth, as heretofore;' and that 'his trade will be at an end.' He also maintains that it is the church that is to bind Satan. Nowhere in Scripture is the church ever said to 'bind Satan,' or to 'take the beast;' yet, without one proof-text, Mr. B. says, 'the church will do both; not only defeating Antichrist, but thereafter, for a thousand years, never permitting the devil to gain an inch of ground to plant his foot on over the whole world.' I do not know how Mr. Brown reconciles this statement with those formerly made, regarding the millennium being merely a state of 'less mixture' than the present, but still occupied with tares as well as wheat. Do the tares not require one inch of ground to grow upon? Mr. B. maintains that there cannot be sin where Satan is not,—that 'sin and he are inseparable;' still he says that there is to be a great deal of sin on the earth, and yet, that 'Satan is not to gain an inch of ground to plant his foot on.' We do not know what Mr. B. makes of the doctrine of man's total depravity; but we most seriously ask him, how he can reconcile it with the above dogma, that sin and Satan are inseparable? Had a Millenarian made such a statement, he would have been condemned as unsound in the faith.

"In opposition to this, I believe that Satan is bound; that just as truly as he now roams the earth, so truly and really shall he then be bound. I believe that very truth which Mr. Brown so strongly denounces,—'the total cessation of Satanic influence during the millennium.' I believe not only that he 'will not be able to form a party,' but that he will not be there even to attempt it. I believe that not only will 'his trade be at an end,' but that he will not be there to make an effort for its revival. Here certainly there is a wide and serious difference between us;—so wide and serious, that Mr. B. declares our doctrine to be 'subversive of the fundamental principles, and opposed to the plainest statements of God's word.' This is certainly strong language to use respecting brethren, merely because they believe that Satanic influences are to cease during the millennium. I shall have occasion to revert to this point again, and therefore shall make no other remark than that I deem it unfair in Mr. Brown to make his readers imagine that it is Pre-millennialists alone who hold this doctrine. Mr. B. knows fully as well as I do, that many Post-millennialists hold the same doctrine, and yet he holds us up to suspicion, as men, who, by maintaining that opinion, are 'making not only a new dispensation, but a new Christianity.' Surely this is hastily as well as unfairly spoken.

"4. We differ as to the first resurrection. Mr. Brown holds it to be entirely figurative. He makes it to signify that 'the cause which was slain has risen to life.' I believe it to be a literal resurrection of the saints at the commencement of the millennium. Mr. Brown dwells at some length on the passage in the 20th of Revelation, and concludes by saying, that 'this is the seat of the doctrine, even by their own admission.' It is by no means so. Millenarians do not admit it to be such, nor do they use it as such. In the first century, indeed, it was so; and in after years their opponents could only get rid of the testimony of this passage by denying the whole Apocalypse. It was held to be the stronghold of the doctrine then, both by friends and enemies; and as Origen had not yet taught the latter the art of spiritualizing, they had no alternative but either to receive the doctrine or reject the Apocalypse. They did the latter.

"5. We differ as to the state of Israel during the millennium. Mr. Brown does not allow that they are to have superior privileges and honours to the rest of the nations. He casts this idea aside as unscriptural and carnal. We hold, on the other hand, that there is a special pre-eminence in reserve for Israel in the latter day; a national, an ecclesiastical, and a temporal pre-eminence;—just such a pre-eminence as their fathers had, though on a much higher scale. Many who are not Pre-millennialists hold with us in this view; but Mr. Brown lays his accusation against us alone. Yet let us hear the censure; for there is no dishonour in it. We are but contending for what we believe to be the very truth of God, in reference to his promises to his still-beloved people. We believe that their chief splendour will be their holiness, no less than Mr. Brown, but why should this be thought inconsistent with the idea of national supremacy, and outward privileges of surpassing dignity and honour? One who has now altered his opinion, thus wrote ten years ago, 'In describing the peculiar or distinctive greatness and felicity of the descendants of Jacob after they have been finally established in their own land, the prophets employ language which cannot be understood otherwise than as indicating a state of things transcendently grand and blessed. There is no certainty or definiteness in language, if these scriptures do not delineate a state of things to be enjoyed upon the visible surface of this earth, much changed and renovated no doubt, by men still dwelling in tabernacles of clay. It shall be a state of things of inexpressible splendour and bliss; for Jerusalem shall be created a rejoicing. There shall be a city whose walls are salvation, and whose gates praise. There a temple shall be reared, to which the glory of Lebanon and the most precious things of the earth shall be again brought; and which, as the place of Jehovah's throne, shall be hallowed by manifestations of the Divine presence, exceedingly more glorious than were seen in that first temple which of old covered the heights of Zion. And as Jerusalem shall thus be called the throne of Jehovah, the glory of all lands, so shall her people stand the first in dignity and office in the kingdom of Christ; they pre-eminently shall be the priests and ministers of the Lord, the seat of spiritual power, and the centre of a blessed light and influence that shall radiate thence to the most distant regions of the earth.' What Mr. Fairbairn held ten years ago we still continue to hold regarding the glory of Israel, and also regarding the physical changes to take place in their land, which he describes at large, wondering how 'the strong and masculine intellect of Calvin should be so misled by the taste for spiritualizing,' as not to see that what the prophets testified to is, a literal city and literal temple, yet to be built in the latter days."

The passages of Scripture on which Millenarians found their opinions are very numerous, but it may be interesting to the reader to peruse a few in connexion with the remarks which are made upon them by Mr. Cox, an intelligent Baptist minister in England, who has published a 'Pre-Millennial Manual.' "The Scripture," he says, "to which we refer is Acts iii. 19—21, 'Repent ye, therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord, and he shall send Jesus Christ, who before was preached unto you, whom the heavens must receive, until the times of the restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began.' Three things are observable in this passage. 1. The names given to that future glorious state of things for which all Christians look; 'times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord,' and 'times of the restitution of all things.' 2. That until then the heavens will receive Christ, but that then God will send him who is now preached. 3. That these glorious times, viewed in connection with the second advent, have been the theme of all the holy prophets since the world began. Yes, from the holy Enoch, whose very words we have recorded in Jude 14, 15, down to Malachi, the last of the prophets, the same strain is heard. There is no cessation of the melody, no jarring notes. They all unite in declaring, 'Behold the Lord cometh'—'with his saints'—'taking vengeance;' yet he comes to renovate—to restore—to reign. His is the right and the might, and his shall be the dominion and the glory. Thus those watchmen on the grand old mountains of ancient times took up the strain one after another, and as the ages rolled on, the desires and expectations of the godly were more and more quickened, until angel voices were heard over Bethlehem proclaiming that the long looked-for ONE was really come. These holy prophets and those who believed their glorious words, found no rest for their hope on the turbid billows of earthly things; and therefore soared away to the distant ages of Messiah's reign, and solaced their souls amidst its coming glories. Their faith was 'the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen.' Peter and all his fellow apostles deeply sympathized with them; ever rejoicing in hope of the coming deliverer, who should glorify his church, restore Israel, fill the earth with holiness, renovate creation, and swallow up death in victory. Where do we ever find the apostles foretelling the gradual progress of truth till it should universally prevail? Where do we ever find them speaking of Christ reigning over all nations before he comes in person? But how constantly we find them predicting 'evil times,' even apostasy and judgment, and dwelling with holy ecstasy and strong desire on the return of their Lord, and 'their gathering together unto him' in resurrection life. How singular their silence, and how strange their testimony, if the post-millennial view is the scriptural one.

"To a few passages from the prophets and apostles we ask attention; they have often been cited, and their importance demands that they be prayerfully considered.

"The prophet Daniel testifies that he 'saw in vision one like the Son of man come in the clouds of heaven,' (vii. 13), at the time of the destruction of the fourth beast, or the Roman power. Nothing intervenes between that dreadful tyranny, and the peaceful universal kingdom, except the Lord's coming and terrible acts of judgment. According to Daniel's prophecies, both here and in the parallel vision of the great image, there can be no millennium between the time of Nebuchadnezzar and the glorious coming of the Son of Man. HE COMES, HE JUDGES, HE REIGNS!

"That this coming 'in the clouds of heaven,' before the universal kingdom is a personal coming, is evident from our Lord's own words in his last pro-phcey (Matt. xxiv. 30; his testimony before the Jewish high priest (Matt. xxvi. 64); the declaration of the angels just after the resurrection of Christ (Acts i. 9—11); and the prophecy of John (Rev. i. 7, 'Behold he cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see him.')

"This one passage in Daniel, compared with the four texts above referred to, is sufficient, we think, to prove that the personal advent of Christ will be before the millennium. Oh, that Christians would ponder God's simple testimony, and compare one portion of scripture with another, in order to see whether these things are so!

"Next study the parable of 'the tares and wheat' (Matt. xiii. 24—30), and the Saviour's explanation of it (37—43), and ask how all this agrees with the idea of a millennium during the gospel dispensation. Observe, the whole period between the Saviour's ministry on earth and his advent in glory, is included in this parable, but not a word is said about any millennium, or the general prevalence of holiness, till after the separation of the tares from the wheat; on the contrary, an evil state of things is spoken of as existing during the whole of the gospel dispensation, or to 'the end of the age.'

"Rev. xi. 15—19, describes the coming of 'the kingdom of God and his Christ.' We are there plainly told, that at the time when this universal kingdom will be established, the dead will be raised, the righteous of all ages rewarded, and the destroyers of the earth destroyed. All allow that these three events are frequently connected with the second coming of the Saviour; the two first always; and this passage connects all with the beginning of the universal kingdom,—thus proving that the advent is before the reign.

"In 2 Thess. ii. 8, the apostle teaches that there will be 'a falling away' before the coming of Christ; that this apostasy, whatever and whenever it is, will continue until His coming, and that its leader, 'the man of sin,' will be destroyed by his bright appearance. He also connects this apostasy with evil principles working in his own time. If, then, error and sin, beginning in the apostle's days, work through the whole dispensation, grow worse towards its end, and are crushed only by the personal presence of Christ, there can be no millennium of truth and righteousness before the advent of the Son of God.

"Turn to the prophecies of Christ, in Matt. xxiv. and Luke xxi. We have in these chapters an outline of the principal events which are to happen, until the Lord comes in the clouds of heaven. But among all the things spoken of as sure to occur before the Saviour's advent, there is no mention of a millennium. Instead of this, it is foretold, that wars, error, wickedness, and sorrow, will abound until the Lord's return.

"Zech. xiv. has been justly considered as the most literal of the unfulfilled prophecies of scripture.

That it has never yet been fulfilled in the past history of the Jews (and to the Jews it refers throughout), must be evident to every one. It is, we think, utterly impossible to interpret it as applicable to the church now; nothing remains (if we allow it has a meaning at all) but to apply it to Israel's future history. If this is done, the fact of a pre-millennial advent is established beyond all dispute. The chapter contains few symbols or figures, but relates in plain words the things yet to be done at Jerusalem and in the land of Judah. It exhibits the troubles of restored Israel just before their conversion (1, 2); foretells the coming; describes the judgments and prodigies that shall accompany it (3—8); says, that all his saints shall come with him, that his feet shall stand on the Mount of Olives (4, 5); and that subsequent to this coming 'the Lord shall be king over all the earth; in that day there shall be one Lord and his name one' (9). Why, if this last quoted verse be literal, should all the rest be allegorical? There is no reason, but that a human system requires it.

"This striking chapter then describes the physical changes which will take place in the land (8—10); declares that men shall dwell in it, and that Jerusalem shall be safely inhabited (11); see also Isaiah xxxiii. 20—24. Then the utter and terrible destruction of Jerusalem's enemies is minutely detailed (12, 13), and Judah's victories and riches described. After this, Jerusalem is spoken of as the throne of the Lord, to which all nations are to be gathered (16—Jer. iii. 17); and it is declared that those who will not come up (we suppose by their representatives—Isa. xiv. 32), 'to worship the King the Lord of hosts,' shall be afflicted by divine judgments. The chapter concludes with a minute description of the holiness of Jerusalem, and of all persons and things connected with it.

"Surely in the literal fulfilment of Zech. ix. 9, when Israel's king came 'meek and lowly, riding on an ass,' we have a pledge that this chapter which relates to his glory will be as literally fulfilled.

"Isa. lxvi. is a similar prophecy to Zech. xiv.: containing a chronological history of Israel in the latter days. First, a proud people who have gone back to their own land in unbelief, and who repeat the deeds of their fathers, are described, rebuked, and judged (1—6). Then comes deliverance and blessedness—a nation is born in a day; whom the Lord comforts with abundant promises, and calls upon others to rejoice with them. Israel then becomes a fountain of blessing to the world (8—14). But before this scene of glory and joy, there must be one of terror and destruction. 'Behold the Lord will come with fire and with his chariots like a whirlwind, to render his anger with fury, and his rebuke with flames of fire: for by fire and by his sword will the Lord plead with all flesh, and the slain of the Lord shall be many' (15, 26). After this comes as in Zech. xiv., the exaltation of Jerusalem, and the gathering of all nations there to worship (19—23).

"We entreat the reader to pause a moment over the solemn words just quoted, with reference to that whirlwind of wrath, and to compare them with two passages from the prophecies of Jeremiah. The 25th chapter of that prophet is one of the most awful portions of God's word: much of it, we think, is yet to be fulfilled. (See 15—33.) 'Alas! who shall live when God doeth this?' Here we have the figures of the vintage, the sword, and the whirlwind. 'Thus saith the Lord of hosts, Behold evil shall go forth from nation to nation, and a great whirlwind shall be raised up from the coasts of the earth. And the slain of the Lord shall be at that day from one end of the earth even to the other end of the earth.' To the same judgment the prophet refers—xxx. 23, 24. 'Behold the whirlwind of the Lord goeth forth with fury, a continuing whirlwind, it shall fall with pain upon the head of the wicked. The fierce anger of the Lord shall not return until he have done it, and until he have performed the intents of his heart; in the latter days ye shall consider it.' Now mark the next words. 'At the same time, saith the Lord, will I be the God of all the families of Israel, and they shall be my people.' This is the time of trouble spoken of by Daniel, when his people are delivered, when Michael stands up, when the dead are raised, and the servants of God rewarded. (Dan. xii. 1—3.) The same time of trouble as is described in most terrible terms in Isa. xxiv., at the close of which chapter of woes it is said, 'The moon shall be confounded and the sun ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously.' (v. 23).

"Thus all these prophets agree in binding together terrible judgments on the nations—Israel's last trouble and final deliverance—Messiah's advent—the resurrection of the saints—a glorious reign, and a renovated world."

Before quitting the subject we may avail ourselves of Mr. Cox's Manual to show the extent to which Pre-millennial views are held among the principal denominations of Christians in Great Britain: "The Episcopal Church stands first. Some of her bishops in years past, among whom may be mentioned Bishops Newton, Horsley, and Hurd, with many of her most eminent and useful clergy of the last and the present generation, have been zealous and successful advocates of pre-millennialism. Hundreds of her ministers now preach it, and tens of thousands of her members rejoice in it; and we think that holding this truth has been in some measure the reason for the growth of spirituality in the Church of England, and, under God, a cause of her success. Them that honour God by upholding a contemned truth, he will honour. While differing from that Church in some important points, we can but greatly rejoice to see her ministers thus uplift God's truth, and to see so many souls new born and nourished by their instrumentality.

"Among the Presbyterians this doctrine has not spread to the same extent. By the Westminster formularies and creeds, belief in post-millennialism is not required; some expressions seem rather opposed to the present popular view. In the national Church of Scotland there are some advocates of this doctrine; prominent among them is Dr. Cumming, by whose writings this truth has been made extensively known. In the Free Church, and especially north of the Tweed, there are several eloquent tongues and ready pens, constantly heralding the coming one, and ever ready to defend this truth against all opposers.

"One great man connected with this body, 'who being dead yet speaketh,' should here be mentioned. Dr. Chalmers in his earlier works contended for the renovation of creation at the Lord's coming. (See Works, vol. vii., 280.) And his posthumous writings clearly prove, that latterly he held the pre-millennial view. Just take a specimen or two: 'It is quite obvious of this prophecy (Isaiah lii. 8—10), that it expands beyond the dimensions of its typical event, and that it relates not to a past, but to a future and final deliverance of the Jews. . . . Their seeing eye to eye, makes for the personal reign of him whose feet shall stand on the Mount of Olives.'

"In this prophecy (Isa. xxiv. 13—26) is fore-shown a visitation upon the earth—still future—which is to emerge into the millennium. How emphatically are we told in this place, 'When the Lord shall reign in Jerusalem and before his ancients gloriously.'

"The Wesleyans are, as a body, decidedly against this doctrine, and seldom do we find an advocate of it, or even a believer in it among them. Yet some of their chief founders were decidedly pre-millennialists. John Wesley inclined to some of our views. His brother Charles was full and running over with the subject. His hymns, poems, and paraphrases set forth all the pre-millennial points strongly and clearly. Fletcher of Madely, the great polemic of the Wesleyans, has written as fully and clearly upon the subject in prose, as his friend Charles Wesley did in poetry. He is accounted a standard in doctrine, but repudiated as an interpreter of prophecy. To some persons this appears like calling bitter, sweet; and sweet, bitter. We do not much wonder at the dislike of Wesleyans to pre-millennial truth; as the latter views, when honestly carried out, are assuredly, to a great extent, incompatible with Arminianism.

"'In truth,' says one, 'Chiliasm has always showed the strongest affinity for Calvinism, and antagonism to the opposite.' One great point of the pre-millennial view, as already stated, is, that during the present dispensation God is working out his great purpose of electing love in gathering out a people for his name (Acts xv.); and that consequently universality cannot be one of its characteristics. These facts, which are ignored, if not denied by the modern popular view, and very much left out of the teaching of many, are written as with a sun-beam in vast numbers of passages in the New Testament. Wesley and Fletcher did not see the connection between pre-millennialism and Calvinism; their descendants perhaps do.

"The Congregationalists have had their Goodwins, Caryls, Husseys, Thorps, and many others in past days, but at present there are very few among them who are in sympathy with these great and good men. By their periodicals the doctrine of the Lord's coming to reign is constantly opposed; and one, the 'Evangelical Magazine,' has for some time past been employed in endeavouring to write it down; but doubtless this effort, like those of Dr. Brown and others, will only help to call attention to the despised truth, and result in its being more extensively spread abroad.

"Among the Baptists, there are a few more who hold and promulgate pre-millennialism. In past ages the doctrine of the personal reign was rather generally maintained in this body. It may be found in the writings of Benjamin Keach, Dr. Gill, B. Francies, and many others. Several of them held that there would be first what they called 'the spiritual reign of Christ;' which would be followed by an apostacy, the personal advent of the Saviour, and the reign of all his risen saints with him on earth for 1,000 years. These millenarians differed from those who are now called by this name in three respects. They separated the spiritual and personal reign of Christ—limited the latter to the risen saints—and taught that many ages would certainly pass away before the coming of the Lord and the resurrection of the saints. The best statement and defence of this view is found in Dr. Gill's Body of Divinity; also in Toplady's works. Very few persons hold it now.

"The following extract from Bunyan proves that he had, at least, leanings toward some of our views. 'None ever saw this world as it was in its first creation, but only Adam and Eve; neither shall any ever see it until the manifestation of the Son of God, that is, until the redemption or resurrection of the saints. But then it shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God.'

"The name of another celebrated man among the Baptists may here be mentioned. Mr. Thorp, of Bristol, thus writes in the preface to his work on 'The Destinies of the British Empire.' 'The sentiments stated in these lectures, concerning the prophecies in general, the present state of the empire, and the gloomy aspect of things at this crisis, were entertained by the late illustrious Robert Hall. They formed part of the subject of the last evening's conversation which the author enjoyed with that extraordinary man only a few days before his decease, and upon each point the most perfect unanimity of opinion prevailed.'

"Milton, it is said, was a Baptist in principle, and held views similar to those of Bunyan, as may be seen in Paradise Lost. In his prose works we have the following sublime invocation: 'Come forth out of thy royal chambers, O Prince of all the kings of the earth. Put on the visible robes of thy Imperial Majesty! Take up that unlimited sceptre which thy Almighty Father hath bequeathed thee. For now the voice of thy bride calls thee, and all the creatures sigh to be renewed.' Milton believed that the millennium was past, but he waited for the speedy advent of the Redeemer, when he should appear to judge mankind and renovate the earth.

"Among the most earnest advocates of this doctrine, those Christians called by others 'the Plymouth Brethren,' may be mentioned. They very generally receive the doctrine of the advent and reign of Christ. Some of their tracts and works on this subject are simple and scriptural; with others, statements and expositions of a very doubtful character are mixed up. But while we do not agree with these Christians on several points, we would bear cheerful testimony to their zeal in this subject, and own to having received much instruction and consolation from some of their earlier works."

Great activity has been manifested of late years by the Pre-millennialists in propagating their views both in England and Scotland. The Bloomsbury Lectures by ministers of the Church of England, the writings of Mr. Brooks of Clarebro', Retford, and the Journal of Prophecy, so ably edited by Dr. Horatius Bonar, have done much to recommend the subject to the special attention of the Christian community, and have gained numerous converts to the doctrines of Pre-millennialism.

MINARETS, the towers on the Mohammedan mosques. There are usually six of these towers about every mosque, each having three little open galleries situated one above another. These towers, as well as the mosques themselves, are covered with lead, and adorned with gildings and other ornaments. From the minarets the faithful are summoned to prayer by the MUEZZIN (which see).

MINCHA (Heb. an oblation), usually rendered in the Old Testament, "meat-offering," although it consisted of flour, cakes, wafers, &c.; a more correct translation would be "meal-offering," or "wheat offering." The mincha, when given by one man to another, denotes some peculiar dignity in the receiver: of which such a gift is the acknowledgment, and the token even of submission, if not subjection, on the part of the giver. But when a mincha is presented by man to God, it usually, though not invariably, signifies a "bloodless oblation," in contradistinction from the zeba or "bloody sacrifice," though the mincha was for the most part joined with the zeba in the sacred oblations.

MINERVA, the goddess of wisdom among the ancient Romans, who accounted her one of their chief divinities. She was regarded as identical with the Greek goddess ATHENA (which see). The Romans worshipped her as presiding over the arts and sciences, and hence she was invoked by all who wished to distinguish themselves in any department of human knowledge, or in any of the arts in which men were wont to employ themselves. This goddess was also the protector of men when engaged in war, and hence the trophies of victory were often dedicated to her, while she herself is frequently represented as wearing a helmet and a coat of mail, and before her she carried a shield. A temple to Minerva stood on the Capitoline, and another on the Aventine hill, while her image was preserved in the innermost part of the temple of Vesta, being looked upon as the safeguard of the Roman state.

MINERVALIA. See QUINQUATRES.

MINGRELIAN MONKS. See BERES.

MINIAN (Heb. number), a word often applied to a Jewish youth who is thirteen years and a day old, at which age he is looked upon as a man, and is under an obligation to observe all the commandments of the law. As he is then considered to be of age, he can make contracts and transact any affairs without being responsible to guardians, and may act both in spiritual and temporal matters, according to his own inclination. Jewish females are reputed women at the age of twelve and a-half years.

MINIMS, a religious order in the Church of Rome, founded in the fifteenth century by St. Francis de Paula of Calabria. See FRANCIS (ST.) DE PAULA.

MINISTERS. See CLERGY.

MINISTRA, a name which is applied to the office of deaconess in the Christian Church by Pliny, in his celebrated Epistle.

MINORESS, a nun under the rule of St. Clair.

MINORITES. See CORDELIERS.

MINORS (FRIARS). See FRANCISCANS.

MINOS, one of the judges of souls in Hades, son of Zeus and Europa, and said to have been, before his death, king of Crete, where he instituted a system of wise and equitable laws.

MINSTER, an old Saxon word which anciently signified the church of a monastery or convent.

MIRA BAI, a Hindu sect, or rather a subdivision of the *Vallabha*charis, originated by Mírá Bai, who flourished in the reign of Akbar, and was celebrated as the authoress of sacred poems addressed to Vishnu. She was the daughter of a petty Rajah, the sovereign of a place called Mertá. She adopted the worship of Ranachhor, a form of the youthful Krishna. On one occasion she visited the temple of her tutelary deity, when on the completion of her adorations the image opened, and Mírá leaping into the fissure, it closed, and she finally disappeared. In memory of this miracle, it is said that the image of Mírá Bai is worshipped at Udayapur, in conjunction with that of Ranachhor.

MIRAMIONES. See GENEVIEVE (ST.) NUNS OF.

MISERERE (Lat. have mercy), the beginning of the fifty-first or penitential psalm.

MISERERES, stalls frequently seen in cathedrals or collegiate churches, the seat turning up on a hinge, so as to form two seats of different heights.

MISHNA, the second law of the Jews, a collection of all the oral or traditional commandments. This work, which is arranged in the form of six treatises, was completed about A. D. 190, by Rabbi Judah, the holy, though the first idea of such an undertaking is thought by many to have originated with Rabbi AKIBA (which see). The Mishna is believed to contain what the Jews called the oral law, that is, all the precepts which, according to the legends of the Rabbins, Moses received from the Lord during the forty days he remained on the mount, which were transmitted by Moses to Joshua, and thus handed down from generation to generation. The later Rabbins have made various commentaries upon, and additions to, the Mishna. The whole collection of these commentaries is named GEMARA (which see), and along with the Mishna, its text-book, it forms the TALMUDS (which see). The Mishna has been held in great veneration by the Jews ever since its completion, and is regarded of equal authority with the written word.

MISSA, a name anciently given to the service of public worship in the Christian Church. It was divided into two parts, the missa catechumenorum, or first part of the religious service, designed especially for catechumens; and the missa fidelium, the after service, which was particularly intended for the faithful or believers, neither catechumens nor any other persons being permitted to be present, not even as spectators. On occasions when the elements of the Lord's Supper were received some days after they had been consecrated, the service was called missa præsantificatorium. Cardinal Bona in his writings speaks of a missa sicca, or dry mass, that is, without the grace and moisture of the consecrated eucharist, and which he says, profits the faithful nothing. Durantus, in his book De Ritibus, mentions a missa nautica, or seamen's mass, because it was wont to be celebrated at sea, and upon the rivers, where, on account of the motion and agitation of the waves, the sacrifice could hardly be offered without danger of effusion. In the Romish church there is a missa privata or solitaria, where the priest receives the sacramental elements alone, without any other communicants, and sometimes says the office alone without any assistants. Such are those private and solitary masses in Roman Catholic churches, which are said at their private altars in the corners of their churches, without the presence of any but the priest alone; and such are all those public masses where none but the priest receives the elements, though there be many spectators of the service. The Lord's Supper being in its very nature a service of communion, instances of its observance by solitary individuals were unknown in the primitive Christian Church.

MISSAL, the Romish mass-book, containing the masses which are appointed to be said on particular days. It is derived from the word MISSA (which see), used in ancient times to denote all the parts of Divine service. The Missal, which was formed in the eleventh or twelfth century, consisted of a collection for the convenience of the priest, of the several liturgical books formerly in use in the religious services; and in its collected form it was called the Complete or Plenary Missal or Book of Missæ. In 1570, Pius V. issued an edict commanding that the Missal, which he had caused to be revised, should be used throughout the whole Catholic Church; and with the exception of a few verbal alterations introduced by Clement VIII. and Urban VIII., and the addition of some new masses, the edition of Pius V. continues in use down to the present day.

MITIRA, the principal fire-goddess among the ancient Persians. In Assyria she was worshipped under the appellation of Mytitta, and in Arabia under that of Alitta. She was believed to be the mother of the world, and of all its generative productions. The name Mithra is supposed to be derived from the Persian word Mihir or Mihir, love, and the goddess who bears the name is justly regarded as the Persian Venus. She is viewed as the spouse of Mithras, the Persians having been accustomed to regard their Supreme Deity, whom they term Zerwane Akerene, as resolved into two sexes, represented by Mithras and Mithra, male and female fires. Mithra then is the mundane body, enclosing in her womb the fires of creation, infused into it by the primordial source of light, through the medium of Ormuzd, the creator of the world.

MITHRAS, the sun god among the ancient Persians, the first, the highest, and the purest emanation from the Supreme Being, or Zerwane Akerene. Under the name of Perses, Mithras received the homage due to a divinity of light and fire, in Ethiopia, Egypt, and Greece. His worship was introduced at Rome about the time of the Roman emperors, and spread rapidly throughout the whole empire. In Persia the god of light was adored in the worship and under the name of Mithras, the personified symbol of fire, as the masculine element of creation: "In his solar attribute," says Mr. Gross, "Mithras, considered in regard to day and night, is represented as dwelling both in the spheres of light and in the regions of darkness. As mediator between god and man, he is the suffering yet triumphant saviour. He is emphatically called the highest god: a title which is strictly appropriate only when he is compared with other emanations of the Supreme Being; for he is the prototokos—the first-born of the gods. This circumstance, as also the fact that he is demiurgus, in as far as he supplies more immediately the means and pre-eminently directs the ends of creation: thus acting as medical factor, or nexus, between the Eternal and Ormuzd, justly elevate him to the rank of the highest mundane divinity. Hence he is expressly called the organ or cosmic agent through whom all the elements and laws of the universe are controlled agreeably to the divine will. With the increasing civilization of mankind, and the consequent improvement of their religious ideas, the Mithras-creed was very widely disseminated. The Ethiopians revered the Persian fire-god as their oldest lawgiver and the founder of their religion. It was the popular belief of the people of the Nile that in Egypt—the land of monumental fame, where Mithras and Memnon reciprocated dominion or reigned in juxtaposition, the former built On or Heliopolis—the sun-city, whose first king bore the name of Mitres or Me tres; and that upon the suggestion of a dream he erected obelisks. They were sun-obelisks—solar monuments, or the architectural symbols of the origin and refractive expansion of the solar rays, and of the light which, emanating as the active principle of creation from the throne of God, reveals itself in the production of the universe, as its vast, ramous, obeliskic base."

The Persians celebrated a great festival on the first day succeeding the winter solstice, the object of which was to commemorate the birth of Mithras, or the return of the god of day to the northern hemisphere. In Rome this festival was observed on the 25th of December; a day of universal rejoicing, being celebrated with illuminations and public games. With the progress of the Roman conquests, the Mithriaca were introduced into Germany, where, accordingly, various hieroglyphical remains of this kind of worship have been discovered. According to Photius, the Greeks and Romans offered human sacrifices to Mithras; and Suidas tells us that those who were to be initiated into the mysteries of his worship passed through the fire.

MITHRION, a temple of Mithras, or the sun-god of ancient Persia.

MITRE, an ornament or covering for the head worn by the ancient Jewish high-priest. Josephus describes it as a bonnet without a crown, which covered only about the middle of the head. It was made of linen, and wrapped in folds round the head like a turban. The mitre was peculiar to the high-priest, though the bonnets of the other priests somewhat resembled it in form. The difference between the two was that the BONNET (which see) came lower down upon the forehead than the mitre, which did not cover the forehead at all, and was flatter than the bonnet, but much broader, consisting of more numerous folds, and to some extent resembling a half sphere.

A mitre is also mentioned by various Christian writers of antiquity, as a head-dress worn by bishops or certain abbots, being a sort of turban or cap cleft at the top. Eusebius and Jerome allege that the apostle John wore a mitre, and Epiphanius declares the same concerning James, first bishop of Jerusalem. Bingham, however, is of opinion, that such a head-dress was worn by the apostles, not as Christian bishops, but as Jewish priests of the order of Aaron. A statue of the apostle Peter, which was erected at Rome in the seventh century, is represented as wearing a high, round cap, shaped like a pyramid. The Pope wears four different mitres, which are more or less richly adorned, according to the festivals on which they are worn.

MIZRAIM. See OSIRIS.

MNEME (Gr. memory), one of the MUSES (which see) worshipped anciently in Bœotia.

MNEMONIDES, a name given by Ovid to the Muses, probably as being the daughters of MNE-MOSYNE (which see).

MNEMOSYNE (Gr. memory), a daughter of Uranus, and the mother of the Muses.

MNEVIS, one of the three sacred bulls worshipped by the ancient Egyptians, particularly at Heliopolis. See APIS, BULL-WORSHIP, Calf-WORSHIP.

MOABITES (RELIGION OF THE). This people inhabited the country which was situated on the east side of the Dead Sea, and which was originally occupied by a race of giants called Emim, whom they subdued and expelled. They were descended from Lot, Abraham's nephew, and had in all probability been worshippers of the true God at an early period of their history. It is impossible to say when they first fell into idolatry, but in the time of Moses they were so devoted to the worship of CHEMOSH (which see), their national god, that they are called the sons and daughters of that false god. Another idol of the Moabites referred to in Scripture is Baal-Peor, sometimes called simply Peor, or as the Septuagint writes the name, Phegor. Both Chemosh and Baal-Peor are supposed by Jerome to have been names of one and the same idol. Other writers who consider them as different from each other, look upon them as deities who were wont to be worshipped with obscene rites. Vossius supposes Baal-Peor to be Bacchus, and Bishop Cumberland takes him to be the same with Menes, Mizraim, and Osiris. The Israelites were warned against too close intimacy with the Moabites, but in the face of the Divine prohibition, they devoted themselves to the worship of Baal-Peor, and in consequence the anger of the Lord was kindled against them; and in reference to the Moabites who had seduced the Lord's people into idolatry, the solemn declaration was given forth, that they "shall not enter into the congregation of the Lord; even to the tenth generation shall they not enter into the congregation of the Lord for ever." The temples of the idols of Moab were built on high places, and it has been alleged, but without sufficient foundation, that the Moabites were accustomed to offer human sacrifices.

MOBAH, what may be either done or omitted, according to the law of Mohammed, as being indifferent.

MOBAIEDIANS, a name given to the followers of a famous Mohammedan impostor called Berkai or Mokanna. They made an insurrection in the province of Khorassan against the Caliph Mahadi, who, however, at length defeated them. Their name is derived from an Arabic word signifying white, that being the colour of their dress, to distinguish them from the supporters of the caliph, who were clothed in black garments.

MOBEDS, the officiating priests among the Parsees, or fire-worshippers in India. They read the holy books in the temples, and superintend all the religious ceremonies, but being themselves generally unlearned, they seldom understand the meaning of the books they read, or the prayers they recite, these being written in the Zend or Pehlevi language. The mobeds are distinct from the destûrs, who are the doctors and expounders of the law. There is an inferior order of clergy among the Parsees, called hirbeds, who have the immediate charge of the sacred fire, and sweep and take care of the temple. The priests are a peculiar tribe, their office being hereditary. They have no fixed salary, but are paid for their services. Many of them follow secular employments, and they are under no restriction as to marriage. There is no Parsee mobed-mobedan, or acknowledged high-priest in India.

MODALISTS, a name applied to those who hold that there is a sort of distinction between the Sacred Three in the Trinity, though they will not allow it to amount to personality or subsistence. This system is called an economical or Modal Trinity, and hence the name of Modalists is applied to those who believe in it. See SABELLIANS.

MODERATOR, the minister who presides in any one of the courts of a Presbyterian Church, whether a kirk-session, presbytery, synod, or General Assembly. The moderator has only a casting-vote.

MODESTY. See PUDICITIA.

MOGIASSEMIANS. See KERAMIANS.

MOGON, a Pagan deity mentioned by Camden in his Britannia, as having been anciently worshipped by the Cadeni, who inhabited that part of England now called Northumberland. In the year 1607 two altars were found in that district bearing inscriptions which declared them to have been dedicated to this god.

MOHAMMED, the great prophet of Arabia, who, in the commencement of the seventh century, promulgated Islamism, which has ever since maintained its ground as one of the leading religions of the world. The time when this remarkable man appeared was peculiarly favourable for the accomplishment of his great object, which was to restore the fundamental doctrine of the Divine Unity to its due prominence in the religious belief of mankind. "The Lord God is one God," was the grand all-absorbing truth which he conceived himself commissioned to proclaim. The whole world seemed to him to be mad upon their idols. Not only did Paganism, with its numberless false gods, prevail over a very large portion of the earth, but even Christianity itself, with its professed adherence to the worship of the true God, had become extensively idolatrous both in the Eastern and the Western churches. Saint-worship, martyr-worship, and Mary-worship had overspread Christendom. Arabia, in particular, had become the seat of a gross idolatry, the superstitious Arabs being divided between two Pagan sects, the Tsabitians, who were worshippers of images, and the Magians, who were worshippers of fire. Jews also had settled in large numbers in the Arabian Peninsula from the time of their dispersion by the Romans; and Christianity also, from a very early period of its history, had found a lodgment in that country.

At the birth of Mohammed, his countrymen, while they worshipped one Supreme God, whom they termed Allah, combined with his worship that of angels and of men. Their idolatry seems to have partaken of an astronomical character, the number of idols in the temple of Mecca being 360, which was the precise number of days in the Arab year. And while their Pagan deities were thus numerous, the subdivisions among the Christian sects in the Peninsula it were difficult to enumerate. The entire Eastern Church groaned under the contentions and conflicts of Arians, Sabellians, Nestorians, and Eutychians. In Arabia itself, Ebionites, Beryllians, Nazarenes, and Collyridians, were engaged in eager struggle for ascendancy or for existence.

Such was the state of matters when the great teacher of Islamism arose to denounce the all but universally prevailing idolatry, and to proclaim, as with a voice of thunder, the great truth that God is One. Mohammed, who claimed this mission as his own, was born in April A. D. 569 at Mecca, the sacred city which contained the KAABA (which see), or holy shrine of the Arabians. The birth-place of the prophet was a rich commercial emporium, and among the most prosperous of its merchants was the family of Hashem, who belonged to the tribe of Koreish, in whom was hereditarily vested the guardianship of the Kaaba, a post alike of honour and of profit. From this honourable family Mohammed was descended. His great-grandfather had been governor of Mecca when it had been attacked by the Ethiopians, and had signalized himself by his valour in its defence; and his son, Abd-al-Motaleb, succeeded to the same post, and sustained it with equal bravery, having, only two months before the birth of his grandson, saved the city from capture by the Abyssinian viceroy. This valiant governor of Mecca lived to the very advanced age of 110 years, and was the father of six daughters and thirteen sons. Abdallah, the father of the prophet, was one of the youngest of this numerous progeny; and so captivating was the beauty of his person, that as Washington Irving informs us, on the authority of Eastern tradition, no fewer than two hundred maidens of his tribe died of broken hearts at the marriage of the handsome youth to Amina, a daughter also of the Koreish tribe. The only offspring of this marriage was Mohammed. His father died prematurely on returning from a commercial journey, leaving Amina and her child but imperfectly provided for. Abd-al-Motaleb now took the infant Mohammed and his widowed mother under his special care, sending the child to be nursed by a Bedouin woman, the wife of a shepherd, who, however, speedily surrendered her charge, thinking him to be possessed by an evil spirit.

While yet very young, Mohammed was rendered an orphan by the death of his mother. His aged grandfather now befriended the child more anxiously than ever, and with his dying words commended him to the care of his eldest son, Abu Thaleb, who succeeded him in the guardianship of the Kaaba. Thus the childhood and youth of the future prophet of Arabia were spent in a household where the strict observance of religious rites and ceremonies tended to prepare him for the important part which he was destined yet to act as the founder of a new religion. At this early period of his life he began to evince that love of solitude and that calm thoughtful frame of mind which so peculiarly marked his after career. To a meditative spirit Mohammed added a habit of acutely observing men and manners. Desirous even at twelve years of age to extend his field of observation he accompanied his uncle in a caravan journey to Syria; and it is generally believed that while thus engaged, he acquired those strong impressions of the evil of idolatry, which seemed like a ruling passion to call forth the utmost energies of his heart and mind. In his mercantile speculations he was remarkably successful, and such was the honour and the integrity which marked all his dealings, that before he had reached his twenty-fifth year, he received the title of the Amin or faithful. The high character which he had thus earned, recommended him to the notice of Khadijah, a wealthy widow, by whom he was employed to carry on her commercial speculations. The confidence she reposed in the youthful Mohammed led this lady to entertain towards him feelings of a still more tender kind which terminated in marriage.

Of the fifteen years which elapsed between the marriage of Mohammed and the commencement of his career as a prophet, little is said by his biographers. By the honourable alliance which he had formed, he was now possessed of both rank and wealth. Retiring therefore almost wholly from commercial pursuits, he spent much of his time in meditation, and throughout the whole of the month Ramadhan he gave himself up to solitary prayer. It was during this deeply interesting portion of the prophet's life that he was led to contrast the purity of the primitive faith with the corruptions which had from time to time been engrafted on it. His soul burned with indignation while he thought of the fearful extent to which the religion of God had been perverted by the corrupt devices of men. Is it not possible, he asked himself, to rescue mankind from the worship of idols, and to restore the worship of the One true and living God? The accomplishment of such a task appeared to him the highest and the holiest mission which a man could undertake. From that moment his decision was formed, and he resolved to stand boldly forth in the face of an idolatrous world as the Apostle of the Divine Unity. "The feeling," says Neander, "of the supremacy of God above all creatures, of the immeasurable distance between Him and all things that are made; the feeling of the perfect independence of the almighty and incomprehensible One,—this was the fundamental prevailing key-note of his religious convictions. But the other element necessary to the perfect development of divine consciousness, the feeling of relationship and communion with God, this was altogether defective in Muhamed. Thus he had but a one-sided comprehension of the divine attributes, the idea of omnipotence suppressing the idea of a holy love; and hence omnipotence appeared to him as a limitless self-will; and though he had occasionally a sense of God's love and mercy, beaming through him in the way of religious consciousness, yet even this was in antagonism with that exclusive ground-tone of his system, and was necessarily marked thereby with a species of particularism. Hence the prevailing doctrine of fatalism, and the utter denial of moral freedom. As the ethical form given to the idea of God determines the character of the moral spirit to which a religion gives birth, so, consequently, although some isolated sublime moral sentiments, strangely contrasted with the ruling spirit of his religion, may be met with in the system of Muhamed, yet, taking it as a whole, it is singularly defective through this want of fundamental truth in the ethical comprehension of the idea of God. The God who is regarded but as an almighty self-will, may be worshipped by a mere unreserved subjection to that will, by a servile obedience, by the performance of various outward acts, as works of benevolence, which it may have pleased him to command, as signs of honour to his name; or homage may be rendered him, on the other hand, by the destruction of his enemies, as idolaters, by the enslaving of unbelievers, by the vain repetition of prayers, by fasts, lustrations and pilgrimages. Through the contracted notion of the divine nature, Muhamed's system was also wanting, as to its moral character, in the all-pervasive and illuminating principle of a holy love. The ethical element being thus defective, no room is found for the feeling which points to the necessity of redemption. We read in the Koran of the original state of man, and of his eating of the forbidden fruit, but the tradition is given not as it exists in the Old or New Testament, but rather as it is found in the apocryphal-Jewish or Jewish Christian stories; as something, indeed, peculiarly fictitious, and only as it agreed with the poetical disposition of Muhamed and his people, without any relation to its ethics, or connection with the substance of the religion; so that Muhamedanism, as far as its peculiar character is concerned, would lose nothing were this tradition entirely left out. This constitutes, in fact, the great distinction between Muhamedanism and Christianity, that the founder entirely denies the want of a redeemer and redemption."

At the commencement of his career as a religious reformer, Mohammed had no desire to establish a new religion, but simply to restore that pure Theism which he found lying at the foundation of both Judaism and Christianity. His labours were in the outset limited to his own countrymen, and his prevailing desire was to recover them from gross idolatry, simply in its Pagan aspect; meeting with violent opposition, however, not only from the heathen, but also from Jews and Christians, he took higher ground, and declared himself to be sent from God to be the restorer of pure Theism, delivering it from those impurities with which it seemed to be mingled both in Judaism and Christianity. The mission which he now undertook, accordingly, was to revive what he termed the religion of Abraham, of Moses, and of Jesus. The written word, he alleged, was brought to him from heaven in detached passages by the angel Gabriel, and these portions of revelation, when afterwards collected into a volume, were called the KORAN (which see), a volume recognized down to this day as the sacred book of the Mohammedans.

It was in the night of power, as it is termed, in the month of abstinence, that the angel Gabriel first appeared to the prophet. A condensed account of this strange vision is given by Mr. Osburn, in his 'Religions of the World.' It runs as follows: "Mohammed was awakened one dark night by the angel Gabriel, as usual, who brought with him a wonderful female creature, called Al Borak, or the lightning. The prophet was directed to mount, and the creature permitted him, on hearing from the angel the high favour in which he stood with God, on condition of the prophet's prayers on his own behalf. The steed cleaves the air with the swiftness of lightning. The prophet is directed to dismount and pray on Mount Sinai, and at Bethlehem, the birth-place of Jesus Christ. He then hears and disregards the voices of two fair damsels, imploring him to stay and converse with them; the one on the right hand, who, as the angel tells him, impersonated Judaism, the other on the left representing Christianity; and presses forward. They hurry onward, and alight at the gate of the holy temple of Jerusalem. Having fastened the bridle of Borak to a ring, he entered the temple, and found there Abraham, Moses, and Jesus, with many other prophets, with whom he conversed and prayed for some time. While thus engaged, a ladder of light was let down from heaven, and its lower end rested on the shakra, or foundation-stone of the temple, which was likewise the stone on which Jacob slept at Luz. Aided by the angel, Mohammed darted up the ladder with the rapidity of lightning, and entered the first heaven, where he saw Adam, the father of mankind, who embraced him as the greatest of his descendants.

He then mounted to the second heaven where was Noah, the second parent of the human race, who greeted him with the same salutation. In the third heaven sat Asrael, the angel of death; in the fourth heaven, Israfil, the angel of pity. To the fifth heaven the new prophet was welcomed by Aaron; to the sixth by Moses, who wept when he foresaw the far greater success with which Mohammed's mission would be attended than his own. In the seventh heaven he was received by Abraham, and from thence he mounted to the dwelling of God himself, which is described in language taken altogether from the Bible. Before the Divine presence stood the pattern whence the Caaba had been built, and round this Mohammed was permitted to walk in the angelic procession that incessantly encircled it. Gabriel now could go no further; but the prophet was permitted to stand before God, and to hear from Him the command to teach his disciples to pray five times daily. He then descended by the ladder of light to the temple at Jerusalem, found Al Borak where he had left her, and mounting, was instantaneously transported to his bed in the house of Mutem Ibn Adi. So brief a portion of earthly time had been occupied by this marvellous journey that a pitcher of water, which he accidentally upset in leaving his bed to set out, had not reached the ground on his return, and he was able to catch and replace it without one drop being spilt."

"After this appearance," says Mr. Macbride, in his 'Mohammedan Religion Explained,' "there is said to have been an intermission of two years, during which he suffered hallucination of his senses, and several times contemplated self-destruction. His friends were alarmed, and called in exorcists, and he himself doubted the soundness of his mind. Once he said to his wife, 'I hear a sound and see a light: I am afraid there are gins (spirits) in me;' and again, 'I am afraid I am a Kahir;' that is, a soothsayer possessed by Satan. 'God,' replied Khadijah, 'will never permit this, for thou keepest thy engagements, and assistest thy relatives;' and, according to some, she added, 'Thou wilt be the prophet of thy nation.' These sounds, as from a clock or a bell, are enumerated as symptoms of epilepsy. In this morbid state of feeling he is said to have heard a voice, and on raising his head, beheld Gabriel, who assured him he was the prophet of God. Frightened, he returned home, and called for covering. He had a fit, and they poured cold water on him; and when he came to himself he heard those words (lxxiv.), 'Oh, thou covered one, arise, and preach, and magnify thy Lord;' and henceforth, we are told, he received revelations without intermission. Before this supposed revelation he had been medically treated on account of the evil eye; and when the Koran first descended to him he fell into fainting fits, when, after violent shuddering, his eyes closed, and his mouth foamed. Khadijah offered to bring him to one who would dispossess him of the evil spirit, but he forbade her. All his visions, however, were not of this painful nature. To Harith ibn Hisham's inquiry, he said the angel often appeared to him in a human form (commonly as his friend Dibra), and sometimes he had a revelation without any appearance. 'Many,' says an author much used by Weil, 'he had immediately from God, as in his journey to his throne; many in dreams; and it was one of his common sayings, that a prophet's dream is a revelation.' According to Ayesha, whenever the angel appeared to him, though extremely cold, perspiration burst forth on his forehead, his eyes became red, and he would bellow like a young camel. 'On one of these occasions,' says a traditionist, 'his shoulder fell upon mine, and I never felt one so heavy.' Once the communicator came to him riding on a camel, and he trembled violently, and knelt down. He was angry when gazed upon during these fits. He looked like a drunken man, and they thought he would have died. It is difficult to form a positive judgment on such a person; yet enthusiasm, if at any time it deserted him, seems to have revived, for his conduct, during his last illness, is not that of an hypocrite."

The first convert whom Mohammed gained over to his new religion was his own wife Khadijah, followed soon after by the youthful Ali, and by Zaid, his slave, whom he immediately emancipated, but who, notwithstanding, still continued in his service. Beyond his own family the first who acknowledged him as a prophet sent from heaven was ABUBEKKR (which see), a man of rank and riches, who afterwards succeeded him in the caliphate. For three years he was engaged in laying the foundation of his great undertaking, and so slowly did his religion make way, that at the end of that period his proselytes amounted to no more than fourteen persons. Not contented with so small a number of followers, he resolved now to make a public declaration of his religion. Beginning with the heads of his own family, he called upon them to recognize him as a prophet of God, and Ali, the son of Abu Thaleb, as his caliph or successor. The heads of the Koreish, however, refused to yield to his demands; but nothing discouraged, he addressed himself to the great body of the people, inveighing against the prevalent idolatry, and exhorting both Jews and Christians to receive his book along with their own. At first he was satisfied that his religion should be regarded as one of many religions which he declared were alike acceptable in the sight of God. Even in the more public diffusion of the new faith, he met with but little success; and so persecuted were his few followers, that they were under the necessity of seeking refuge in Abyssinia. Amid all opposition the prophet persisted in asserting his claims to be accounted a heavenly messenger, and no longer confining his mission to the Arabians, he declared its extent to be limited only by the world itself. His doctrine was summed up in his own aphorism,

"There is no God but God, and Mohammed is his prophet."

At length came the year of mourning, as it is termed, when he was deprived by death of his beloved wife, Khadijah, and his kind uncle, Abu Thaleb, who, though he put no faith in Mohammed's pretensions, ever acted towards him as a faithful protector and friend. Thus left comparatively undefended, he judged it prudent to retire from Mecca, but after an absence of only one month, he found his way back to the sacred city. Taking advantage of the opportunity which the annual pilgrimage afforded to gain proselytes to his opinions, he made many but ineffectual attempts to convince the strangers of the divinity of his mission. Both the pilgrims and his fellow-citizens were alike unbelieving. The disappointed prophet now addressed himself to the Jews, of whom there were a large number in Mecca and its neighbourhood, and who, looking as they were for the consolation of Israel, would be ready, he flattered himself, to recognize him as the long-expected Messiah. Accommodating himself, accordingly, to these Jews who had been oppressed by the idolaters, he represented his mission as designed to restore the original glory of the religion of Moses; and still further to please this class of his hearers, he instructed his followers to turn their faces in prayer towards Jerusalem. All, however, was unavailing; the Jews rejected him, and enraged at the failure of his attempts in this quarter, he substituted the Kaaba as the Kiblah of his followers, instead of Jerusalem, charged the Jews with having corrupted the religion of their fathers, and declared that he was sent to restore the only pure faith, that of Abraham.

Thus far Mohammed, while he asserted himself to be a prophet sent from God, had made no pretensions to the possession of the gift of miracles. Now, however, he changed his tone in this respect, and boldly set forth that one night in a vision he had been carried first to Jerusalem, and thence through the heavens to within a bow-shot of the throne of God. The story for a time met with little credit, until Abubekr publicly declared his firm belief in all that came from the mouth of Mohammed; and accordingly we find that to this day his followers, appealing to the traditions, are accustomed to avow their belief in the prophet's heavenly journey.

At this point in his history Mohammed began to assume sovereignty over his converts. Having met twelve of them on Mount Akaba, at a short distance from Mecca, he bound them by an oath to renounce idolatry, not to steal, not to commit fornication, not to put their female infants to death, not to calumniate, and to obey all his reasonable commands. He assembled them for public worship once a-week, regularly on the Fridays, when he delivered a discourse to them on some point either of doctrine or duty. The twelve who were thus organized as not only his followers, but his subjects, belonged to Yatreb, a town not far from Mecca, to which city they annually resorted on pilgrimage. The next year, on their return, their number had increased to seventy-three, and Mohammed, meeting them by night, received their renewed protestations of fidelity, and promised them Paradise if they fell in his cause. He now, in imitation of Jesus Christ, selected twelve to be his apostles.

The idolaters of Mecca, and more especially the Koreish, were not a little alarmed at the aspect which matters had assumed. A religious crusade had been proclaimed by Mohammed against the worship of false gods, and a political association had been formed, which threatened the peace and safety of the community. It was resolved, therefore, to put the alleged prophet to death, and a person from each tribe was chosen, the more effectually to compass his destruction. His flight from Mecca was therefore absolutely necessary. Accompanied by Abubekr and Ali, he left the sacred city, and after wandering about for sixteen days, he reached Yatreb, which was from that time called Medinat Anabbi, the city of the prophet. The Hegira or flight of Mohammed, which coincides with 16th July A. D. 622, was appointed by the Caliph Omar to be the Mohammedan era, and has continued ever since to mark the lunar years of the Mohammedan nations.

On entering Medina with his companions, the prophet was welcomed with acclamations of loyalty and devotion; his adherents, who had been scattered by persecution, rallied round him, and from this time a distinction was recognized between the faithful of Mecca and those of Medina. Mohammed now assumed the twofold office of king and priest, and, having purchased a piece of ground, he built a dwelling-house and a masjid or mosque. He married about this time Ayesha, the daughter of Abubekr, and effected also a marriage between Ali and his favourite daughter Fatima. Having established himself in Medina, and become an independent sovereign, he entered upon a new career, that of warrior; propagating the new religion by the sword, and waging war against all unbelievers. His course was now marked by carnage and plunder. His followers were allowed to take the female captives as wives and concubines: and the maxim was inculcated upon all the faithful, that "one drop of blood shed in the cause of God, or one night spent in arms, is of more avail than two months employed in fasting and prayer. Whosoever falls in battle, his sins are forgiven: at the day of judgment his wounds shall be resplendent as vermillion, and odoriferous as musk; and the loss of his limbs shall be supplied by the wings of angels and cherubims." The Arabs listening to such doctrines were fired with enthusiasm; and thirsting for the blood of infidels they rushed fearlessly into battle.

While thus acting the warrior, Mohammed did not neglect the duties of a priest. He constantly led the devotions of his followers, offered up the public prayer, and preached at the weekly festival on the Fridays. About this time he instituted the fast of the month Ramadhan, and to distinguish his people from the Jews and Christians, he substituted for the trumpets of the one, and the bells of the other, a special class of officers called muczzins or criers, whose duty it was to summon the faithful at the hours of prayer. The first mosque was built in a burying-ground, and the prophet himself assisted in its erection. At first he was tolerant to those, whether Jews, Christians, or idolatrous Pagans, who refused to embrace Islamism, hoping to win them over by persuasion to his cause; but when he despaired of their conversion by gentle means, and found himself strong enough to coerce, he girt on his sword, and went forth at the head of his armed bands, scouring the deserts in search of blood and plunder. His first warlike engagement is known by the name of the battle of Bedr. The story is thus briefly told: Receiving at this time the intelligence that an unusually wealthy caravan was returning from Syria, guarded by a strong escort from Mecca, he resolved to lead his limited forces against it. The news, however, of his crusade reached Mecca, and his ancient enemies, the Koreishites, at once armed, and sallied forth to the defence of the caravan. In consequence of their discovering the track of the Moslem party, they gave information by which the merchandise was conveyed to a place of safety; but, rendered bold by this escape, and burning with rage against Mohammed, it was resolved, in a council of war, under the influence of the aged and intrepid Abu Jahl, to give battle to the Moslems. The engagement was very fierce on both sides, and the Mohammedans were about to give way, when their leader, pretending to be suddenly inspired, cast a handful of dust into the air, and cursed his foes. His warriors, thus emboldened, renewed the fight, and the Meccans were signally routed, Abu Jahl himself was slain, some of the most illustrious Koreishites taken prisoners, and heavy ransoms demanded, whilst a very satisfactory spoil was divided amongst the Moslems.

Enraged at the signal defeat they had suffered on the field of Bedr, the Meccans organized their forces in the following year under the leadership of Abu Sofian. A second battle was fought on Mount Ohud, six miles to the north of Medina; but on this occasion, after a desperate struggle in which Mohammed was wounded, the Moslems lost the day. This disastrous engagement had almost proved fatal to the cause of Islam, as the followers of the prophet were tempted to deny the divine authority of his mission; but to quiet their murmurs he persuaded them that their ill success was to be traced to the sins of some, and the unbelief of others.

The following year the enemies of the Moslems, encouraged by their success, laid siege to Medina with an army of 10,000 men. Mohammed was unwilling to risk an engagement in the open field, but entrenched himself behind the defences. The Meccans sat down before the walls of the city for twenty days, but dissensions having broken out in their camp, and their tents having been overturned by a tempest, they returned home without having accomplished anything. No sooner had the enemy raised the siege than the Moslems attacked the Jews in Medina, murdering their men, and selling their women and children as slaves. Following up the advantage he had gained, Mohammed attacked the Jewish fortress of Khaibar, and having taken it by storm, he divided the plunder among his soldiers. On this occasion the life of the prophet was endangered, a female slave having sought to poison him, and almost succeeded in her attempt. On being asked what was her motive, the slave replied, "I wished to ascertain if thou wert a prophet; if thou art, it will not hurt thee; if not, I shall deliver my country from an impostor."

Medina being thus completely in his power, Mohammed now formed the resolution of subjugating Mecca also. He had strictly enjoined the Moslems to turn their eyes five times each day towards the sacred city, and he himself never lost sight of the Kaaba day nor night. Warned of God, as he imagined, in a dream, he set out at the head of 14,000 men to revisit the city from which he had been compelled to fly. On reaching Medina he concluded a ten years' truce on condition that all the inhabitants of Mecca, who were so inclined, should be at liberty to join him, and that he and his people might come on pilgrimage unarmed, provided they remained in the city only three days. The next year, Mohammed returned to complete his pilgrimage, and according to the treaty he left the city on the fourth day. The faithfulness which he thus showed to the promises he had given, gained over some to his party, and more especially three persons of note, Othman ebn Telha, the guardian of the Kaaba, and Khaled, and Amru, the future conquerors of Syria and Egypt.

The prophet had risen rapidly both in power and influence among his countrymen in Arabia, and proud of the distinction he had won, he despatched missionaries to three foreign potentates, inviting them to adopt the Moslem faith. These were Heraclius, the Eastern emperor, the prefect of Egypt, and Sapor, king of Persia. By the two first they were treated with respect, and dismissed with presents. The last tore the letter to fragments, and wrote to his viceroy at Yemen, that immediate steps should be taken to punish the impostor.

Mohammed kept in view the conquest of Mecca, and regardless of the truce, he set out with a large army to surprise the sacred city; and after encountering Abu Sofian, and taking him captive, he entered Mecca in triumph, passing through its gates with a countless host of followers. Mounted on his favourite camel, he rode directly to the Kaaba, and performing the seven cireuits, he entered the temple, and destroyed the idols with his own hands, not sparing even the statues of Abraham and Ishmael. The Meccans gave in their adherence to the religion of the prophet, and it was enacted that henceforth no unbeliever should dare to enter the precincts of the holy city. This was the crowning achievement of Mohammed's martial prowess, and no sooner had he effected the conquest of Mecca than the Arabian tribes generally hastened to submit themselves to his authority. An obstinate remnant, however, still refused to yield, and the battle of Honain, only three miles from Mecca, though at first it appeared to threaten his destruction, terminated in his final triumph. From the field of Honain he marched without delay to the siege of Tayeff; but at the end of twenty days he was compelled to sound a retreat. His prowess had excited, however, such awe in the minds of all the tribes, particularly of the north of Arabia, that they hastened to despatch legates to Mecca and Med'na to express their submission to the new prophet. All Arabia was now purged from idolatry, and embraced the religion of Islam. Mohammed next led an expedition into Syria, which, though its territorial conquests were limited in themselves, diffused throughout the wide extent of the Roman dominions a dread of the Moslem power, and led to the ultimate subjugation of the Eastern Empire.

If, as the whole course of his history would seem to indicate, it had been the grand object of Mohammed's ambition to establish to himself a name, as the founder of a new faith, his desire had been attained already to a wonderful extent. He had been promulgating the religion of the Koran, and in the course of only a few years he had seen it widely diffused on every side. But now that the foundation of his empire was laid, his own task was near its termination, and he was about to leave the world. The infirmities of age were creeping fast over him, and his constitution had never completely recovered from the effects of the poison administered at Khairbar. Feeling that his end was not far distant, he resolved upon making a final pilgrimage to Mecca. Though in much weakness he accomplished the journey to the sacred city, sacrificed sixty-three camels, and liberated sixty-three slaves, in honour of the number of years he had lived upon the earth, and having taken a last look of the venerated Kaaba, he returned to Medina to die.

It is not a little remarkable that the last hours of Mohammed's life are not only characterized by the utmost serenity and peace, but betray not the slightest misgivings as to the reality of his mission as a prophet sent from God. He expired in the arms of his beloved Ayesha, feebly uttering the words, "To the highest companions in Paradise," which were understood as referring to his desire for heavenly bliss. Thus died Mohammed, the great prophet of Arabia, in his sixty-fourth year, on the 8th June, A. D. 632, having in the course of ten short years, which elapsed between the Hegira and his death, planted in the East a religion which has taken root so firmly, that amid all the revolutions and changes of twelve centuries, it still exercises a powerful controlling influence over the minds and consciences of 140,000,000 of human beings.

MOHAMMEDANS, the believers in the religious system devised and promulgated by Mohammed, the great prophet of Arabia. The principles of Islam, as this religion was termed by its originator, are said to rest on four foundations:—1. The Koran. 2. The Sonnah, or Tradition. 3. The harmony in opinion of the orthodox Mohammedan theologians. 4. Kias, reasoning. The Koran is regarded by the faithful as the word of God; the Sonnah as the word of his inspired prophet. The first, accordingly, is looked upon as divine, both in language and meaning, the second in meaning only.

The religion of Islam is both theoretical and practical; or, in other words, it is divided into faith and practice. The faith includes six articles: 1. Belief in God. 2. In his angels. 3. In his Scriptures. 4. In his prophets. 5. In the resurrection. 6. In predestination. The Din or practice, again, includes four points: 1. Prayers and purifications. 2. Alms. 3. Fasting. 4. The pilgrimage to Mecca.

The first and fundamental principle of the Mohammedan faith is usually stated in these words: "There is no God but God," thus asserting the existence and unity of the Divine Being in opposition to the Polytheism of the heathen, on the one hand, and the Trinity of the Christians on the other, which latter Mohammed regarded as equivalent to Trithism, or the assertion of three Gods. The peculiar designation of the Deity, in the mouth of the faithful, is Allah, besides which there are ninety-nine epithets applied to him; and to assist them in repeating these they use a rosary. The sovereignty of God is a favourite doctrine with all Mohammedans, and predestination is taught in almost every chapter of the Koran. As originally enunciated by the prophet, the Moslem creed was simple, and received the undoubting belief of all his followers. In process of time questions began to be started in regard to the nature of God, which gave rise to various sects or divisions, the chief of which were the Motazelites, who denied the existence of eternal attributes as belonging to the Divine essence; the Kaderites, who denied the Divine decrees, while their opponents, the Jaberites, declared that man is constrained by the Divine decrees, which are immutable; the Almorjeites, who declared that the faithful could not be injured by sin, nor unbelievers benefited by obedience, while their opponents, the Waa'idites, maintained that believers, however orthodox in their creed, would endure eternal punishment if they continued in sin.

The Mohammedans entertain peculiar opinions in regard to angels, alleging that "they have pure and subtle bodies, created of fire; neither is there among them any difference of sexes, or carnal appetites, and they have neither father nor mother. Also they are endowed with different forms, and severally preside over ministrations. Some stand, some incline downwards, some sit, or adore with a lowered forehead; others sing hymns and praises of God, or laud and extol their Creator, or ask pardon for human offences. Some of them record the deeds of men, and guard over the human race; others support the throne of God, or go about it, and perform other works which are pleasing to the Deity." Two angels, who are changed daily, are assigned to every man to record his good and bad actions. The most eminent of the angelic host are believed to be Gabriel, who brought down the Koran from heaven; Michael, the patron of the Jews, who fights against God's enemies; Azrael, the angel of death; and Israfil, who will blow the trumpet on the resurrection morning. The Koran alleges, in regard to the evil angels, that Satan was cast down from heaven for refusing to worship or do homage to Adam, and in consequence obtained the name of EBLIS (which see). The Mohammedans also believe in an intermediate race between angels and men, called Jins, who, like the angels, have bodies created from fire, but of a grosser structure, who propagate their kind, and though long-lived, are not immortal. These beings are said to have inhabited the earth under a succession of sovereigns before the creation of Adam. Mohammed declared that his mission included the Jins.

Another article of the Moslem creed refers to the prophets, whose number they allege exceeds 800,000. They begin with Adam, and end with Mohammed, who is far superior to every one of them. They are considered as free from mortal sin, and professors of Islam. The books which God has sent down, from time to time, containing his revealed will, are believed by the Mohammedans to amount to 104, of which ten were given to Adam; fifty to Seth; thirty to Enoch or Idris; ten to Abraham; one, which was the law, to Moses; one, the Psalter, to David; one to Jesus, the gospel; and the Koran to Mohammed, which has abrogated all the rest that are extant.

The last article of faith among the followers of the prophet is the day of judgment, including the intermediate state. They believe that the dead are interrogated by two beings of tremendous aspect, named Monker and Nakir, (see DEAD, EXAMINATION OF THE.) concerning the unity of God, and the mission of the prophet. Unbelievers will be beaten with iron maces, and their bodies gnawed by dragons till the resurrection; while believers will be refreshed with gales wafted from paradise. The souls of the prophets are admitted immediately into paradise, and those of martyrs pass into the crops of green birds which feed on the fruits of paradise. The souls of ordinary believers are supposed to hover near their graves. It is believed by the Mohammedans that the RESURRECTION (which see), though its precise time is known only to God, will be preceded by certain signs, such as the appearance of the sun in the west; the appearance of an extraordinary wild beast, who will distinguish between believers and unbelievers, by a peculiar mark upon their faces; the manifestation of DAJAL (which see), or the false Messiah, who, after a short but universal sovereignty, will be slain by Jesus, who will descend on the mosque of Damascus, and reign in prosperity and peace till his death, and the last Imam, who is now believed to be lying hid in a cave, will appear and act as his deputy. The Mohammedan Hell has seven compartments; the first appropriated to unworthy Moslems; the second to Jews; the third to Christians; the fourth to Tsabians; the fifth to the Magians; the sixth to idolaters; and the seventh to hypocrites. The Mohammedan heaven is thoroughly sensual in its character, its highest pleasures and enjoyments being of a carnal description.

The practical religion of the Koran attaches the highest value to prayer, which among the followers of Mohammed is invariably preceded by ablution, on the principle that while prayer is the key to paradise, it will only be accepted from persons bodily clean. The morning ablutions and prayers are thus described by Mr. Macbride, following the account given by Mr. Lane, in his 'Modern Egyptians:' "The believer first washes his hands three times, saying, 'In the name of God the merciful, the compassionate: Praise be to God, who hath sent down water for purification, and hath made Islam a light, and a conductor, and a guide to thy gardens—the gardens of delight, and to thy mansion, the mansion of peace.' Then, rinsing his mouth thrice, he says, 'O God, assist me in reading the Book, and in commemorating thee, and in thanking thee, and in worshipping thee well.' Then thrice he throws water up his nostrils, saying, 'O God, make me to smell the odours of paradise, and bless me with its delights, and make me not to smell the smell of the fires [of hell.]' Then he proceeds to wash his face three times, saying, 'O God, whiten my face with thy light on the day when thou shalt whiten the face of thy favourites, and do not blacken my face on the day when thou shalt blacken the faces of thine enemies.' His right hand and arm, up to the elbow, are washed next thrice, with the prayer, 'O God, give me my book in my right hand, and reckon with me with an easy reckoning.'

"The allusion is to a book in which all his actions are recorded: that of the just is to be placed in his right hand, that of the wicked in his left, which will be tied behind his back; and when he proceeds to his left hand he says, 'O God, give me not my book in my left hand, nor behind my back, and do not reckon with me with a difficult reckoning, nor make me to be one of the people of fire.' His head he washes but once, accompanying the action with this petition, 'O God, cover me with thy mercy, and pour down thy blessing upon me, and shade me under the shadow of thy company on the day when there shall be no other shade.' Putting into his ears the tips of his forefingers, he is to say, 'O God, make me to be one of those who hear what is said, and obey what is best,' or, 'O God, make me to hear good.' Wiping his neck with his fingers, he says, 'O God, free my neck from the fire, and keep me from chains, collars, and fetters.' Lastly, he washes his feet, saying, first, 'O God, make firm my feet upon Sirat on the day when my feet shall slip on it;' and, secondly, 'Make my labour to be approved, and my sin forgiven, and my works accepted, merchandise that shall not perish, through thy pardon, O Mighty One, O most forgiving through thy mercy, O Thou most merciful of those who show mercy.' Having completed the ablution, he continues, looking up to heaven, 'Thy perfection, O God, I extol with thy praise; I testify there is no God but thee alone. Thou hast no companion. I implore thy forgiveness, and turn to thee with repentance.' Then, looking down to the earth, he adds the creed, and should recite, once at least, the chapter on Power."

When water cannot be procured, or its use might be injurious to the health, sand is permitted to be substituted. That the faithful may perform their ablutions before entering the mosques, the courts are supplied with water. It is interesting to observe the mode in which the Moslem goes through his devotions. "The worshipper," we are told, "raising his open hands, and touching with the ends of his thumbs the lobes of his ears, repeats the Tacbir, that is, Allah Akbar, 'God is most great.' Still standing, and placing his hands before him, a little below the girdle, the left within the right, he recites the opening chapter of the Koran, and a few verses from any other which he pleases: he often chooses the 112th. He then, after having said, 'God is most great,' seats himself on his carpet, on his knees, and recites thrice (1 extol) the perfections of my Lord the great; adding, 'May God hear him who praiseth him. Our Lord, praise be unto thee.' Then, raising his head and body, 'God is most great.' He next drops gently upon his knees, repeating, 'God is most great,' puts his nose and forehead to the ground between his hands, during which prostration he exclaims thrice, 'The perfections of my Lord the Most High.' Then, raising his head and body, sinking backwards on his heels, and placing his hands on his thighs, he says again, 'God is Most High,' which he repeats on a second prostration; and, again rising, utters the Tacbir. This ceremony is called one raa'ât. He rises on his feet, and goes through it a second time, only varying the portion of the Koran after the opening chapter. After the last raa'ât of all the prayers, he says, 'Praises belong to God, and prayer, and good works. Peace be on thee, O prophet, and the mercy of God, and his blessing! Peace be on us and on the righteous worshippers of God.' He then recites the creed. Before the salutations in the final prayer, the worshipper may offer up any short petition for himself or friends, and it is considered better to word it in Koranic language than in his own. If devoutly disposed, he may add this supererogatory service, the recitation of the Throne verse (Koran xi. 256). He may then repeat the perfections of God thirty-three times, and 'Praise to Him for ever' once, with 'Praise be to God, extolled be his dignity for ever!' thirty-three times; then the same number of times, 'There is no God but He; God is most great;' then, 'God is most great in greatness, and praise abundant be to God!' In those repetitions he finds his rosary, which has a mark after the thirty-third bead, very convenient to prevent his praying too little or too much. Any wandering of the eye, or inattention, must be strictly avoided; and if interrupted, except unavoidably, the worshipper must begin again. As thus described, the service seems long; but Lane, who must have often witnessed it, says that the time it occupies is under five minutes, if restricted to what is indispensable, and that the supererogatory addition will take up about as much more."

In the mosque on the Friday, which may be termed the Mohammedan Sabbath, the KHOTBEH (which see), is regularly recited, a prayer which Mohammed himself was accustomed to use, in which practice he was followed by his successors. A moral discourse is frequently preached by the officiating Khatib, who holds a wooden sword reversed, a custom said to be peculiar to the cities taken from the unbelievers. In each mosque there is a niche in the wall, which marks the position of Mecca, towards which the faithful must turn their faces in prayer. The congregation, without regard to rank, arrange themselves round the Imâm, who guides them in the performance of the nine attitudes of prayer. It is incumbent on the Moslem to pray five times every day in the same words, and from the very frequency of the repetition the exercise is in danger of degenerating into a mere form. Mohammed appears to have set the example to his followers, of a strict attention to the duty of prayer. He spent much of his time in devotion, not only during the day, but during the night also. Nor did he confine himself to prescribed forms, but he was accustomed to intermingle frequent extemporary ejaculations. Hence it is that no class of people are found to utter pious exclamations more habitually than the Mohammedans, even on the most ordinary occasions. Throughout life the Moslem is scrupulously attentive to the regular observance of the appointed seasons of prayer; and when he is laid upon a bed of sickness and death, wailing women are hired to join with the family in uttering loud lamentations as he expires, while Fakirs are called in to chant the Koran.

Next in importance in the eye of a Moslem to the duty of prayer, is that of almsgiving, which is frequently recommended in the Koran, and is there said to give efficacy to prayer. The exercise of fasting is also held in high estimation. The comparative value of the three great duties is thus stated by the second Omar: "Prayer will bring a man halfway to God, and fasting to the door of the palace, but it is to alms that he will owe his admission." In imita tion of the Pagan Arabs, Mohammed commanded that a whole month, that of Ramadhan, should be appropriated to the exercise of fasting, which is so strictly observed, that on every day of that month, from sunrise to sunset, total abstinence is rigidly adhered to from all liquids, as well as from solids. Children are alone exempt, and if any one of the faithful is necessarily precluded from the observance of the fast at the appointed time, he must fast afterwards for as long a period. At sunset of each day during the fast of Ramadhan, the mosques are open and brightly illuminated, when multitudes resort thither for public devotions, more especially on the last five nights of the month, including that of power, when the Koran began to be revealed from heaven. In addition to this great public fast, the Moslems observe also voluntary fasts, the principal of which is the Aashura, held on the tenth of the month Moharrem, being a day of mourning in commemoration of the martyrdom of Hossein.

The Mohammedans have only two special festivals, which are called by the Turks the greater and the lesser Beiram; the first, which is the festival of breaking the long fast, being their principal season of rejoicing; the second, which is an important part of the pilgrimage to Mecca, being the feast of sacrifice observed in commemoration of Abraham's intended offering of his son. It is customary, also, in all Mohammedan countries to keep the festivals of their numerous saints, and to perform frequent pilgrimages to their tombs. On such occasions the Koran is recited by hired readers, and the dervishes go through their sacred dances. On the 12th of the third month the prophet's birth-day is celebrated at Cairo. This festival lasts for nine days, when the town is illuminated, the shops are open all night, and the people indulge in all kinds of amusement. Another festival religiously kept up by the Moslems in Turkey is the Hirkahî-chérif, or adoration of the prophet's mantle, a relic which is carefully preserved along with his seal and the original copy of the various portions of the Koran collected by Abubekr.

The Hadj or pilgrimage to Mecca is another great duty commanded in the Koran, and to which Mohammed himself attached so much importance, that he considered a believer neglecting it might as well die a Jew or a Christian. The Duh'uthajja is the month on which this sacred duty is discharged. (See MECCA, PILGRIMAGE TO).

Mohammedans are divided into two great parties, the Schîtes and the Sonnites, who hate each other more bitterly than they do the Jews or the Christians. The first are the admirers of Ali, who reject the traditions, and take the title of Adalijah, or Followers of Justice. They curse the three first caliphs, Abubekr, Omar, and Othman, as intruders into the place of Ali; but the Sonnites, while they honour all the four as guides, consider Ali as holding a rank subordinate to the others. The division which has thus taken place among the Moslems had its origin in the circumstance, that the prophet, before his death, gave no instructions in regard to his successor. Legends which, however, are entitled to no credit, exist among the Persians, tending to show that he had nominated Ali; but it is well known, that even Ali himself acknowledged that Mohammed had preserved entire silence on the subject of a successor to him in his sacred office. The Sonnites, on the other hand, bring forward traditions with the view of showing that Abubekr was the prophet's declared nominee; but these are entitled to as little credit as the legends of the Schîtes. After the death of the prophet the claims of the rival candidates were keenly contested by their respective friends. The claims of Ali consisted in his being a cousin of Mohammed, and his son-in-law, being the husband of his beloved and only surviving daughter, Fatimah. He was also the first who embraced Islamism beyond the immediate circle of the prophet's household. The party who supported these claims maintained that Ali was entitled to succeed the founder of the Moslem faith from his twofold affinity to the prophet. The Sonnites, on the contrary, maintained that the succession ought to be determined by the voice of the whole company of the faithful. The controversy, which raged with bitterness for a time, and threatened to produce a violent rupture in the ranks of the Moslems was terminated by the conciliatory spirit of Omar, himself a candidate for the vacant office, who advanced to Abubekr, the father of Mohammed's favourite wife Ayesha, and taking him by the hand, openly declared his allegiance to him as the caliph or successor of Mohammed. This act on the part of Omar led to the immediate choice of Abubekr by the united voice of the whole company. Not long after, Ali also was induced to give his approval to the choice. When near death, Abubekr nominated Omar, whose claims to the caliphate were readily acknowledged. After a reign of ten years Omar died by the hand of an assassin, and was succeeded by Othman, at whose death the dispute about the succession was renewed with great violence. During the caliphate of Abubekr, Omar and Othman, the supporters of Ali, had so increased both in numbers and influence, that at length the great body of the Arabian people were enlisted on his side, and though reluctant to accept the caliphate, it was literally forced upon him by the zeal and attachment of his partizans. To Ali succeeded his sons, Hassan and Hossein, and the rest of the twelve Imâms. The Schîtes, among whom the Persian Mohammedans occupy a conspicuous place, execrate the memory of the three caliphs who preceded Ali, whom other Moslems regard with the highest respect.

To the intelligent reader of history there is no circumstance in connexion with the Mohammedan religion which forces itself more strikingly upon the attention than the rapidity with which that faith was propagated after the death of the prophet. Only eighty-two years after that event, the empire of the caliphs, or successors of Mohammed, covered by far the greater portion of the then known world; and much more than one-half of its then existing inhabitants had embraced the faith of Islam. In A. D. 714, this empire, as described by Mr. Osburn, "was a huge broad belt, embracing exactly the central portion of the continent then known to be inhabited by man, extending eastward and westward, and nearly from ocean to ocean. Its western boundary at this extremity was the Atlantic; its northern, the Pyrenees, soon to be overpassed by the Moslem warriors. To the southward, it was already coextensive with the Sahara, and included the whole of North Africa and the kingdoms of Egypt and Abyssinia. In Asia, the Sinaitic peninsula, Palestine, Syria, parts of Armenia and Asia Minor, Mesopotamia, Persia, Cabul, and the countries eastward to the mouths of the Indus, had already received the faith of Islam; and its votaries had already girt on their armour for the conquest of India, and gone forth for the conversion of the Tartar tribes. To this huge empire vast accessions have been made in the eleven hundred years that have since elapsed; and with the single exception of Spain, from no one point has Islamism ever receded during this long interval."

India was one of the latest acquisitions of the Mohammedans, for it was not till the eleventh century that the Moslem power was established in that country by Sultan Mahmud, who having formed a kingdom between Persia and India, which has continued to subsist under different dynasties and names, entered the Punjab, and in twelve sacred expeditions carried off much valuable plunder. In particular, this conqueror took possession of the temple of Somnath, and broke in pieces the gigantic idol which it contained, carrying off the sandal-wood doors of the temple as a trophy, which continued till lately to ornament the mausoleum of Sultan Mahmud at Ghizni. These gates, a few years ago, attracted the notice of Lord Ellenborough, then governor-general of India, who, in order to avenge upon the Afghans the murder of our officials, and the annihilation of our invading army, brought them back to India as evidence of victory. It was difficult, however, to find a suitable place for the sacred doors, the temple of Somnath having, in the lapse of ages, become a solitary deserted ruin. It was not till two centuries after Mahmud that the founder of the succeeding house, Mohammed Gouri, established himself at Delhi, which down to the recent insurrection, and consequent destruction of the city, continued to be the capital of a Moslem power; but owes its fame to the Mongolian dynasty of princes, commencing in the fourteenth century with the Emperor Baber.

From the first association of the Mohammedans with the Hindus, mutual toleration was exercised; and even after the Mongolian conquest, when Northern India fell under the sway of the descendants of Timur, no attempt was made to interfere with the religion of the Hindus. Nay, such was the harmony which prevailed between the adherents of the two creeds, that we find Brahmanical practices and many of the prejudices of caste adopted by the conquerors at a very early period, while, on the other hand, the Hindus learned to speak with respect of Mohammed and the prophets of Islam. And what is perhaps still more remarkable, the Mohammedan sectaries, the Sunnites and Schites, laid aside wonted animosities when they entered the Peninsula. The change which thus gradually took place in the religious feelings of all parties, encouraged the emperor, Akbar, who ascended the throne in A. D. 1556, to make an attempt at the establishment of a new religion, which he termed ILAH (which see) the Divine, its symbol being, "There is no God but God, and Akbar is his caliph." The object of this religious reformer was to unite into one body Mohammedans, Hindus, Zoroastrians, Jews, and Christians. The creed of Akbar, indeed, bears considerable resemblance to that of the Persian Sufis, or to that of the Hindus of the Vedanti school.

Another combination of the Moslem and the Hindu faiths is seen in the religion of the Sikhs, which was founded by Nanak Gurn of Lahore, in the closing part of the fifteenth century. During the reign of Akbar the Great, this sect met with considerable encouragement. But when Jehangueir, the son of Akbar, revived the bigotry and intolerance of the Moslem creed, the Sikhs were subjected to a bitter persecution; and from that period, down to the present day, they have continued to entertain the most unrelenting hostility to the followers of Mohammed.

The religion of Akbar the Mohammedan, and Nanak the Hindu, are not the only examples of a mixture between the Mohammedan and Brahmanical religions in India. Hindu practices have been extensively adopted by the Moslems in that country, some of which are not only inconsistent with, but utterly opposed to, the precepts of the Koran; saints have been adopted by the Mohammedans in India, who were not even Mussulmans, and festivals have been instituted in honour of them. Thus the idolatrous worship of saints, which in other countries is looked upon by the followers of Mohammed with abhorrence, has been adopted by them as an admitted practice in India.

The chief potentates, at the present time, of the Mohammedan world, are the Sultan of Turkey and the Shah of Persia. The former is regarded by the Traditionists as a pope, as well as an emperor. It is true he devolves upon the mufiti the office of deciding cases of conscience, which was once vested in himself; but he is still considered, notwithstanding, as the fountain of ecclesiastical authority, and on that account invested with peculiar sanctity. The Shah of Persia, on the other hand, is looked upon with the utmost veneration by his people as the leader of the Schites, who became the dominant sect of the country under Shah Ismail, who ascended the Persian throne in 1492. From that time a fierce animosity sprung up between the Turks and the Persians, and which has given rise to many bloody wars between the two countries.

The Mohammedan power, once almost invincible, is now in a state of feebleness and decay. "The Ottoman empire," says Mr. Macbride, "has been rapidly declining; Greece has become an independent kingdom; little support can be looked for from Egypt; and province after province, both in Europe and Asia, have been surrendered to the arms or subtle diplomacy of Russia. The Czar, regarding the Turk as in the agony of political death, hastened to accomplish the long-cherished project of his family, and it seemed as if, at last, he might drive the unbelievers out of Europe. But the hour for the restoration to Christendom of the capital of the Greek empire had not, as he fondly imagined, arrived. The autocrat head of the Greek church, and the self-appointed protector of his co-religionists in the Ottoman dominions, came forward like a crusader. The Sultan, instead of yielding, as expected, advanced to the conflict, with troops trained according to European tactics; and France and England, the representatives of Papal and Protestant states, alarmed at the prospect of Russian aggrandizement, sent forth their armies for his protection. Politicians were looking forward to a protracted and doubtful contest; but the Russian emperor who had provoked the war is removed by death; and, while England was about to act with redoubled energy, hostilities have, contrary to our expectations, ceased. Russian statesmen must surely have been convinced by these determined exertions of the Allies that the surrender of Constantinople is indefinitely postponed; and the terms of the peace are so moderate, that we may reasonably calculate on its continuance. Short as the war has proved, it has been long enough to show the Turks that there are Christians who abhor the worship of images, and scarcely yield to themselves in the simplicity of their ritual: and if they had any intercourse with our soldiers, they must have seen that many, both officers and privates, adorned and recommended their religion by their conduct. While the politician is satisfied with the result, the Christian philanthropist rejoices in the imperial decree, which places all the subjects of the Sultan on an equality, and tolerates the conversion of his Mohammedan subjects; a decree which, probably, never would have been issued, had he not felt the depth of his obligations to his Christian allies. The observer of the signs of the times knows that the seed that has long been abundantly scattered over Turkey by the zealous agents of the Bible Society, has not all fallen by the wayside; but, owing mainly to American missionaries, has in many places sprung up; and that Protestant congregations have even been formed in Brusa, the original Ottoman capital, and in other places in Asia Minor, the reputed last home of Islam. The Mohammedan system is a palace of antiquated architecture, not in keeping with the neighbouring buildings, undermined and nodding to its fall. It has from the first appealed to the sword, but the sword to which it owed its rapid progress is no longer in the hands of its supporters; and while the zeal of its real adherents has cooled, a mystical pantheistic philosophy, fostered by their most admired poets, has long superseded, among the men of letters, the simple unitarianism of the Koran, while European knowledge is gradually spreading in the masses of the Moslem population which are under the authority or within reach of the influence of France and England. The Sultan may be said only to exist by their sufferance. Algeria has been for more than a quarter of a century a province of France; and we trust that from Sierra Leone a better civilization, founded not upon the Koran but the Bible, will penetrate the interior of Africa; and England is pressing more and more upon Islam in the East."

MOHARRAM, the first month of the Mohammedan year, and one of the four sacred months, both among the ancient Arabians and the modern Moslems. The ten first days of this month are reckoned peculiarly sacred, because on these days it is believed the Koran was revealed from heaven to the prophet. The Koran, in several passages, forbids war to be waged during this and the other sacred months, against such as acknowledge them to be sacred; but it grants permission, at the same time, to attack all who do not so acknowledge them. The Persian Schites devote the first days of the month Moharram to a solemn mourning, in commemoration of the death of Hossein, the son of Ali.

MOIRÆ. See FATES.

MOIRAGETES, a surname of Zeus, and also of Apollo at Delphi.

MOISASUR, the chief of the rebel angels in the system of Hinduism. His emblem is a buffalo, which is represented as pierced with a spear by the hand of Durga mounted on a lion.

MOKANNA (AL), the veiled prophet, a name given to Hakem-ben-Haschem, the founder of the Mohammedan sect, called the HAKEMITES (which see).

MOKLUDJYE, a sect of the ANSARIANS (which see).

MOLÆ, goddesses among the ancient Romans, who were said to be daughters of Mars. It has sometimes been alleged that, as their name would seem to indicate, they had some connexion with the grinding of corn.

MOLA SALSA (Lat. salted cake), a mixture of roasted barley meal and salt, which, among the ancient Romans, was in most cases strewed upon the head of an animal about to be sacrificed. Hence the name often applied to a sacrifice is an immolation from this peculiar form of consecration.

MOLHEDITES, a name applied sometimes to the sect of the ASSASSINS (which see).

MOLINISTS, the followers of Lewis Molina, a Spanish Jesuit, who published a work in the sixteenth century on the Harmony of Grace with Free-Will, in which he professed to have found out a new way of reconciling the freedom of the human will with the divine prescience. This new invention was termed scientia media, or middle knowledge. Molina taught that "free-will, without the aid of grace, can produce morally good works; that it can withstand temptation; that it can even elevate itself to this and the other acts of hope, faith, love, and repentance. When a man has advanced thus far, God then bestows grace on him on account of Christ's merits, by means of which grace he experiences the supernatural effects of sanctification; yet as before this grace had been received, so still, free-will always holds a determining place." Man thus begins a work which God afterwards continues by man's assistance. The doctrines set forth by Molina gave great offence to the Dominicans, who followed implicitly the opinions of Thomas Aquinas (see THOMISTS), and at their instigation the Jesuits, many of whom were Molinists, were charged with reviving Pelagian errors. A keen controversy arose, and Pope Clement VIII. found it necessary, in 1598, to enjoin silence on both the contending parties, declaring, at the same time, his intention to take the whole matter into serious and careful consideration, with the view of giving forth his decision. The Dominicans, however, were too impatient to allow the Pope time for deliberation, and his Holiness, therefore, overcome by the urgency of their entreaties, summoned a congregation at Rome to take cognizance of the dispute. Having carefully examined Molina's book, which had been first published at Lisbon in 1588, they thus stated the fundamental errors into which, in their view, the author had fallen:—"I. A reason or ground of God's predestination, is to be found in man's right use of his free-will. II. That the grace which God bestows to enable men to persevere in religion may become the gift of perseverance, it is necessary that they be foreseen as consenting and co-operating with the divine assistance offered them, which is a thing within their power. III. There is a mediate prescience which is neither the free nor the natural knowledge of God, and by which he knows future contingent events before he forms his decree. (Molina divided God's knowledge into natural, free, and mediate, according to the objects of it. What he himself effects or brings to pass by his own immediate power or by means of second causes, he knows naturally or has natural knowledge of; what depends on his own free-will or what he himself shall freely choose or purpose, he has a free knowledge of; but what depends on the voluntary actions of his creatures, that is, future contingencies, he does not know in either of the above ways, but only mediately by knowing all the circumstances in which these free agents will be placed, what motives will be present to their minds, and thus foreseeing and knowing how they will act. This is God's scientia media, on which he founds his decrees of election and reprobation.) IV. Predestination may be considered as either general (relating to whole classes of persons), or particular (relating to individual persons). In general predestination, there is no reason or ground of it beyond the mere good pleasure of God, or none on the part of the persons predestinated; but in particular predestination (or that of individuals), there is a cause or ground of it in the foreseen good use of free-will." The assemblies which the Pope convened on the Molinist controversy, have been called, from the principal topic of discussion, Congregations on the Aids, that is, of grace. They were engaged until the end of the century in hearing the arguments urged on both sides, the Dominicans defending the doctrines of Aquinas, and the Jesuits vindicating Molina from the charge of teaching Pelagian or at least Semi-Pelagian error. At length, after long and earnest debate, the Congregation decided in favour of the Dominicans, and against the Jesuits, condemning the opinions of Molina as opposed to Scripture and the writings of Augustin. Clement, accordingly, was about to decide against Molina, when the Jesuits, alarmed for the honour of their order, implored the Pontiff not to come to a hasty or rash decision. He was persuaded accordingly to give the cause a further hearing, which extended over three years, he himself presiding in seventy-eight sessions or congregations. At the close of this lengthened investigation, His Holiness was about to publish his decision, but was prevented from doing so, having been cut off by death on the 4th of March 1605. Clement was succeeded by Paul V., who ordered the Congregations to resume their inquiries into this knotty theological controversy, but after spending several months in anxious deliberation, no decision was come to on the subject, each party being left free to retain its own sentiments.

MOLLAI, a doctor of the law among the Mohammedans. He is a spiritual as well as civil officer among the Turks, being a superior judge in civil and criminal causes.

MOLOCH, the chief god of the Ammonites, to whom human sacrifices are alleged to have been offered. In various passages of the Law of Moses, the Israelites were forbidden to dedicate their children to this deity, by causing them to "pass through the fire," an expression the precise meaning of which is somewhat doubtful. See FIRE (PASSING THROUGH THE). Moloch, which signifies in Hebrew a king, is thought to have represented the sun. He was worshipped under the form of a calf or an ox. His image was hollow, and was provided with seven receptacles, in which were deposited the different offerings of the worshippers. Into the first was put an offering of fine flour; into the second an offering of turtle-doves; into the third a sheep; into the fourth a ram; into the fifth a calf; into the sixth an ox; and into the seventh a child, which was consumed in the image. The children were wont to be sacrificed to Moloch in a valley near Jerusalem, called the valley of the sons of Hinnom, which, on account of the sound of drums and cymbals by which the cries of the children were drowned, received also the name of the Vale of Tophet. It has been conjectured, and not without reason, that Saturn and Moloch were the same deity. The Jewish Rabbis assert the image of Moloch to have been made of brass, and to have been represented sitting on a brassen throne, adorned with a royal crown, having the head of a calf, and his arms extended to receive the youthful victims. In Lev. xx. 2, we find the express command, "Again, thou shalt say to the children of Israel, Whosoever he be of the children of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn in Israel, that giveth any of his seed unto Molech; he shall surely be put to death: the people of the land shall stone him with stones." On this passage, Michaelis, in his 'Commentaries on the Laws of Moses,' thus remarks: "These are not the terms in which Moses usually speaks of the punishment of stoning judicially inflicted; but 'all the people shall stone him; the hands of the witnesses shall be the first upon him.' Besides what follows a little after, in verses 4 and 5, does not appear to me as indicative of anything like a matter of judicial procedure: 'If the neighbours shut their eyes, and will not see him giving his children to Moloch, nor put him to death, God himself will be the avenger of his crime. I am therefore of opinion, that in regard to this most extraordinary and most unnatural crime, which, however, could not be perpetrated in perfect secrecy, Moses meant to give an extraordinary injunction, and to let it be understood, that whenever a parent was about to sacrifice his child, the first person who observed him was to hasten to its help, and the people around were instantly to meet, and to stone the unnatural monster to death. In fact, no crime so justly authorizes extra-judicial vengeance, as this horrible cruelty perpetrated on a helpless child, in the discovery of which we are always sure to have either the lifeless victim as a proof, or else the living testimony of a witness who is beyond all suspicion; and where the mania of human sacrifices prevailed to such a pitch as among the Canaanites, and got so completely the better of all the feelings of nature, it was necessary to counteract its effects by a measure equally extraordinary and summary."

Another peculiarity in the worship of Moloch is termed the taking up of the tabernacle of Moloch, which was practised by carrying in procession images of the deity in tabernacles or portable tents, probably in imitation of the practice followed by the Israelites of carrying the tabernacle of Moses in their journeyings through the wilderness. It seems to have been also customary among the heathen to consecrate chariots and horses to Moloch. From certain passages of Scripture this god would seem to be identical with Baal. Thus Jer. xxxii. 35, "And they built the high places of Baal, which are in the valley of the son of Hinnom, to cause their sons and their daughters to pass through the fire unto Molech; which I commanded them not, neither came it into my mind, that they should do this abomination, to cause Judah to sin." Moloch is also supposed to be the same with Adrammelech and Anammelech, gods of Sepharvaim. He is sometimes called Milcom in the Old Testament.

MOLTEN SEA. See LAVER.

MOLUNGO, the name given to the Supreme Being by some of the tribes of Central Africa.

MOLYBDOMANCY (Gr. molybdos, lead, and manteia, divination), a species of divination among the ancient heathen, in which they drew conjectures concerning future events from the motions and figures presented by melted lead.

MOMIERS, a term applied in derision to those warm supporters of evangelical doctrine who arose about forty years ago in the bosom of the Church of Geneva. These godly men no sooner began to call upon the church to shake off the spiritual lethargy and indifference by which it had so long been overcome, than they forthwith were exposed to violent persecution on the part of the clergy. But the more bitterly the Momiers were opposed, the more did they increase in numbers and grow in zeal. They were ere long joined by some earnest ministers of the national church, who were in consequence expelled from the church, and even visited with the vengeance of the civil authorities. The ejected ministers retired to other countries, and waited till the storm should abate. A few remained behind and continued to preach in private dwellings. Meetings for mutual encouragement and prayer were held by these pious and simple-minded people in one another's houses. "Within the space of three or four years," says Mr. Carne in his Letters from Switzerland and Italy, "since these sentiments were first stated and discussed at Lausanne, they have been diffused far and wide, in village and hamlet, as well as town; even the juge de pays, as well as the merchant, have declared their adherence. In more than one situation, the people are able to maintain the minister who visits them; not a week elapses in the chief towns of the canton de Vaud without several assemblies in private.

"The minister's arrival at the place from his own residence is carefully kept a secret from all but the members. The large room is well lighted, (for it is night,) while the assembly of both sexes, the men ranged on one side, and the women on the other, sit in silence. He enters at last, to their great joy; an inspiring hymn is sung, and he commences an animating and impassioned discourse, quite extemporaneous, and addressed chiefly to the feelings of his audience.

"When will governments both civil and ecclesiastical learn wisdom? How strange, after the experience of ages, that the Swiss authorities should not have better understood the human mind and character, than to think that menaces and imprisonment could stifle religious enthusiasm. They have proved, in this instance, the cradle from which it has sprung forth with new and unconquerable vigour. This cause is not like the transient and vehement system of the celebrated Krudener, who was also expelled the cantons a few years since, for promulgating her wild sentiments. She was too lofty and refined a visionary to seize on the feelings of the common people, who could not enter into her mysticism, or share in her transports. The effect she produced was short-lived, and her cause faded away for want of zealous supporters. But this system of the Momiers, though perfectly simple, is concentrated and strong, and bears with it the very elements of success and victory. No lofty or peculiar revelations are claimed; no member is exalted high above the rest for surprise or imitation; but the minister and the poorest of the people, the avocat and the paysan, the lady and the washerwoman, all meet alike on the same kindred soil, drink of the same fountain of inspiration on a footing of perfect equality, speak of their hopes, fears, and triumphs with mutual sympathy and mutual kindness. All feel that they are embarked on the same troubled but exciting course, that the same tide wafts them onward for good or for ill: for the system is a purely spiritual one, and also an eminently social one.

"The interests of the society are admirably served by the private and earnest visits of the female members to families and individuals. They enter with an air of perfect simplicity, and being seated, commence a touching and earnest address on the subject of their best and highest interest. Two or three of their books and pamphlets are not forgotten, and are placed in the hand of the hearers. They have already their own hymn books; many of the pieces are of original composition, and do no discredit to the genius of the composer: and treatises also, explanatory of their sentiments touching on the darkness that shrouds too much of the land, the supineness that lulls the spirits of its people, and so on. No Quaker, however, can be more unassuming or persevering than these female disciples, whom the rest of the natives call Quixotes, and regard with dislike; but if success is the test of a good cause, they have it, and will reap it in future years still more abundantly."

The origin of the Momiers, as the Evangelical pastors and laymen in Geneva, and the Canton de Vaud generally, are called, is to be traced primarily to the wide diffusion of the Holy Scriptures through the active operations of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and in an eminent degree also to the labours of the Rev. Cæsar Malan, and the instructions of the devoted Robert Haldane. At the commencement of his ministry, Mr. Malan seems to have had very dark and imperfect views of gospel truth, but towards the close of the year 1815, his mind underwent a serious and saving change, and his heart burned with fervent desire to bring others to participate in the precious blessings of salvation through a crucified Redeemer. The ministers of the Church of Geneva were at that time almost all of them strangers to evangelical doctrine, and the zeal which Mr. Malan manifested in proclaiming the glad tidings which had brought peace to his soul, roused against him a spirit of active persecution, which at length in 1818 deprived him of his pastoral charge, and drove him into the ranks of dissent. It was about this time that Robert Haldane was led in the course of Providence to visit Geneva. The heart of the good man was deeply grieved at the ignorance of evangelical truth which prevailed even among those whose views were directed towards the sacred ministry. Accordingly, he spent the winter of 1816-17 in instructing a class of theological students in the peculiar doctrines of Christianity; and so remarkably did the Divine blessing accompany the labours of Mr. Haldane, that of the eighteen students of which his class was composed, no fewer than sixteen were savingly converted, one of them being Merle d'Aubigné, who has since attained world-wide distinction as the historian of the Reformation; and another, the able and pious Gausson, the now celebrated author of the 'Theopneustia.' Thus there arose in Geneva a goodly band of devout and faithful men, whose great aim was to awaken a spirit of vital godliness all around them. An evident blessing rested upon their labours, and the venerable company of Genevan pastors, jealous of the growing influence of the Momiers, threw every possible obstacle in their way, requiring them, under pain of expulsion from the church, to confine their teaching to the doctrines contained in the mutilated Catechism of the Genevan Church. The contest was carried on for a time, but at length matters came to a crisis, and "The Evangelical Society of Geneva" was instituted, not only to protect the cause of evangelical truth, and to proclaim it from the pulpit, but by means of a theological seminary to train up a rising ministry in the pure doctrine of the New Testament. Thus by the zealous efforts of the despised and persecuted Momiers was formed in 1831 a Society, which has been eminently instrumental in reviving spiritual religion, not only in the city of Geneva, but throughout the neighbouring cantons. In the Canton de Vaud, on the opposite side of the Lake of Geneva, a similar society was formed, which has been productive of great benefit to the cause of evangelical truth in Switzerland. See VAUDOIS CHURCH.

MOMUS, a deity among the ancient Greeks who was a personification of jesting and mockery. He is described as the son of Nyx, and to have employed himself chiefly in ridiculing the other gods.

MONACHISM. The monastic spirit has been generally regarded as having had its origin among the early Christians. This view of the subject, however, is far from being accurate; the fact being notorious to all who are acquainted with ecclesiastical history, that nearly a century and a-half before the Christian era, the principle of Monachism had begun to make its appearance in Syria. During the administration of John Hyrcanus arose the Jewish sect of the ESSENES (which see), having as the avowed object of their institution the attainment of superior sanctity by a life of seclusion and austerity, and for this purpose they formed a settlement in a desolate tract of country stretching along the western shores of the Dead Sea. In their habits, principles, and rigorous discipline, as well as in the internal arrangements of their communities, the Essenes of Judea bore a striking resemblance to the monks of after times. It is not improbable, indeed, that the previous existence of Essenism led to the establishment of monastic institutions; these having arisen at a time when Christianity had not yet entirely dissevered itself from the principles and the practice of Judaism.

The earliest form in which the monastic spirit developed itself in the Christian church, was not in the formation of societies or communities of recluses, but merely and for a considerable length of time in the seclusion of single individuals. (See ASCETICS.) It was not, indeed, till about the middle or towards the close of the third century, that Monachism, properly so called, came into operation, the habits of the primitive Ascetics having, at this period, passed into those which characterized the Monasties of subsequent ages. The earliest instance, in the history of the Christian church, of the adoption of a monastic life, was that of Paul, an Egyptian Christian, who was driven by the fury of the Decian persecution to take up his residence in the desert of Thebais. Here, it is alleged, in a mountain cave, far from the abodes of men, he spent upwards of ninety years, supporting himself wholly, as Jerome informs us, by the labour of his hands. The fruit of the palm was his only food, and a garment constructed of palm leaves his only covering.

Another recluse of Thebais was the celebrated Anthony, who, though not the first in order of time who became a monk, is, nevertheless, generally regarded, from the weight of his influence and example, as the founder of the monastic order. The influence of Anthony was chiefly exerted in prescribing a more uniform mode of life to the numerous recluses who now thronged the deserts of Eastern Africa. Hitherto no communities of monks had been formed; but the example of Paul and Anthony had been followed by numerous individuals, even of rank and wealth, who voluntarily adopted a life of seclusion and retirement from the world. Of these, one of the most distinguished and influential was Hilarion, who is said by Jerome to have been the first who practised the monastic life in Syria and Palestine. But with the increase of its votaries, Monachism became liable to various errors and abuses, not the least of which was the infliction of many self-imposed and unwarrantable austerities. "Hitherto," says the Rev. R. K. Hamilton, "a submission to the ordinary privations of nature, and a denial of the more superfluous comforts of life, were all that had distinguished the practice of the Anchorites. But now the recluses seemed to vie with each other in the extent to which they could carry their ingenuity in devising new modes of self-torture, and their powers of endurance in submitting to them. To subsist on the coarsest and most unwholesome diet, to abstain from food and sleep till nature was almost wholly exhausted,—to repose uncovered on the bare and humid ground,—to live in nakedness, in filth, in suffering,—to shun all intercourse even with the nearest relatives and connexions; in a word, to adopt the means most directly calculated to stifle the charities and sympathies of social and domestic life, and to transform that beneficent religion, which was designed for the happiness of mankind, into an engine of punishment and self-torment; these were the objects, the attainment of which now constituted the first ambition of the recluse. Of the truth of these assertions many instances might be adduced. Socrates mentions an Egyptian, named Macarius, who, for twenty years, weighed every morsel of bread, and measured every drop of water that he swallowed, and whose place of rest was so formed, that he could not enjoy repose for more than a few moments at a time. Marianus Scotus tells us of another solitary, named Martin, who, from the time of his retirement to the desert until the period of his death, kept himself constantly chained by the foot to a huge stone, so as to prevent him ever moving beyond the narrow circle he was thus enabled to describe. In Sozomen we read of a still more disgusting fanatic, who abstained, to such an extent, from food, that vermin were engendered in his mouth."

Another evil which early began to connect itself with the monastic system, was the spiritual pride which was engendered by the flattery of the world, which regarded the monk as necessarily invested with peculiar sanctity. The hermit's cell was eagerly resorted to by the noble, the learned, the devout, all desirous to pay homage to the holy man. The monastic life came to be held in such esteem, that many adopted it as a highly honourable employment. Instead, therefore, of single individuals resorting to the solitude of the desert, communities of such recluses began to be formed, and the rules laid down by Anthony for the guidance of single monks came to be applied to the administration of these monastic institutions. Thus the monachism of the cloister was substituted for the monachism of the cell. At first, however, the monastery consisted of an assemblage of wattle huts, or similar rude dwellings, arranged in a certain order, and in some cases encircled by a wall surrounding the whole extent of the community. These primitive monasteries were termed Laure. By the consent of antiquity the formation of the first regular monastery or cenobium is ascribed to Pachomius, an Egyptian monk. He is also said to have been the originator of conventual establishments for females.

Until nearly the close of the fifth century the monks were regarded simply as laymen, and laid no claim to be ranked among the sacerdotal order. Circumstances, however, in course of time, led the monks to assume a clerical character. "The new order," says Mr. Riddle, in his 'History of the Papacy,' "had this in common with the clergy, that they were specially engaged in the cultivation of spiritual life, and many of its members began to occupy themselves with the work of reading and expounding the Scriptures,—an occupation which, together with their austere mode of life, being supposed to indicate superior sanctity and virtue, gave them great favour with the multitude, and speedily acquired for them such popularity and influence that the clergy could not but find in them either powerful allies or formidable rivals. When they began to form large and regular establishments, it was needful that some members of their body should be ordained, in order to secure the regular performance of Divine worship; and, at length, not only was it usual for many members of a monastery to be in holy orders, but they frequently exercised their clerical functions beyond the confines of their establishments. At the same time, monasteries were placed under the superintendence of the bishops; and, eventually, not only were the monks for the most part in holy orders, but it came to be regarded as an advantage for the clergy to possess the additional character of monastics. Thus these two orders were, to a great extent, identified, at least in popular apprehension; and the result was, that a large portion of the influence and popularity of the monks was reflected upon the clergy."

The abbots, by whom the monasteries were governed, soon became jealous of their spiritual superiors, the bishops, and out of their mutual jealousies sprang frequent quarrels, until at length the abbots, to deliver themselves from dependence upon their rivals, made earnest application to be taken under the protection of the Pope at Rome. The proposal was gladly accepted, and very quickly all the monasteries, great and small, abbeys, priories, and nunneries, were taken from under the jurisdiction of the bishops, and subjected to the authority of the see of Rome. This event was the source of a great accession to the pontifical power, establishing in almost every quarter a kind of spiritual police, who acted as spies on the bishops as well as on the secular authorities. The complete exemption of monasteries from diocesan jurisdiction did not take place until the eighth century. About this period an attempt was made, by the institution of the Canonical Life, to convert the whole body of the clergy into a monastic order. All the clergy of a particular church or locality were collected together in one house, where they resided, subject to special regulations as to diet, occupations, devotions, and the like. The houses of the clergy who thus lived in community were called monasteries; the regular clergy adopted a uniform dress, and lived together under the superintendence of provosts and deans. Such a system, which soon became prevalent throughout the West, was introduced about A. D. 760 by Chrodegang, bishop of Metz. Before the middle of the ninth century, it became the rule of all the churches of Germany, France, and Italy; and was authorized by the State in all countries belonging to the Frankish monarchy.

The abuses to which the Monastic system gave rise came to a height towards the end of the ninth and the beginning of the tenth century. All discipline had disappeared from the monasteries, and they had become hotbeds of profligacy and vice. Such flagrant enormities demanded a reformation of monastic institutions in general. At this crisis in the history of Monachism, was established the monastery of Clugny, which, from the regularity and order of all its arrangements, was soon recognized as a model institute, and formed the centre of a work of reformation which spread rapidly throughout the monasteries in every part of Europe. Public opinion now declared loudly in favour of the life of a monk; large sums were dedicated to the support of monastic establishments, and children were devoted by their parents to the conventual life. Many monasteries sought to associate themselves with Clugny, that they might share in its prestige, and in the benefits arising from its reformed discipline.

In the beginning of the thirteenth century Monachism received a powerful impulse from the establishment of the Mendicant orders. The two leading societies, founded on the principle of renouncing all worldly wealth, and subsisting exclusively on alms, were the Franciscans in Italy, and the Dominicans in France. This new movement was at its outset viewed with coldness by the Papal court, but in the course of a few years both orders were confirmed by the authority of the See of Rome. And assuredly no monastic establishments were better fitted to recommend themselves to public favour than those of the Mendicants. Their numbers rapidly increased, and besides the regular members of their societies, both the Franciscans and the Dominicans adopted into connection with them a class of laymen under the name of Tertiaries, who, without taking the monastic vow, pledged themselves to promote the interests of the order to which they were attached. Thus the influence of the Mendicants became widely diffused.

As we have already seen, the monastery of Clugny had become the centre of a large number of associated monasteries, which gradually spread over all Europe. The Benedictine order was monarchical, the abbot of Clugny being the absolute master and head of all the monasteries. The Cistercian order, however, was founded on a different principle, the abbots of the subordinate monasteries being invested with a share in the government of the whole body, and having a chief part in the election of the abbot of Cîteaux. The essential features of the Cistercian institution were adopted by the new order of spiritual knights, as well as by the Carthusians, the Premonstratensians, and other later orders. Innocent III., in the Lateran council A. D. 1215, decreed that each of those orders should hold a chapter once in every three years like the Cistercians. These orders of monks were for a time supported to a great extent by voluntary contributions; but they soon got into their hands large portions of church property.

Monachism had now become a powerful institution. "The abbots," says Mr. Riddle, "especially the great abbots of Clugny and Cîteaux, and the generals of the Dominican and Franciscan orders, soon became formidable to the bishops, whom, in fact, they greatly exceeded in power; and they stood in close connection with the Pope, who often employed them as his legates in matters of importance. The monastic orders were, indeed, the natural allies of the papacy, and were always ready to assist it in carrying out any of its pretensions which did not interfere with their own interest. The popes gave the monks protection against all opponents or rivals; and they received in return not only a portion of revenue from the monasteries, but, what was of far greater importance, zealous friends to advocate the cause and uphold the interests of the papacy all over Europe. Great privileges were, therefore, accorded to the monks. Sometimes their property was declared exempt from the payment of tithes; sometimes their churches declared to be beyond the reach of an interdict which might be imposed upon the whole province in which they were situate; and they were generally made independent of episcopal jurisdiction. By degrees, however, the popes became disposed to be more sparing in the grants of such privileges and exemptions; and hence arose a practice of forging documents professing to contain such grants from earlier pontiffs. The monastery of St. Medard, at Soissons, became famous as a source from whence such forged documents were liberally supplied; and this practice had become so notorious by the beginning of the thirteenth century, that from that time there was comparatively little opportunity of making use of it."

The Monastic orders having become both important and powerful, rapidly multiplied; and the most serious results were likely to arise. But Gregory X., with a view to check the growing evil, issued a decree prohibiting all the orders which had originated since the time of Innocent III., and in particular he reduced the Mendicants to four orders—the Dominicans, Franciscans, Carmelites, and Augustinian friars. These four classes of begging monks wandered over all Europe, instructing the people both old and young, and exhibiting such an aspect of sanctity and self-denial, that they speedily became objects of universal admiration. Their churches were crowded, while those of the regular parish priests were almost wholly deserted; all classes sought to receive the sacraments at their hands; their advice was eagerly courted in secular business, and even in the most intricate political affairs; so that in the thirteenth and two following centuries, the Mendicant Orders generally, but more especially the Dominicans and Franciscans, were intrusted with the management of all matters both in church and state. See MENDICANT ORDERS.

The high estimation, however, into which Monachism had risen, more particularly through the widespread influence of the begging friars, awakened a spirit of bitter hostility in all orders of the clergy, and in the universities. In England the University of Oxford, and in France the University of Paris, laboured to overthrow the now overgrown power of the Mendicants. These exertions were most effectually seconded by the labours of Wycliffe and the Lollards. And this hatred against the Mendicants was not a little increased by the persecution which raged against the Beghards in Germany and the Low Countries. The monks, like a swarm of locusts, covered all Europe, proclaiming everywhere the obedience due to holy mother church, the reverence due to the saints, and more especially to the Virgin Mary; the efficacy of relics, the torments of purgatory, and the blessed advantages arising from indulgences. These were emphatically the Dark Ages, when the minds of men were enveloped in the thick darkness of ignorance and superstition.

It was at this point in the history of Monachism that the light of the blessed Reformation burst upon the world. The profligacy and deep-seated corruption of the monastic institutions had now reached its height, and the flagrant absurdity of the dogma of papal indulgences was so apparent to every intelligent and thoughtful mind, that the protest of the Reformers met with a cordial response in the breasts of multitudes, whose attachment to the Church of Rome was warm and almost inextinguishable. And yet although the monks had forced on the keen and unsuccessful contest which the church was called to maintain with Luther, yet, so infatuated was the Papacy, that she still cleaved to Monachism, as most likely to subserve her interests at this eventful crisis. No dependence, it was plain, could any longer be placed on the Mendicants, who had irrecoverably lost the reputation and influence which they once possessed. A new order was necessary to meet the peculiar circumstances in which the church was now placed, and such was found in the Society of Jesus founded by Ignatius Loyola. See JESUITS. These monks were specially adapted to the altered state of things. They occupied a sort of intermediate place between the monastics of other days and the secular clergy. Instead of spending their time in devotion and penance and fasting, they gave themselves up in a thousand ways to the active service of the church. One of the chief objects of the order was to prevent the growth of dissent, and to reclaim the heretics who had left its communion in such overwhelming numbers. In this active and indefatigable Order, the Roman pontiffs found a most efficient auxiliary in the accomplishment of their plans. The Jesuits soon became a formidable power in the interests of Romanism, possessed alike of wealth, learning, and reputation. All the other orders of monks dwindled into insignificance before this Society, which extended itself by a thousand ramifications, not only over Europe, but the whole field of Christendom.

In the beginning of the seventeenth century, the state of the monasteries generally was very lamentable. As the century advanced, however, the attention of many was turned towards the necessity of reform in this respect, with the view of bringing back these institutions as far as possible to the rules and laws of their order. In consequence of the movement which originated about this time, the monks of the Romish church became divided into two classes, the Reformed and the Unreformed. But the order which drew forth the most determined opposition from all the other orders was that of the Jesuits. And not only were the members of the Order of Loyola obnoxious to the monks and clergy, but the different governments of the European nations also viewed them with such jealousy, that one after another expelled them from their dominions. The theological sentiments of the Order, though avowedly founded on those of Thomas Aquinas, were thoroughly Pelagian, and, therefore, opposed to the writings of Augustin, which have always been held in the highest estimation in the Church of Rome. Zeal for the Augustinian doctrines of grace gave rise to the JANSENISTS (which see), who entered into a keen and protracted controversy with the Jesuits, which raged throughout the seventeenth and part of the eighteenth century, until the followers of Jansenius, though victorious in argument, were vanquished and overthrown by the violence of persecution. Carnal weapons, not spiritual, terminated the contest, and drove the Jansenists to seek refuge in Utrecht in Holland, where the small but faithful church still adheres to her protest against the Pelagian doctrines taught by the Church of Rome.

MONAD THEORY. See LEIBNITZ (PHILOSOPHY OF).

MONARCHIANS (monos, only, and archo, to rule), a Christian sect which arose in the second century, and as its name imports, maintained that there is no other Divine Being besides one God, the Father. Among the ancient heathen nations we find men, even while holding a polytheistic creed, tracing all their deities up to one principle or arché. In the same way the Christian sect under consideration, founded by Praxeas, appears to have been afraid of seeming to admit the existence of a variety of original principles. Dr. Lardner says, that they held the Logos to be "the wisdom, will, power or voice of God;" that Jesus was the Son of God by the Virgin Mary, and that "the Father dwelt in him," whereby a union was formed between the Deity and the man Christ Jesus. Neander alleges, that the Monarchians must be distinguished into two classes. The one, professing to be guided by reason, taught that "Jesus was a man like all other men; but that from the first he was actuated and guided by that power of God, the divine reason or wisdom bestowed on him in larger measure than on any other messenger or prophet of God; and that it was precisely on this account he was to be called the Son of God." The other "regarded the names, Father and Son, as only two different modes of designating the same subject, the one God." The first class saw in Christ nothing but the man; the second saw in him nothing but the God.

A Monarchian party appeared in Rome, headed by one Theodotus, a leather-dresser from Byzantium, who, on account of his heretical opinions, was excommunicated by Victor the Roman bishop. The party continued to propagate their opinions independently of the dominant church. Another Monarchian party was founded in Rome by Artemon, and hence they received the name of ARTEMONITES (which see). They seem to have disclaimed all connexion with Theodotus and his followers. They continued to diffuse their opinions in Rome until far into the third century. A third class of Monarchians originated with Praxeas, a native of Asia Minor, and from the doctrine which they held, that the Father was identical with the Son in all respects, and, therefore, that the Father may be said to have suffered on the cross as well as Christ Jesus the Son, they were called PATRIPASSIANS (which see).

One of the most violent opponents of the Monarchians was Origen, who succeeded in so ably refuting their opinions, that they found it necessary to devise a new theory concerning the person of Christ, which aimed to strike a middle course between those who dwelt almost exclusively on his humanity, and those who dwelt almost exclusively on his divinity. This modified Monarchian view is thus described by Neander: "It was not the whole infinite essence of God the Father which dwelt in him, but a certain efflux from the divine essence; and a certain influx of the same into human nature was what constituted the personality of Christ. It was not before his temporal appearance, but only subsequently thereto, that he subsisted as a distinct person beside the Father. This personality originated in the hypostatizing of a divine power. It was not proper to suppose here, as the first class of Monarchians taught, a distinct human person like one of the prophets, placed from the beginning under a special divine influence; but this personality was itself something specifically divine, produced by a new creative communication of God to human nature, by such a letting down of the divine essence into the precincts of that nature. Hence in Christ the divine and the human are united together; hence he is the Son of God in a sense in which no other being is. As notions derived from the theory of emanation were in this period still widely diffused; as, even the church mode of apprehending the incarnation of the Logos, the doctrine of a reasonable human soul in Christ was still but imperfectly unfolded (it being by Origen's means, that this doctrine was first introduced into the general theological consciousness of the Eastern Church);—so, under these circumstances a theory which thus substituted the divine, which the Father communicated from his own essence, in place of the human soul in Christ, could gain the easier admittance. If we transport ourselves back into the midst of the process whereby the doctrines of Christianity were becoming unfolded in consciousness, into the conflict of opposite opinions in this period, we shall find it very easy to understand how a modified theory of this sort came to be formed."

The first who taught this modified Monarchianism was Beryllus, bishop of Bostra, in Arabia, from whom the adherents of the middle doctrine were called BERYLLIANS (which see). Another, who followed in the track of Beryllus, was Sabellius of Pentapolis in Africa, who maintained that the names Father, Son, and Holy Ghost were simply designations of three different phases under which the one divine essence reveals itself. (See SABELLIANS.) Soon after, Monarchianism was revived by Paul of Samosata, who gave prominence to Christ's human person alone, the Divine appearing only as something which supervenes from without. (See SAMOSATENIANS.)

MONARCHY MEN (FIFTU). See FIFTU MONARCHY MEN.

MONASTERY, a house built for the reception of monks, mendicant friars, and nuns. It consisted originally of an assemblage of connected buildings, in which monks dwelt together under a common superior. See CENOBITES.

MONETA, a surname of Juno among the ancient Romans, as presiding over money, and under this appellation she had a temple on the Capitoline hill. A festival in honour of this goddess was celebrated on the 1st of June.

MONIALES. See NUNS.

MONITORY, a command which the Church of Rome lays upon all her members to discover whatever they know of any important matter with which it is desirable that she should be acquainted. If the monitory is not complied with, excommunication ensues.

MONKEY-WORSHIP. See APE WORSHIP.

MONKS. See MONACHISM.

MONECUS, a surname of Heracles, probably because, in the temples dedicated to him, no other deity was worshipped along with him.

MONOISM (Gr. monos, alone), that system of philosophico-theological doctrine which holds that there is one infinite primordial substance from which all others emanate. This in all the Gnostic systems is something invisible, the Unknown Father, the Abyss or Bythos. This is, in the language of modern philosophy, the ground of being, the substance, incomprehensible in itself, which is concealed under what appears. The Monoistic view characterized the Alexandrian, just as the Dualistic characterized the Syrian Gnosis. "As Monoism," says Neander, "contradicts what every man should know immediately—the laws and facts of his moral consciousness; so Dualism contradicts the essence of reason which demands unity. Monoism, shrinking from itself, leads to Dualism; and Dualism, springing from the desire to comprehend everything, is forced by its very striving after this, through the constraint of reason, which demands unity, to refer back the duality to a prior unity, and resolve it into this latter. Thus was the Gnosis forced out of its Dualism, and obliged to affirm the same which the Cabbala and New Platonism taught; namely, that matter is nothing else than the necessary bounds between being and not being, which can be conceived as having a subsistence for itself only by abstraction—as the opposite to existence, which, in case of an evolution of life from God, must arise as its necessary limitation. In some such way, this Dualism could resolve itself into an absolute Monoism, and so into Pantheism." See DUALISM, GNOSTICS.

MONOPHYSITES (Gr. monos, one only, and physis, nature), a large body of Christians which arose in the fifth century, denying the distinction of the two natures in Christ, under the idea that the human was completely lost and absorbed in the Divine nature. Under the general name of Monophysites are comprehended the four main branches of separatists from the Eastern church, namely, the Syrian Jacobites, the Copts, the Abyssinians, and the Armenians. The originator of this numerous and powerful Christian community was Eutyches, abbot of a convent of monks at Constantinople, who, in his anxiety to put down the Nestorian heresy, which kept the two natures almost entirely distinct, rushed into the opposite extreme, and taught that there was only one nature in Christ, that is the Divine. He held, in common with his opponents, the perfect correctness of the Nicene creed, the doctrine of a trinity of persons in the Godhead; that the Word was made flesh; that Christ was truly God and truly man united, and that after the union of the two natures, he was one Person. But Eutyches maintained, that the two natures of Christ, after the union, did not remain two distinct natures, but constituted one nature; and, therefore, that it was correct to say Christ was constituted of or from two distinct natures, but not that he existed in two natures; for the union of two natures was such, that, although neither of them was lost, or was essentially changed, yet together they constituted one nature, of which compound nature, and not of either of the original natures alone, must thenceforth be predicated each and every property of both natures. He, accordingly, denied that it is correct to say of Christ, that as to his human nature he was of the same nature with us. On the ground of his heretical views, Eutyches was excommunicated by an occasional council held for other purposes at Constantinople; and against this sentence he appealed to a general council of the whole church. Such a council, accordingly, was convened by the Emperor Theodosius at Ephesus, A. D. 449; and it was presided over by Dioscorus, bishop of Alexandria, who, holding the same opinions as Eutyches himself, so managed matters that Eutyches was acquitted of the charge of heresy, and by acclamation the doctrine of two natures in the incarnate Word was condemned. This council of Ephesus is disowned by the Greek church, and stigmatized as an assembly of robbers, all its proceedings having been conducted, as they allege, by fraud and violence. Various unsuccessful attempts were made to persuade Theodosius to call a general council with the view of settling the important question raised by the Nestorians on the one hand, and the Eutychians on the other; but on the death of this emperor, his successor, Marcian, summoned a new council at Chalcedon, A. D. 451, which is called the fourth general council. This is the last of the four great œcumenical councils whose decrees, on the fundamental doctrines of the Trinity and the Person of Christ, are universally received, not merely by the Greek and Roman churches, but by Protestant churches, on the ground that they are in harmony with the statements of Holy Scripture. At this famous council, a decree was passed, which, after recognizing the Nicene and Constantinopolitan creeds, goes on to declare, "Following, therefore, these holy fathers, we unitedly declare, that one and the same Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, is to be acknowledged as being perfect in his Godhead and perfect in his humanity; truly God and truly man, with a rational soul and body; of the same essence with the Father as to his Godhead; and of the same essence with us as to his manhood; in all things like us, sin excepted; begotten of the Father from all eternity as to his Godhead; and of Mary, the mother of God, in these last days, for us and for our salvation as to his manhood; recognized as one Christ, Son, Lord, Only-begotten; of two natures, unconfounded, unchanged, undivided, inseparable: the distinction of natures, not all done away by the union, but rather the peculiarity of each nature preserved and combining into one substance; not separated or divided into two persons, but one Son, Only-begotten God, the Word, the Lord Jesus Christ; as the prophets before taught concerning him, so he the Lord Jesus Christ hath taught us, and the creed of the Fathers hath transmitted to us."

From the period when this decree was passed by the council of Chalcedon, the Eutychians gradually departed from the peculiar views of Eutyches, and therefore laid aside the name which they had derived from him, and assumed the more appropriate designation of Monophysites, which indicated their distinguishing tenet, that the two natures of Christ were so united as to constitute one nature. The controversies which ensued were attended with the most disastrous results to the Oriental church. At first the contest raged in Egypt and Palestine, but soon extended far and wide over the whole of the East. To settle the manifold dissensions which were disturbing both church and state, the Emperor Zeno, A. D. 482, offered to the contending parties the formula of concord, known by the name of the Henoticon, in which he fully recognized the doctrines of the council of Chalcedon, without alluding at all to that body; and affirming that these doctrines were embraced by the members of the true church, he called upon all Christians to unite on this sole basis, and "anathematizes every person who has thought or thinks otherwise, either now or at any other time, whether at Chalcedon, or in any other synod whatever, but more especially the aforesaid persons, Nestorius, and such as embrace their sentiments." In Egypt the Henoticon was extensively adopted, but the bishops of Rome were opposed to it, and had sufficient influence to render it generally inefficient.

Among those who subscribed this formula of concord was Peter Moggus, bishop of Alexandria, whose conduct in doing so roused a considerable part of the Monophysites, who had hitherto acknowledged him as their leader and head, to renounce him altogether in that capacity, thus acquiring for themselves the name of ACEPHALI (which see). To this zealous party of the Monophysites, the Emperor Justinian was violently opposed, and published what is known as Justinian's creed, in which he defined the Catholic faith as established by the first four general councils—those of Nice, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon, and condemned the opposite errors. This document, instead of settling the controversy, only agitated the church still more severely, and the emperor found it necessary to refer the matter to a general council. He accordingly assembled what is called the fifth general council at Constantinople, in the year 553, which was attended almost exclusively by Eastern bishops, who gave their sanction to the views of the emperor. Vigilius, the Roman pontiff, refused to assent to the decrees of this council, and was in consequence banished; nor was he allowed to return from exile until he yielded to the wishes of the emperor. Pelagius and the subsequent Roman pontiffs accepted these decrees; but neither popes nor emperors could prevail upon many of the Western bishops to give their sanction to the decrees of a council in which they had taken no part, and which seemed at once to attack the authority of the council of Chalcedon, and to favour the Monophysites. On this account the churches of Istria, and several other churches of the West, renounced the fellowship of the Roman church.

The Emperor Justinian, towards the end of his reign, carried his support of the Monophysite party to a height by extending his favour to the APHTHARTODOCITES (which see), more especially as he was strongly inclined to favour the most extravagant expressions, provided they indicated that the human attributes of Christ were entirely absorbed in the Divine. But while preparing, by another edict, to make this new form of Monophysite doctrine a law, the evils which were thus threatening the whole Oriental church were suddenly averted by the death of the emperor A. D. 565.

Throughout his whole life Justinian had used his utmost efforts to reunite the Monophysites with the Catholic church, but so far was he from being successful in these attempts, that the breach was every day becoming wider; and the later dominion of the Arabians, who particularly favoured the Monophysites, rendered the breach incurable. In Egypt they had made an open separation from the Catholic church, and chosen another patriarch. To this day they continue under the name of the Coptic church, with which the Ethiopian church has always been connected. The Christians in Armenia also adopted Monophysite opinions, which they still retain, and are only separated from the other Monophysite churches by peculiar customs, the most remarkable of which are their use of unmixed wine at the Lord's Supper, and their observance of the day of Epiphany as the festival of the birth and baptism of Jesus. In Syria and Mesopotamia, on the other hand, the Monophysites had nearly become extinct by persecution towards the close of the sixth century, when Jacob Baradaens revived their churches, and supplied them with pastors. Hence it was that from this date the Syrian Monophysites received the name of the JACOBITE CHURCH (which see), while the term Jacobites was sometimes applied to the whole Monophysite party.

MONOTHEISTS (Gr. monos, one only, and theos, God), those who believe in one only God, as opposed to Polytheists, who acknowledge a plurality of gods. In all the different mythologies of the various nations on the face of the earth, we find, amid their numberless gods and goddesses with which they people heaven, earth, and air, an invariable recognition of one Supreme Being, the author and governor of all things. All the ancient nations appear in the early periods of their existence to have believed in the existence of one infinite God, and no more than one. The farther back we trace the history of nations, we find more evident traces of the pure worship of the One Infinite and Eternal Jehovah. There is no doubt that all nations, except the Jews, were once polytheists, and this establishes the great truth, that whatever the light of nature may teach, it is to Revelation that we owe the knowledge of the existence and the unity of God.

MONOTHELITES (Gr. monos, one only, and thelema, the will), a sect which arose in the seventh century, out of a well-meant but unsuccessful attempt on the part of the Emperor Heraclius to reconcile the Monophysites to the Greek church. Anxious to terminate the controversy, he consulted with one of the leading men among the Armenian Monophysites, and with Sergius, patriarch of Constantinople, and at their suggestion he issued a decree A. D. 630, that the doctrine should henceforth be held and inculcated without prejudice to the truth or to the authority of the Council of Chalcedon, that after the union of the two natures in the Person of Christ Jesus, there was but one will, and one operation of will. Heraclius had no wish to make this formula universal in the church, but simply to introduce it into those provinces where the Monophysites chiefly prevailed, and thus, if possible, to effect a union. The plan succeeded in the case of the two patriarchs of the East, Cyrus of Alexandria, and Athanasius of Antioch, the former of whom held a council which solemnly confirmed the decree of the Emperor. The intention of Cyrus was to gain over the Severians and the Theodosians, who composed a large part of the Christians of Alexandria, and to accomplish this important object, he considered it the most effectual plan to set forth the doctrine of one will and one operation. In several canons, accordingly, of the council at Alexandria, he spoke of one single theandric operation in Christ, yet for the sake of peace he refrained from affirming either one or two wills and operations. This step, though taken with the best intentions, gave occasion afterwards to the most violent theological contests.

Sophronius, a monk of Palestine, who had been present at the council of Alexandria, called by Cyrus A. D. 633, offered the most strenuous opposition, though standing alone and unsupported, to the article which related to one will in Christ. Next year having been promoted to the high office of patriarch of Jerusalem, he took occasion, in the circular letters to the other patriarchs announcing his consecration, to condemn the Monotelites, and to show, by a host of quotations from the Fathers, that the doctrine of two wills and two operations in Christ was the only true doctrine. Sergius of Constantinople, dreading the increased influence which Sophronius was likely to exercise from the elevated position which he now occupied, endeavoured to gain over as a counterpoise, Honorius the Roman pontiff, who, although Romish writers are reluctant to admit it, was induced openly to declare in favour of Monothelite doctrine, since there could be no conflict between the human and the divine will in Christ, as in the case of the world, in consequence of the presence of sin.

The controversy was now carried on with great zeal and earnestness in various parts of the Christian world. Heraclius, dreading the political effects of these theological disputes, published A. D. 639 an ECHTESIS (which see), drawn up by Sergius, in which, while the most tolerant sentiments were expressed towards those who held the doctrine of a twofold will, the Monothelites were nevertheless spoken of in the most indulgent and favourable terms. This new law met with the approval of many in the East, and it was expressly confirmed by a synod convened by Sergius. But in Northern Africa and Italy the edict of the Emperor was rejected, and in a council held by John IV. at Rome, the doctrine of the Monothelites was publicly condemned. In Constantinople the Ecthesis was still regarded as law, even after the death of Heraclius in A. D. 641. But the controversy, instead of being lulled by this imperial edict, only waxed more fierce and vehement. At length, in A. D. 648, the Emperor Constans published a new edict under the name of the Type, by which the Ecthesis was annulled, silence was enjoined on both the contending parties in regard to one will, and also in regard to one operation of will in Christ. This attempt forcibly to still the voice of controversy on a point of theological doctrine, was productive of no other effect but that of increased irritation. The monks viewed silence on such an occasion as a crime, and hence they prevailed on Martin I., bishop of Rome, to summon a council. This assembly, called the Lateran Council, consisting of one hundred and five bishops, met at Rome and passed twenty canons anathematizing both the Ecthesis and the Type, and likewise all patrons of the Monothelites. In these canons the doctrine of the twofold will and operation was clearly asserted, and the opposite opinion condemned.

Pope Martin caused the decrees of the Lateran Council to be published throughout the Western Church, and sent a copy of them to the Emperor Constans, with a request that he would confirm them. This bold step on the part of the Roman Pontiff roused the indignation of the Emperor, who issued an order for the arrest of His Holiness, and his transportation to the island of Naxia. Thence he was conveyed to Constantinople, where he underwent a judicial trial, and would have been condemned to die, had not the Emperor been prevailed upon to commute his punishment into banishment to Cherson, where he soon after died in great distress.

Thus by measures of extreme severity did the Emperor compel the whole Eastern Church to acknowledge the Type, and along with the adoption of this formulary the bishops of the principal cities combined the avowal and support of Monothelite doctrines. In the Romish church, on the contrary, zeal for the Dyothelite doctrine was continually on the increase. A schism between the Eastern and Western churches therefore seemed to be inevitable. Under Pope Adeodatus, A. D. 677, matters came to a crisis. All intercourse ceased between the Pope of Rome and the Patriarch of Constantinople. The Emperor Constantinus Pogonatus was much distressed at the division between the two churches, and by his authority the sixth œcumenical council was assembled A. D. 680 at Constantinople, for the purpose of investigating the points in dispute. This, which is usually termed the council in Trullo, was the third of the general councils convened in Constantinople. The Emperor attended in person, and the argument between the Dyothelites and the Monothelites was conducted throughout several sessions with great ability. At length, however, a remarkable occurrence broke in upon the deliberations of the assembly, and turned the tables in favour of the supporters of one will in Christ. The incident to which we refer, along with the effect which it produced, is thus related by Neander: "A monk named Polychronius, from Heraclea, in Thrace, presented himself before the assembly. He declared that a band of men, clothed in white garments, had appeared to him, and that in their midst was a man invested with indescribable glory: probably Christ was intended. This wonderful personage said to him, that those who did not confess the one will and the theandric energy, were no Christians. He also commanded him to seek the emperor, and to exhort him to refrain from making or admitting any new doctrines. The monk then offered to prove the truth of the principles which he advocated by a miracle, and to restore a dead man to life by means of a confession of faith embodying the Monothelite belief. It was considered necessary to accept his proposal, in order to prevent his imposing on the credulity of the people. The entire synod, and the highest officers of state appeared, surrounded by a multitude of people, in an open place, into which a dead body was brought upon a bier decorated with silver ornaments. Polychronius laid his confession upon the corpse; and continued, for several hours, to whisper something into its ear. At length he was obliged to acknowledge that he could not awake the dead. Loud were the clamours which burst forth from the people against this new Simon Magus. But no such clamours could weaken the conviction formed in the depths of his mind, and Polychronius remained firmly devoted to his error. By means of this Council, the doctrine of two wills, and two modes of operation in Christ, obtained a victory throughout the Eastern church. It was now made part of a new confession, and was carefully defended against the conclusions which the Monothelites endeavoured to draw from its principles. 'Two wills, and two natural modes of operation united with each other, without opposition and without confusion or change, so that no antagonism can be found to exist between them, but a constant subjection of the human will to the divine,' this was the foundation of the creed. An anathema was also pronounced upon the champions of Monothelitism, upon the patriarchs of Constantinople, and on Honorius, to defend whom some attempt had been made by a skilful interpretation of his words."

The anathema pronounced upon the Monothelites

by the Trullian council did not succeed in destroying the sect. Still further measures, therefore, were adopted to extinguish the heresy. The decrees of the sixth oecumenical council in reference to the disputed doctrine, were repented by the second council in Trullo in A. D. 691, a council which, as it was designed to complete the work of the two preceding councils, the fifth and the sixth, is generally known by the name of the Concilium Quinisextum. In the year 711, the Monothelites received no small encouragement from the succession to the imperial throne of Bardanes, or as he called himself, Philippius, who was a zealous champion of their party. Under his presidency a council was held at Constantinople, which overthrew the decisions of the sixth general council, and proposed a new symbol of faith in favour of the Monothelite doctrine. The reign of Bardanes, however, lasted only two years, and his successor, Anastasius II., neutralized all that he had done in matters of religion during his brief imperial rule. Monothelism now retreated to the remote mountainous strongholds of Libanus and Anti-Libanus, where it established itself among the Maronites, who separated from the Greek church, and subsequently were able to maintain their independence against the Saracens. The Maronite church for several centuries appears to have held Monothelite views, though the most learned of the modern Maronites deny the charge, and it was not until they were reconciled with the Romish church in 1182, that they renounced the doctrines of the Monothelites.

MONTANISTS, a Christian sect which arose in Phrygia in the course of the second century, deriving its name from an enthusiastic fanatic named Montanus, who lived in the village of Ardaban on the boundary-line between Phrygia and Mysia. The prevailing idea of the whole system was, that man is wholly passive, a mere machine, wrought upon by the Divine Spirit, to which he bears the same relation as the lyre does to the plectrum with which it was played. Not regarding the Divine word as adequate for the guidance of the church, Montanus attached the highest importance to the Paraclete, through whose indwelling operation in the soul new revelations were imparted. Accordingly, he taught that by this means many new positive precepts were imposed upon the church; and hence the whole sect was characterized by a spirit of fanaticism and superstition of the grossest kind. The leader of this strange body of enthusiasts was seized with occasional fits of ecstasy, in which he fancied himself under the influence of a higher spirit, which enabled him to predict the approach of new persecutions. He announced the judgments impending over the persecutors of the church, the second coming of Christ, and the approach of the millennial reign. He alleged that he was a divinely-commissioned prophet sent to elevate the church to a higher stage of perfection than she had ever yet attained. In connexion with Montanus there were two women, Priscilla and Maximilla, who claimed to be regarded as prophetesses.

Montanism was clearly explained, and reduced to a system by Tertullian, one of the most learned of the Latin fathers. He maintained that the doctrines of the church were immutable, but that the regulations of the church might be changed and improved by the progressive teachings of the Paraclete, according to the exigencies of the times. To communicate these instructions, the church was believed to enjoy the extraordinary guidance of the prophets awakened by the Paraclete, who were regarded as successors of the apostles in the possession of miraculous gifts. Those who followed the teaching of the Holy Ghost speaking through the medium of the new prophets, were considered as constituting the church properly so called. Nor was the possession of the gifts of the Spirit confined to one class only, but belonged to Christians of every condition and sex without distinction. The Montanistic notion of inspiration was that of an ecstatic condition in which the individual was thrown into a state of unconsciousness, speaking under the exclusive agency of the Holy Spirit, without fully understanding what they announced: "States," says Neander, "somewhat akin to what occurred in pagan divination, phenomena like the magnetic and somnambulist appearances occasionally presented in the pagan cultus, mixed in with the excitement of Christian feelings. Those Christian females who were thrown into ecstatic trances during the time of public worship, were not only consulted about remedies for bodily diseases, but also plied with questions concerning the invisible world. In Tertullian's time, there was one at Carthage, who, in her states of ecstasy, imagined herself to be in the society of Christ and of angels. The matter of her visions corresponded to what she had just heard read from the holy scriptures, what was said in the Psalms that had been sung, or in the prayers that had been offered. At the conclusion of the service, and after the dismissal of the church, she was made to relate her visions, from which men sought to gain information about things of the invisible world, as, for example, about the nature of the soul."

The Montanists, following out their principles as to the progressive development of church ordinances, introduced a number of new precepts, chiefly bearing on the ascetic life. Fasting, which had hitherto been voluntary on the stationary days, that is, on Thursday and Friday, was prescribed as a law for all Christians. It was held also to be imperative on all Christians to practise a partial fast during three weeks of the year. Believers were encouraged to long for martyrdom. "Let it not be your wish," they were told, "to die on your beds in the pains of childbed, or in debilitating fever; but desire to die as martyrs, that He may be glorified who suffered for you." Celibacy was held in high estimation among the Montanists, but at the same time they gave peculiar prominence to marriage as a spiritual union, and hence they regarded it as belonging to the essence of a truly Christian marriage, that it should be celebrated in the church in the name of Christ. Carrying out this view of the marriage union, they would allow of no second marriage after the death of the first husband or the first wife, reckoning as they did that marriage being an indissoluble union in the spirit, not in the flesh alone, was destined to endure beyond the grave.

From the peculiar rigidity of many of their practices, the Montanists considered themselves to be the only genuine Christians. They did not, however, for some time separate from the church, but wished only to be viewed as the spiritual portion of the church. At length they proceeded to form and propagate themselves as a distinct sect, called Cataphrygians, from the country in which they had their origin; and also Pepuzians, because Montanus taught that at Pepuza in Phrygia the millennial reign of Christ would begin, this place being the New Jerusalem spoken of in the Book of Revelation. Tertullian calls those who hold Montanist views, the Spiritual; while he denominates those who oppose their opinions, the Carnal. Amidst the changes which this sect introduced was an alteration of the form of baptism, the ordinance being administered by them, as St. Basil alleges, in the name of the Father, Son, and Montanus or Priscilla. This alteration may have arisen from an idea which Montanus inculcated upon his followers, that he himself was the Holy Ghost. Hence the council of Laodicea decreed that all Montanists who should return to the Catholic church should be rebaptized. A decree to the same effect was passed by the first general council of Constantinople. Jerome alleges that the Montanists, though professing to believe in the Trinity, were in reality Sabellians, believing in only one person in the Godhead, but under different manifestations, which they called Persons. Philastrius declares it to have been a practice followed by the Montanists, that they baptized men after death, when the ordinance had been neglected during life. The same author also affirms that they administered the eucharist to the dead under similar circumstances. From the opinion which they held that the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit were communicated indiscriminately to Christians of all conditions and of both sexes, they allowed women to preach, and to hold offices in the church, some being bishops, and other presbyters.

Towards the end of the second, or according to others, the beginning of the third century, the extravagance of the Montanists, and of some belonging to the true church who had imbibed their principles, brought upon Christians generally the charge of disaffection to the civil power. Accordingly, Severus, the Roman Emperor, whose reign had hitherto been tolerant, changed his policy, and issuing an edict against proselytism, commenced a persecution of the church which he continued without intermission till his death.

MONTENEGRINE CHURCH, a section of the Greek Church, including 60,000 inhabitants of a mountain district in the south of Albania. This church is under the direction of the Most Holy governing Synod of Russia, and though professedly belonging to the Oriental Church, it is tolerated in the maintenance of several practices in which it differs from that church, particularly in rejecting images, crucifixes, and pictures. The Montenegrines entertain a deep-rooted aversion to the Pope of Rome, and also to their neighbours the Turks. When a Roman Catholic applies for admission into their church, they invariably deem it necessary to rebaptize him before admission.

MONTFORT (A SECT AT). In the eleventh century a mystic Christian sect appeared in the north of Italy, having its headquarters at Montfort, in the neighbourhood of Turin. When discovered by Heribert, archbishop of Milan, it was presided over by one Gerhard, whom he summoned to give an account of himself. The account which he gave of his views, however, was far from satisfactory. The Son of God, he said, is the soul, beloved, enlightened of God; the Holy Spirit is the devout and true understanding of the Sacred Scriptures. The birth of Jesus from the Virgin, and his conception by the Holy Ghost, denotes the birth of the divine life in the soul, by means of a right understanding of the Scriptures, proceeding from a divine light which is designated by the Holy Spirit. Thus in the view of the sect at Montfort, persons denoted things, and the whole history of Christ was a myth, intended to be a symbol of the development of the divine life in each individual man. They held that all Christians had one only priest from whom they received the forgiveness of sin, and they acknowledged no other sacrament than his absolution, thus rejecting baptism and the Lord's Supper. They refused to admit of any other marriage than a spiritual union between the parties, which they believed would lead to a spiritual progeny, so that in course of time men would cease to inherit a carnal nature. They held that Christians ought to lead a life of prayer and abstinence and poverty. The reproach and persecution which they endured on account of their doctrines they bore with cheerful submission, believing them to be judgments inflicted by God for their past sins, and designed to purify their souls, fitting them for the society of the blessed in heaven. Those, therefore, who were denied the privilege of dying as martyrs, died cheerfully under self-inflicted tortures. No sooner had this mystical sect attracted notice, than they were visited with severe persecution, great numbers of them being doomed to perish at the stake.

MONTIL. The word used by the Hebrews to denote a month, in early times, was lhodesh, which signifies a new moon, as the month began with the new moon, and indeed the changes of that luminary seem to have afforded the first measure of time. After the Israelites left Egypt they had two modes of reckoning months; the one civil, the other sacred. While the Jews were in the land of Canaan they regulated the months by the appearance of the moon. As soon as they saw the moon they began the month. Persons were stationed on the tops of high mountains to watch the first appearance of the new moon, which was immediately intimated to the sanhedrin, and public notice given by sounding trumpets or lighting beacons in conspicuous places so as to be seen throughout the whole country, or despatching messengers in all directions to make the announcement. Since the dispersion the Jews have regulated their months and years by astronomical calculations. The present Jewish calendar was settled by Rabbi Hillel about the middle of the fourth century. It is founded on a combination of lunar and solar periods: "That the festival of the new-moon," says Mr. Allen, "might be celebrated as nearly as possible on the day of the moon's conjunction with the sun, the months contain alternately, for the most part, twenty-nine and thirty days. But each lunation containing more than twenty-nine days and a half, the excess renders it necessary to allot, in some years, thirty days to two successive months. The year is never begun on the first, fourth, or sixth day of the week. This circumstance causes further variations in the lengths of some of the months. The months in which these variations take place are the second and third, Marchesvan and Chisleu; which contain, sometimes twenty-nine days each, sometimes thirty days each: and sometimes there are twenty-nine days in the former and thirty in the latter." Among the ancient Egyptians the hieroglyphic signifying month was represented by the crescent of the moon.

MONTH'S MIND, a solemn office in the Roman Catholic Church, for the repose of the soul, performed one month after decease.

MONTHLIVETENSES, the monks of Mount Olivet, an order of religious in the Romish church, which originated in A. D. 1407, and was confirmed by Pope Gregory XII. They resided on a hill, which they called Mount Olivet, professed the Rule of St. Benedict, and wore as the habit of their order a white dress.

MOON-WORSHIP. In Eastern nations generally, and among the Hebrews more especially, the Moon was more extensively worshipped than the Sun. Moses warns the Israelites, in Deut. iv. 19, xvii. 3, against the idolatrous worship of this, as well as the other heavenly bodies. There is a reference also in Job xxi. 26, 27, to the same species of worship, "If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness; and my heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand." In the Old Testament Scriptures the Moon is sometimes called the Queen of Heaven, and to this divine luminary the Hebrews offered cakes, made libations, and burned incense, customs to which we find an allusion in Jer. vii. 18, xlv. 17, 19. The goddess Ashlaroth or Astarte, worshipped by the Zidonians, is supposed to have been the Moon, who was represented among the Phœnicians by an effigy having the head of an ox with horns, perhaps resembling a crescent. Her worship is uniformly joined with that of Baal or the Sun. A feast in honour of Astarté was held every new moon, which was called the feast of Hecate. We learn from Sir John G. Wilkinson, that "The Egyptians represented their moon as a male deity, like the German Mond and Monat, or the Lunus of the Latins; and it is worthy of remark, that the same custom of calling it male is retained in the East to the present day, while the Sun is considered female, as in the language of the Germans. Thoth is usually represented as a human figure with the head of an Ibis, holding a tablet and a pen or palm-branch in his hands; and in his character of Lunus he has sometimes a man's face with the crescent of the moon upon his head, supporting a disk, occasionally with the addition of an ostrich feather; which last appears to connect him with Ao or with Thmei." Plutarch says that there were some who scrupled not to declare Isis to be the moon, and to say that such statues of hers as were horned, were made in imitation of the crescent; and that her black habit sets forth her disappearing and eclipses. The Israelites appear to have learned the practice of Moon-worship from the Phœnicians and Canaanites. The ancient Arabians also worshipped this planet under the name of Alilat, the Greeks under that of Artemis, and the Romans of Diana.

The moon was considered by many of the ancient heathen nations as having a peculiar influence over the affairs of men. Hence, as we learn from Lucian, it was laid down by Lyeurgus as an established rule among the Spartans, that no military expedition should be undertaken except when the moon was at the full. The Zend-Avesta of the ancient Persians reckons the Moon not among the deities, but among the Amschaspands or seven archangels of the heavenly hierarchy. Mani was the Moon god of the Scandinavian Edda. The moon has different sexes in different mythologies. In Hebrew it is sometimes male, when it is called Yarrach, and at other times female, when it receives the name of Lebanah. This was the Men of the Syrians, Cappadocians, and Lydians, the cock of Freyja, and the Moon-god of the Lithuanians and ancient Slavonians.

MOQUAMOS, the name given to the temples of the idolatrous inhabitants of the island of Socotra, off Cape Guardafui, on the east coast of Africa. The pagan islanders worship the Moon as the great parent of all things. For this purpose they resort to their Moquamos, which are very small and low, while the entrance is such that a person requires to stoop almost to the ground before he can find his way into the sacred place. Here a number of strange ceremonies are performed in honour of the Moon by the Hodamos, as their priests are called.

MORABITES, a Mohammedan sect, who are chiefly found in Africa. They arose about the eighth century, having been originated by Mohaidin, the last son of Hossein, who was the second son of Ali, Mohammed's son-in-law. They live chiefly in sequestered places, like monks, either separately or in small societies, following many practices utterly opposed to the Koran. They are licentious in their habits, and on occasions of festivity they sing verses in honour of Ali and his son Hossein, and amuse the company with their dances, which are conducted with the most boisterous vehemence until utterly exhausted they are carried away by some of their disciples to their solitary residences.

MORALITIES, a kind of allegorical representations of virtues or vices, which were accustomed to be made by the ecclesiastics of the middle ages, in order to instruct the people, who, being very ignorant and unable to read, were thus taught many truths which they could not otherwise have learned. The Moralities were so contrived as to exhibit virtue in the most favourable, and vice in the most odious aspect.

MORAVIAN CHURCH. The members of this church commonly assume to themselves the name of the United Brethren. They are a continuation of the ancient Bohemian Church, which, after being almost annihilated by sore persecution, was revived by Count Zinzendorf in the eighteenth century. Its commencement was truly a day of small things. Ten individuals in 1722 were permitted to settle on a portion of the lands belonging to the Count, and the small colony thus formed was called "Herrnhut," as being situated on the declivity of a hill called Hutberg. This Christian community rapidly increased in numbers, and in the course of five years it had risen to five hundred persons. It was proposed by some to form a combination with the Lutheran church; but having appealed to the lot, it was decided that they should continue a distinct Society. Accordingly, under the guidance of Count Zinzendorf, certain articles of faith and rules of discipline were agreed upon as the basis on which the Society should rest; and to the furtherance of the interests of this 'Unitas Fratrum,' as it was termed, its pious founder from that time forward devoted his whole life, property, and energy. Their doctrines were, and still are, in harmony with those of the Augsburg Confession.

At a general synod of the Brethren held at Barby in 1775, the following statement of principles was adopted: "The chief doctrine to which the Church of the Brethren adheres, and which we must preserve as an invaluable treasure committed unto us, is this—that by the sacrifice for sin made by Jesus Christ, and by that alone, grace and deliverance from sin are to be obtained for all mankind. We will, therefore, without lessening the importance of any other article of the Christian faith, steadfastly maintain the following five points:—

"1. The doctrine of the universal depravity of man; that there is no health in man, and that, since the fall, he has no power whatever left to help himself.

"2. The doctrine of the divinity of Christ: that God, the creator of all things, was manifest in the flesh, and reconciled us to himself; that he is before all things, and that by him all things consist.

"3. The doctrine of the atonement and satisfaction made for us by Jesus Christ: that he was delivered for our offences, and raised again for our justification: and that, by his merits alone, we receive freely the forgiveness of sin and sanctification in soul and body.

"4. The doctrine of the Holy Spirit, and the operations of His grace: that it is He who worketh in us conviction of sin, faith in Jesus, and pureness in heart.

"5. The doctrine of the fruits of faith: that faith must evidence itself by willing obedience to the commandments of God, from love and gratitude."

Within their pale the United Brethren include three different modifications of sentiment, the Lutheran, the Reformed, and the Moravian, the last of which includes all other Protestant denominations. They object to be called a sect or denomination, because their union is founded on great general principles belonging to Christianity as such, and the only peculiarities which they have, refer exclusively to conduct and discipline. Having become quietly located at Herrnhut, the rights and regulations of the congregation were confirmed by grants from the sovereign. A second settlement of the Brethren was set on foot by Bohemian refugees in 1742 at Niesky, near Gortitz in Upper Lusatia, where a Moravian classical school is established. Other settlements of the Brethren were commenced in 1743 and 1744 at Gnadenberg, Gnadenfrey and Neusalz in Lower Silesia; at Kleinwelke in Upper Lusatia in 1756; and at Gnadenfeld in Upper Silesia, in 1780, by a special grant from the sovereign. At the last-mentioned place there is a college, where young men are educated for the ministry both at home and abroad. Congregations of the Brethren were also established in Saxony, Prussia, and other parts of Germany. The first settlements both in England and in the United States were made about 1742.

At an early period in the history of the Moravian Brethren, they undertook the holy enterprise of propagating the gospel among heathen nations. Count Zinzendorf, though a man of rank and wealth, devoted himself to the office of the ministry, and his whole estate to the diffusion of Christianity in connection with the Brethren's Church. Having been through false accusations banished from Saxony, on quitting the kingdom, he remarked, "Now we must collect a Congregation of Pilgrims, and train labourers to go forth into all the world and preach Christ and his salvation." Accordingly, from this time he was constantly surrounded with a goodly company of godly men, who were preparing for the service of the church either in home ministerial, or foreign missionary work. These persons, who constituted the Congregation of Pilgrims, followed the Count in all his changes of residence. The missions of the United Brethren had their origin in a providential circumstance, which directed their attention to the condition of slaves in the West Indies. In 1731 the Count happened to reside in Copenhagen, where some of his domestics became acquainted with a negro named Anthony, who told them of the sufferings of the slaves on the island of St. Thomas, and of their earnest desire for religious instruction. The Count was deeply affected with the statements of Anthony, and on his return to Herrnhut, he made them known to his congregation; and such was the interest thereby excited in behalf of the slaves in the West Indies, that in the following year two of the Brethren were despatched as missionaries to the Danish West India Islands. These self-denied heralds of the cross went forth resolved to submit to be themselves enslaved if such a step should be necessary in order to gain access to the slaves; and though no such painful sacrifice was required of them, they still maintained themselves by manual labour under a tropical sun, embracing every opportunity of conversing with and instructing the heathen. The spirit which animated these holy men in the first missionary enterprise of the United Brethren, has been uniformly characteristic of their missionaries in all quarters of the world. The Greenland mission, which has received so many tokens of the Divine favour, was commenced in 1733. There, as everywhere else, the grand aim of the Moravians has been to make known among the heathen the unsearchable riches of Christ. Their motto is, "To humble the sinner, to exalt the Saviour, and to promote holiness."

The general superintendence of the Moravian missions is vested in the synods of the church; but as the synods meet only occasionally, the elders' conference has the oversight of the missions. The Brethren's Church has no permanent fund for missions. They are maintained by voluntary contributions, collected mostly at stated times in their congregations; and also by the many female, young men's, and juvenile missionary societies in the church. To these also are added many liberal donations from the members of other Christian communities, particularly from members of the Church of England. Moravian missions are in active operation in Greenland, Labrador, the Danish West India Islands, Jamaica, Antigua, St. Kitts, Barbadoes, Tobago, Surinam, South Africa, Australia, and the North American Indians. The number of labourers in the present missionary field, which includes 72 stations, amounts to 159 males, and 131 females. No church indeed has surpassed the Moravians in zeal, perseverance, and energy in prosecuting the great work of Christian missions.

In all their operations, whether home or foreign, the Brethren seek to be regulated by a supreme regard to the will of God, and hence they endeavour to test the purity of their purposes by referring them to the light of the Divine word. As a society, all their movements are submitted to this test; and if in any case they are at a loss how to act, they are in the habit of using the lot, humbly hoping that God will guide them rightly by its decision. In former times no marriage could take place without the consent of the elders, who, when they were at a loss whether to give or to withhold their approval, had recourse to the lot. This custom, however, is abandoned, and the consent of the elders is never denied, where the parties are of good moral character.

The Moravian church is episcopal in its mode of government, and the bishops claim to be in regular descent from those of the ancient Bohemian church, which has been described under the article Hussites. The different orders of the clergy among the Brethren are bishops, presbyters, and deacons, the bishops alone having the power of ordination. Every church is divided into three classes: (1.) The catechumens, comprising the children of the brethren and adult converts; (2.) The communicants, who are admitted to the Lord's Supper, and are regarded as members of the church; and (3.) The perfect, consisting of those who have persevered for some time in a course of true piety. From this last class are chosen in every church, by a plurality of votes, the elders, who are from three to eight in number. Every congregation is directed by a board of elders, which is termed, "The Elders' Conference of the Congregation;" whose office it is to watch over that congregation with reference to the doctrine, walk, and conversation of all its members, the concerns of the choirs, and of each individual person. The distinction of choirs refers to the difference of age, sex, and station. Boys and girls above, and under, twelve years of age are considered as belonging to separate choirs; and the difference in the station of life constitutes the distinction between the single, married, and widowed choirs. Each choir has its particular meetings, besides those of the whole congregation. In every congregation there is a committee of overseers appointed, whose duty it is to watch over the domestic affairs, and the means of outward subsistence of the people, and to settle all differences among the members. The elders are bound to visit each family once in three months, and to report to the pastor whether or not family worship is regularly maintained, and whether each member of the family is acting in accordance with the Christian profession. It is also their duty to visit the sick, and to assist the poor brethren with money contributed by the members of the church.

The management of the general affairs of the Moravian church is committed to a board of elders appointed by the general synods, which assemble at irregular intervals, varying from seven to twelve years. One of these boards, which is stationary at Herrnhut, maintains a general supervision over the whole Society; while the others are local, being connected with particular congregations. There are female elders, who attend at the boards, but they do not vote. "The synods," says Mr. Conder, "are composed of the bishops with their co-bishops, the civil seniors, and such servants of the church and of the congregations of the Brethren as are called to the synod by the former Elders' Conference, appointed by the previous synod, or commissioned to attend it, as deputies from particular congregations; together with (in Germany) the lords or ladies of the manors, or proprietors of the land on which regular settlements are erected, provided they be members of the Unity. Several female elders also are usually present at the synods, in order that, in the deliberations referring to the female part of the congregations, the needful intelligence may be obtained from them; but they have no votes. Sometimes, several hundred persons attend these meetings. All the transactions of the synod are committed to writing, and communicated to the several congregations. From one synod to another, the direction of the external and internal affairs of the Church of the Brethren is committed to a board consisting of bishops and elders chosen by the synod, and individually confirmed by lot, which bears the name of 'The Elders' Conference of the Unity of the Brethren.'"

The ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper are administered in nearly the same way as in other Protestant churches. In baptism, however, both the witnesses and the minister bless the infant with laying on of hands, immediately after the rite has been performed. The Lord's Supper is celebrated in regular settlements of the Brethren every four weeks, on Saturday evening; and in other places on every fourth Sabbath. After the bread has been consecrated, the deacons distribute it among the communicants standing, who hold it in their hands until the distribution is completed; after which it is eaten by all at once, in a kneeling posture. The consecrated cup is also given from one to the other standing, until all have partaken of it. Absolution is implored of the Lord in fellowship before the communion, and sealed with the holy kiss of peace.

In the churches of the Moravian Brethren a Litany is regularly used as part of the morning's service on the Lord's Day; but the minister occasionally uses extemporary prayer. Singing and instrumental music are regarded as very important parts of Divine worship; sometimes services are held which are exclusively devoted to such exercises. Love feasts, in imitation of the Agapæ of the early Christian Church, are occasionally celebrated by the Brethren. The pediluvium or feetwashing was formerly observed in some Moravian congregations before partaking of the communion; but now it is practised only at particular times, as on Maunday Thursday, by the whole congregation, and on some other occasions in the choirs. This ceremony is performed by each sex separately, accompanied with the singing of suitable hymns. In the Brethren's Societies on the Continent, the sexes, previous to marriage, occupy separate establishments, called respectively the "Single Brethren's Houses," and "Single Sisters' Houses," each establishment being under the control of a male or female elder, who endeavours to instruct and train the inmates.

On a dying bed the Brethren generally invite the attendance of one or more elders, who seek to prepare them for their departure by prayer and singing a portion of a hymn, with imposition of hands. When the body is carried out to burial, it is accompanied by the whole congregation, as well as by the pastor, who delivers an address at the grave. Easter morning is devoted to a solemnity of a peculiar kind. At sunrise the congregation assembles in the burial-ground; a service, accompanied by music, is performed, and a solemn commemoration is made of all those by name who have, in the course of the previous year, departed this life from among the members of the congregation.

The church government of the Moravians is of a mixed character. It is partly Episcopal, as we have seen, having bishops, in whom is vested the power of ordination; it is partly Presbyterian, each congregation having a board of elders, who are subordinate to a general board or conference of elders, who again are subordinate to the general synod, which is the supreme court of the whole church; it is partly Congregational, the discipline of the church being more especially of this character. (See DISCIPLINE.)

Colonies of Moravians, formed on the plan of the parent society, are found in different parts of Germany, England, Holland, and America, all, however, responsible, even while regulated by local boards, to the General Board of the Directors, seated at Bethelsdorf, near Herrnhut, and denominated the Board of Elders of the Unity. With this board rests the appointment of all the ministers and officers of each community, except in the case of England and America, where all the appointments are made by the local boards. This Board of Elders of the Unity, however, is responsible to the General Synod, from whom all authority emanates.

It is calculated that the number of actual members of the Moravian church does not exceed 12,000 in the whole of Europe, nor 6,000 in America; but it is believed, that nearly 100,000 more are in virtual connexion with the Society, and under the spiritual care of its ministers. The number of Moravian chapels in England and Wales, as reported by the census of 1851, was 32, with 9,305 sittings. They are now increased to 34 chapels, with six home mission stations in Ireland. They have various educational institutions in Great Britain, the principal of which are Fulneck in Yorkshire, Fairfield in Lancashire, and Ockbrook in Derbyshire. They have 28 settlements and congregations in the United States, along with a number of home missionary stations. They are a small community, with little or no prospect of growth; but the influence which they exert upon the community around them is of a very beneficial kind; more especially through their well-known and highly-prized schools at Bethlehem, Nazareth, Lititz, and Salem. They are said to have kept the German language and customs more pure than any other class of emigrants to the United States; and there, as in Europe, the Brethren are remarkable for their industrious, peaceable, and pious character and deportment.

MORELST'SCHIKI, a sect of dissenters from the Russo-Greek Church, who act the part of voluntary martyrs. On a certain day every year a number of them assemble in secret, and having celebrated a number of Pagan rites, they dig a deep pit, filling it with wood, straw, and other combustibles; and setting fire to the mass, they throw themselves into the midst of it, and perish in the flames amid the plaudits of their admiring companions, who calmly witness the scene. Others, without proceeding the length of self-murder, inflict upon themselves cruel mutilations. This sect carefully conceals its peculiar doctrines, which have never been committed to writing. They are believed to hold the Sabellian heresy in regard to the Trinity, recognizing only the Father as God, and the Son and the Spirit as merely manifestations of the Godhead. They deny the reality of the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, maintaining that the body which was buried was that of a soldier, substituted for the body of our Lord. They look for the speedy return of the Saviour, who they believe will make his triumphant entrance into Moscow, to which place the saints will flock to meet him from all quarters of the earth. They hold their religious meetings on Saturday night, and do not observe the Sabbath. Easter is the only holiday which they observe, and on that occasion they celebrate the Lord's Supper with bread which has been buried in the tomb of some saint, under the idea that it has thereby acquired a peculiar sacredness.

MORGLANS, a kind of Antinomian sect among the Mohammedans, who maintain that the faith of a Mussulman will save him whatever may have been his character and conduct in this world, and they even go so far as to allege, that to the true followers of the prophet good works are wholly useless.

MORID, a name given by the Mohammedans to those who aspire to a life of extraordinary spirituality and devotion.

MORIMO, a word used by some of the native tribes in South Africa, to denote a particular object of worship among them. It is a compound word in the Bechuana language, mo being a personal prefix, and rimo, derived from gorimo, above. "Morimo," says Mr. Moffat, in his 'Missionary Labours and Scenes in South Africa,' "to those who know any thing about it, had been represented by rain makers and sorcerers as a malevolent sele, or thing, which the nations in the north described as existing in a hole, and which, like the fairies in the Highlands of Scotland, sometimes came out and inflicted diseases on men and cattle, and even caused death. This Morimo served the purpose of a hughbear, by which the rain-maker might constrain the chiefs to yield to his suggestions, when he wished for a slaughter ox, without which he pretended he could not make rain. Morimo did not then convey to the mind of those who heard it the idea of God; nor did Barimo, although it was an answer to the question, 'where do men go when they die?' signify heaven. According to one rule of forming the plural of personal nouns beginning with mo, Barimo would only be the plural of Morimo; as Monona, 'a man;' Banona, 'men.' But the word is never used in this form; nor did it convey to the Bechuana mind the idea of a person or persons, but of a state or disease, or what superstition would style being bewitched. If a person were talking foolishly, or wandering in his intellect, were delirious, or in a fit, they would call him Barimo; which, among some tribes, is tantamount to lirith, shades or manes of the dead. 'Going to Barimo,' did not convey the idea that they were gone to any particular state of permanent existence; for man's immortality was never heard of among that people; but, simply, that they died. They could not describe who or what Morimo was, except something cunning or malicious; and some who had a purpose to serve, ascribed to him power, but it was such as a Bushman doctor or quack could grunt out of the bowels or afflicted part of the human body. They never, however, disputed the propriety of our using the noun Morimo for the great object of our worship, as some of them admitted that their forefathers might have known more about him than they did. They never applied the name to a human being, except in a way of ridicule, or in adulation to those who taught his greatness, wisdom, and power.

"As to the eternity of this existence, they appear never to have exercised one thought. Morimo is never called man. As the pronouns agree with the noun, those which Morimo governs cannot, without the greatest violence to the language, be applied to Mogorimo, 'a heavenly one,' which refers to a human being. This power is, in the mouth of a rain-maker, what a disease would be in the lips of a quack, just as strong or weak as he is pleased to call it. I never once heard that Morimo did good, or was supposed capable of doing so. More modern inquiries among the natives might lead to the supposition that he is as powerful to do good as he is to do evil; and that he has as great an inclination for the one as for the other. It will, however, be found that this view of his attributes is the result of twenty-five years' missionary labour; the influences of which, in that as well as in other respects, extends hundreds of miles beyond the immediate sphere of the missionary. It is highly probable, however, that as we proceed farther into the interior, we shall find the natives possessing more correct views on these subjects.

"According to native testimony, Morimo, as well as man, with all the different species of animals, came out of a cave or hole in the Bakene country, to the north, where, say they, their footmarks are still to be seen in the indurated rock, which was at that time sand. In one of Mr. Hamilton's early journals, he records that a native had informed him that the footmarks of Morimo were distinguished by being without toes. Once I heard a man of influence telling his story on the subject. I of course could not say that I believed the wondrous tale, but very mildly hinted that he might be misinformed; on which he became indignant, and swore by his ancestors and his king, that he had visited the spot, and paid a tax to see the wonder; and that, consequently, his testimony was indubitable. I very soon cooled his rage, by telling him, that as I should likely one day visit those regions, I should certainly think myself very fortunate if I could get him as a guide to that wonderful source of animated nature. Smiling, he said, 'Ha, and I shall show you the footsteps of the very first man.' This is the sum-total of the knowledge which the Bechuanas possessed of the origin of what they call Morimo, prior to the period when they were visited by missionaries."

Among the Batlapis, Morimo is equivalent to wise and powerful. The Basutos again regard Morimo as a wicked deity, who comes from below, not from above, having his habitation in a subterranean cavern.

MORIUS, a surname of Zeus as being the protector of olive-trees.

MORMO, a female spectre with which the ancient Greeks were wont to frighten little children.

MORMOLYCE, identical with the spectre called MORMO (which see).

MORMONS, one of the most remarkable politico-religious systems which has appeared in modern times. The "Latter-Day Saints," as the adherents of Mormonism term themselves, pretend to derive the word Mormon from the Gaelic and Egyptian languages, alleging it to be compounded of mor, great, and mon, signifying good, thus importing "great good." The founder of the sect was Joseph Smith, a native of Sharon, Windsor County, Vermont, United States, born on the 23d December 1805. When he was ten years old, Joseph's parents removed to Palmyra, New York. His father was a farmer, a man of a strange visionary turn of mind, addicted to the use of divination and enchantments, and frequently spending whole nights in searching for treasure, which he imagined to be hid in the ground. Joseph seems to have imbibed the peculiarities of his father's character with probably increased force. According to his own statement, he was impressed, when about fourteen years of age, with the importance of being prepared for a future state, but his mind was staggered by the diversity of opinion which prevailed among the different denominations of Christians.

While in this state of mental conflict, Joseph tells us that he sought a solution of his difficulties at a throne of grace. The result we give in his own words: "I retired to a secret place in a grove, and began to call upon the Lord. While fervently engaged in supplication, my mind was taken away from the objects with which I was surrounded, and I was enrapt in a heavenly vision, and saw two glorious personages, who exactly resembled each other in features and likeness, surrounded with a brilliant light, which eclipsed the sun at noonday. They told me that all the religious denominations were believing in incorrect doctrines, and that none of them was acknowledged of God as his church and kingdom. And I was expressly commanded to 'go not after them,' at the same time receiving a promise that the fulness of the gospel should at some future time be made known unto me.

"On the evening of the 21st September, A. D. 1823, while I was praying unto God and endeavouring to exercise faith in the precious promises of scripture, on a sudden a light like that of day, only of a far purer and more glorious appearance and brightness, burst into the room; indeed the first sight was as though the house was filled with consuming fire. The appearance produced a shock that affected the whole body. In a moment a personage stood before me surrounded with a glory yet greater than that with which I was already surrounded. This messenger proclaimed himself to be an angel of God, sent to bring the joyful tidings, that the covenant which God made with ancient Israel was at hand to be fulfilled; that the preparatory work for the second coming of the Messiah was speedily to commence; that the time was at hand for the gospel in all its fulness to be preached in power, unto all nations, that a people might be prepared for the millennial reign.

"I was informed that I was chosen to be an instrument in the hands of God to bring about some of his purposes in this glorious dispensation.

"I was informed also concerning the aboriginal inhabitants of this country, and shown who they were, and from whence they came;—a brief sketch of their origin, progress, civilization, laws, governments, of their righteousness and iniquity, and the blessings of God being finally withdrawn from them as a people, was made known unto me. I was also told where there were deposited some plates, on which was engraven an abridgment of the records of the ancient prophets that had existed on this continent.

The angel appeared to me three times the same night and unfolded the same things. After having received many visits from the angels of God, unfolding the majesty and glory of the events that should transpire in the last days, on the morning of the 22d of September, A. D. 1827, the angel of the Lord delivered the records into my hands.

"These records were engraven on plates which had the appearance of gold; each plate was six inches wide and eight inches long, and not quite so thick as common tin. They were filled with engravings in Egyptian characters, and bound together in a volume, as the leaves of a book, with three rings running through the whole. The volume was something near six inches in thickness, a part of which was sealed. The characters on the unsealed part were small and beautifully engraved. The whole book exhibited many marks of antiquity in its construction, and much skill in the art of engraving. With the records was found a curious instrument which the ancients called 'Urim and Thummim,' which consisted of two transparent stones set in the rim on a bow fastened to a breastplate.

"Through the medium of the Urim and Thummim I translated the record, by the gift and power of God."

Such is the history from the pen of the Prophet himself of the discovery of the Book of Mormon, which has ever since been regarded by this extraordinary sect as the chief portion of their revealed Scriptures. Joseph now began to preach his new doctrines, which occasioned no small sensation, and a few professed themselves his followers. A convert, named Cowdery, baptized him, at the command of the angel; and the prophet then baptized his convert. At this ceremony, which took place in the woods of Pennsylvania, there are alleged to have been present the angels or spirits of Moses and Elias, of the Old Dispensation, along with Peter, James, and John, of the New; the stamp of heaven being thus given to the first step in the formation of this new church.

On the 6th of April, 1830, the "Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints," was first organized, in the town of Manchester, Ontario county, State of New York. "Some few," says the Prophet, "were called and ordained by the Spirit of revelation and prophecy, and began to preach as the Spirit gave them utterance, and though weak, yet were they strengthened by the power of God; and many were brought to repentance, were immersed in the water, and were filled with the Holy Ghost by the laying on of hands. They saw visions and prophesied, devils were cast out, and the sick healed by the laying on of hands. From that time the work rolled forth with astonishing rapidity, and churches were soon formed in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri: in the last named state a considerable settlement was formed in Jackson county; numbers joined the church, and we were increasing rapidly; we made large purchases of land, our farms teemed with plenty, and peace and happiness were enjoyed in our domestic circle and throughout our neighbourhood; but as we could not associate with our neighbours,—who were, many of them, of the basest of men, and had fled from the face of civilized society to the frontier country, to escape the hand of justice—in their midnight revels, their Sabbath-breaking, horse-racing, and gambling, they commenced at first to ridicule, then to persecute, and finally an organized mob assembled and burned our houses, tarred and feathered and whipped many of our brethren, and finally drove them from their habitations; these, houseless and homeless, contrary to law, justice, and humanity, had to wander on the bleak prairies till the children left the tracks of their blood on the prairie. This took place in the month of November, and they had no other covering but the canopy of heaven, in that inclement season of the year. This proceeding was winked at by the government; and although we had warrantee deeds for our land, and had violated no law, we could obtain no redress. There were many sick who were thus inhumanly driven from their houses, and had to endure all this abuse, and to seek homes where they could be found. The result was, that a great many of them being deprived of the comforts of life, and the necessary attendance, died; many children were left orphans; wives, widows; and husbands, widowers. Our farms were taken possession of by the mob, many thousands of cattle, sheep, horses, and hogs were taken, and our household goods, store goods, and printing-press and types were broken, taken, or otherwise destroyed."

Undeterred by the threats and bitter persecutions of their enemies, the Mormons removed to a spot in the State of Missouri, which, as they alleged, was pointed out to them by revelation. There, it was said, "was the New Jerusalem, to be built by the saints after a pattern sent down from heaven, and upon the spot where the garden of Eden bloomed, and Adam was formed." The altar on which Adam sacrificed was shown to Joseph, at least some of the stones of which it was built; and on the north side of the river, a city was located in the place where Adam blessed his children.

Driven from Missouri, the Mormons sought refuge in the State of Illinois, where, in the fall of 1839, they began to build a city called Nauvoo, in Hancock county, which in the following year was incorporated by the legislature. In a few years this city had made such rapid increase, that it contained 20,000 inhabitants, and a splendid temple was built for Divine worship. The Mormons, however, were viewed with jealousy, suspicion, and hatred, by the people generally, and every crime which was committed in the city or neighbourhood was attributed to them. This hostility to the Mormons ended in the murder of Joseph the seer, and Hyrum the patriarch, by the mob at Carthage jail in 1844; after which the Society was reorganized under Brigham Young as the Lord's Prophet and Seer to the Saints, to receive the revelations for them in a church capacity, with the title of First President. For a time the storm of persecution somewhat abated, but as it seemed to gather force again, the Mormons resolved to seek another home; and pretending to be guided as formerly by revelation, they settled in 1847, under Brigham the Seer, in the Salt Lake Valley, far in the interior of America, where they have formed a state, which has assumed the name of Deserét, a mystic word taken from the Book of Mormon, and signifying the Land of the Honey-Bee. The Valley which forms the present residence of this peculiar sect is situated in the Great Basin, a region in the heart of the Rocky Mountains, where they have entrenched themselves, but in all probability the Government of the United States may succeed ere long in dispersing a people who, both in principle and practice, bid defiance to the plainest rules of morality and good order. At this moment indeed they are said to be in search of another settlement.

Though professing to disown all connection between church and state, their system of government is, as they delight to call it, a Theo-Democracy, somewhat resembling the ancient Jewish Theocracy. The president of the church is the temporal civil governor, and all disputes are settled under a church organization, to which is attached the civil jurisdiction with officers, from the inferior justice of the peace, up to the governor. But the justice is a bishop of a ward in the city or precincts of the town or county; the judges on the bench of the superior courts are constituted from the high priest, from the quorums of seventies, or from the college of the apostles; and the seer is the highest ruler and consulting judge. The entire management is under the presidency, which consists of three persons, the seer and two counsellors. This board governs their universal church.

The Mormons claim to be the only true church of God, and of his Son, and they look forward to a time when all the sects of Christendom will be absorbed into this one body. Their expectations as to the future are thus described by Lieutenant Gunnison in his 'History of the Mormons': "When the two hosts are fairly marshalled, the one under the banner of the Pope of Rome, and 'the saints' around the 'Flag of all nations,' 'led by their Seer,' wearing the consecrated breastplate, and flourishing the glittering golden sword of Laban, delivered him by angelic hands, from their long resting-place; then shall be fought the great battle, mystically called, of Gog and Magog:—the Lord contending for his people with fire, pestilence, and famine; and in the end, the earth will become the property of the Saints, and He will descend from His heavenly throne to reign over them through a happy Millennium.

"During the preparations for those battles, to be more fierce than man ever yet has fought, the Jews will be erecting another temple at the Palestine Jerusalem, on which their long-expected Saviour will stand and exhibit Himself in the conquering brightness that they supposed he would bear at the first appearance, and their hearts will be bowed as one man to receive Him, with repentant humility for the past, and glorious joy for the future, and the city will rise in great magnificence;—and the New Israelites of America will have their head-quarters of the Presidency in Jackson County, Missouri, where they will build up the New Jerusalem, the joy of the whole earth; and, at the presence of the Lord of Majesty, the land which 'was divided' in the days of Noah into continents and islands, shall be 'Beulah, married,' and become one entirely as at the original creation, and, from these two cities, villas and habitations shall extend in one continuous neighbourhood, among which shall prevail entire concord: no one will have the disposition to rebel or be allowed to act against the harmony of the whole.

"And there shall be 'thrown up,' between the two Jerusalems, 'the highway on which the lion hath not trod, and which the eagle's eye hath not seen'—then the temple described by Ezekiel will be erected in all its particulars for the exercise of the functions of the two priesthoods,—for the Aaronic, held by the tribe of Levi, who will return to their duties and renew animal sacrifices; and for the Melchisedek, the greater priesthood, held by those commissioned through Joseph the Seer.

"At the end of the Millennium, those who have not been sincere in their obedience to the Lord's reign will be permitted to show their rebellious spirit a short time under the direction of their captain Satan; and at last be overwhelmed with destruction from the presence of the good:—and the Earth, which is believed to be a creature of life, will be celestialized and gloriously beautified for the meek and pure in heart."

In conducting Divine service, the Mormons imitate other Christian sects. The senior priest commences with asking a blessing on the congregation and exercises, after which a hymn from their own collection is sung, an extempore prayer offered, another hymn sung, followed by a sermon from some one previously appointed to preach; and when the sermon is concluded, exhortations and remarks are made by any of the brethren. Then notices of the arrangement of the tithe labour for the ensuing week, and information on all secular matters, interesting to them in a church capacity, is read by the council clerk, and the congregation dismissed with a benediction. Both at the commencement and close of the service, anthems, marches, and waltzes are played by a large band of music.

The chief doctrines of the sect were thus embodied in the form of a creed by Joseph Smith their founder:

"We believe in God the Eternal Father, and in his Son Jesus Christ, and in the Holy Ghost.

"We believe that men will be punished for their own sins and not for Adam's transgression.

"We believe that through the atonement of Christ all men may be saved by obedience to the laws and ordinances of the gospel.

"We believe that these ordinances are: 1st, Faith in the Lord Jesus Christ; 2d, Repentance; 3d, Baptism by immersion for the remission of sins; 4th, Laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost.

"We believe that a man must be called of God by 'prophecy, and by laying on of hands,' by those who are in authority to preach the gospel and administer in the ordinances thereof.

"We believe in the same organization that existed in the primitive church, viz., apostles, prophets, pastors, teachers, evangelists, &c.

"We believe in the gift of tongues, prophecy, revelation, visions, healing, interpretation of tongues, &c.

"We believe the Bible to be the word of God as far as it is translated correctly; we also believe the Book of Mormon to be the word of God.

"We believe all that God has revealed, all that he does now reveal, and we believe that he will yet reveal many great and important things pertaining to the kingdom of God.

"We believe in the literal gathering of Israel, and in the restoration of the Ten Tribes. That Zion will be built upon this continent. That Christ will reign personally upon the earth, and that the earth will be renewed and receive its paradisaical glory.

"We claim the privilege of worshipping Almighty God according to the dictates of our conscience, and allow all men the same privilege, let them worship how, where, or what they may.

"We believe in being subject to kings, presidents, rulers, and magistrates; in obeying, honouring, and sustaining the law.

"We believe in being honest, true, chaste, benevolent, virtuous, and in doing good to all men; indeed we may say that we follow the admonition of Paul; 'we believe all things: we hope all things: we have endured many things, and hope to be able to endure all things. If there is any thing virtuous, lovely, or of good report, or praiseworthy, we seek thereafter."

The authoritative standard books of this sect are 'The Book of Mormon,' 'Doctrines and Covenants,' 'Voice of Warning,' 'The Gospel Reflector,' 'The Times and Seasons,' edited under the eye of the Prophet, 'The Millennial Star,' 'General Epistles of the Presidency in Deseret,' and the writings of Joseph the Seer, and Parley P. Pratt, wherever found.

The Mormons believe the Bible to be inspired, but that there have been many interpolations by the corrupters of Christianity, and many misunderstandings of several passages. These they allege have all been corrected by Joseph the Seer, to whom was given the key of all languages. The Bible is to be taken, in their view, in the most literal sense, and those are to be condemned who spiritualize its contents. The 'Book of Mormon,' and 'Doctrines and Covenants,' are maintained to be as much entitled to be called the word of God as the Bible itself. Additional revelations are made from day to day according to the exigencies of the church. They believe not in a Trinity, but rather a Duality of Persons in the Godhead, the Holy Ghost being simply the concomitant will of both the Father and the Son. God the Father is held to be a man perfected, being possessed of a body and all bodily properties like ourselves. The Son Jesus Christ is maintained to be the offspring of the Father by the Virgin Mary. The Eternal Father came to the earth and wooed and won her to be the wife of his bosom. He sent Gabriel to announce espousals of marriage, and the bridegroom and bride met on the plains of Palestine, and the Holy Babe that was born was the tabernacle prepared and assumed by the Spirit-Son, and that now constitutes a God. The Holy Ghost, unlike the Father and the Son, has no material body, but is merely a spiritual soul or existence. They hold a twofold order of the priesthood, the Melchisedek and the Aaronic; and the members of the church pay a tenth of their income for the support of the priesthood, and devote a tenth part of their time to the temple and other public works. They maintain that baptism is only duly performed by the party being immersed in water. A strange peculiarity, however, in the practice of the Mormons, is their vicarious immersion of living persons for their dead friends who have never had the opportunity of being baptized, or have neglected it when living. This they call "Baptism for the Dead," by which they allege any man may save a friend in the eternal world, unless he has committed the unpardonable sin. The child begins to be accountable at eight years of age, at which time the parents are bound to have baptism administered, but infant baptism is held to be an abomination and a sin. Regeneration is begun in baptism, and perfected by the laying on of hands, by which the recipient is baptized by the Holy Ghost, through the Melchisedek priesthood. In the Lord's Supper the Mormons use water instead of wine; and, accordingly, every Lord's Day the bishops carry round the bread and a pail of water, with a tin or glass vessel, while the congregation in their pews, both old and young, may partake.

The different ecclesiastical orders among the Mormons are thus described by Mr. Gunnison: "The hierarchy of the Mormon church has many grades of offices and gifts. The first is the presidency of three persons, which we were led to understand, answered or corresponded to the Trinity in heaven, but more particularly to Peter, James, and John, the first presidents of the gospel church.

"Next in order is the travelling High Apostolic College of twelve apostles, after the primitive church model, who have the right to preside over the stakes in any foreign country, according to seniority; then the high-priests—priests, elders, bishops, teachers, and deacons—together with evangelists or missionaries of the 'three seventies.' Each order constitutes a full quorum for the discipline of its members and transacting business belonging to its action; but appeals lie to higher orders, and the whole church is the final appellate court assembled in general council.

"Their prophets arise out of every grade, and a patriarch resides at head quarters to bless particular members, after the manner of Jacob and his sons, and that of Israel towards Esau and his brother.

"A high council is selected out of the high-priests, and consists of twelve members, which is in perpetual session to advise the presidency; in which each is free to give and argue his opinion. The president sums up the matter and gives the decision, perhaps in opposition to a great majority, but to which all must yield implicit obedience; and probably there has never been known, under the present head, a dissent when the 'awful nod' has been given, for it is the 'stamp of fate and sanction of a god.'"

It is not unfrequently denied by the Mormons that they hold the lawfulness of the practice of polygamy, or the marriage of one man to a plurality of wives. But the testimony of all travellers to the Salt Lake valley, and residents in Deseret is uniform on this point. The addition of wives to a man's family after the first, is called a "sealing to him," which constitutes a relation with all the rights and sanctions of matrimony. The seer alone has the power which he can use by delegation of granting the privilege of increasing the number of wives; and as he can authorize, so he can annul the marriage and dissolve the relationship between the parties.

In their remote settlement of the Far West, the Mormons have made rapid material progress, though their moral condition seems to be of the most degraded character. They have sent missionaries into almost all parts of the world, and have successfully propagated their system in England, Scotland, and more especially in Wales, where they have obtained thousands of converts. They have made little or no progress in Germany, but have been very successful in Denmark, Sweden, and Norway. In England and Wales, the census of 1851 reports as many as 222 places of worship belonging to this body, most of them, however, being merely rooms. The number of sittings in these places of worship is stated to be 30,783. But since that time the sect has made great additions to its numbers in Great Britain and Ireland, more especially among the working classes, many of whom are yearly attracted to emigrate to the Salt Lake valley, buoyed up with expectations which are only doomed to meet with bitter disappointment.

MORNING HYMN. The author of the 'Apostolical Constitutions' mentions a sacred hymn for the morning, which, however, he calls the morning prayer. Other writers term it the hymn, the an-gelical hymn, and the great doxology. (See ANGELICAL HYMN.) The Morning Hymn ran in these words: "Glory be to God on high, on earth peace, good will towards men. We praise thee, we laud thee, we bless thee, we glorify thee, we worship thee by the great High Priest, thee the true God, the only unbegotten, whom no one can approach, for thy great glory, O Lord, heavenly King, God the Father Almighty: Lord God, the Father of Christ, the immaculate Lamb, who taketh away the sin of the world, receive our prayer, thou that sittest upon the cherubims. For thou only art holy, thou only Lord Jesus, the Christ of God, the God of every created being, and our King. By whom unto thee be glory, honour, and adoration."

Chrysostom speaks of this hymn as said daily at morning prayer. It was used anciently in the communion service, and among the monks as an ordinary hymn in their daily morning service. This hymn is used also in the modern Greek church.

MORNING SERVICE. According to the Apostolical Constitutions the morning service in the ancient Christian church commenced with singing the sixty-third psalm, which Chrysostom alleges to have been appointed by the fathers of the church to be said every morning "as a spiritual song and medicine to blot out our sins; to raise our souls and inflame them with a mighty fire of devotion; to make us overflow with goodness and love, and send us with such preparation to approach and appear before God." Athanasius also recommends this psalm to virgins and others as proper to be said privately in their morning devotions. Immediately after this psalm in the morning service follow the prayers for the several orders of catechumens, energumens, candidates for baptism, and penitents. To these succeeded the prayers of the faithful or communicants, that is the prayer for the peace of the world, and all orders of men in the church. At the close of these prayers the deacon thus exhorted the people to pray for peace and prosperity throughout the day ensuing and their whole lives: "Let us beg of God his mercies and compassionate, that this morning and this day, and all the time of our pilgrimage, may be passed by us in peace and without sin: let us beg of God that he would send us the angel of peace, and give us a Christian end, and be gracious and merciful unto us. Let us commend ourselves and one another to the living God by his only-begotten Son." The deacon having now bid the people commend themselves to God, the bishop offered up the COMMENDATORY PRAYER (which see), or, as it is also called, the Morning Thanksgiving. After this the deacon bids the people bow their heads, and receive the imposition of hands, or the bishop's benediction, which was conveyed in these words: "O God, faithful and true, that showest mercy to thousands and ten thousands of them that love thee; who art the friend of the humble, and defender of the poor, whose aid all things stand in need of, because all things serve thee: look down upon this thy people, who bow their heads unto thee, and bless them with thy spiritual benediction: keep them as the apple of the eye: preserve them in piety and righteousness, and vouchsafe to bring them to eternal life, in Christ Jesus thy beloved Son, with whom unto thee be glory, honour, and adoration, in the Holy Ghost, now and for ever, world without end. Amen." At the close of this solemn prayer the deacon dismisses the congregation with the usual form of words, "Depart in peace."

MORPHEUS, the god of sleep among the ancient Greeks, and the originator of dreams.

MORS (Lat. death), one of the infernal deities among the ancient Romans.

MORTAL SINS. In the theology of the Church of Rome, sins are divided into two great classes, called mortal and venial. The former is defined to be a grievous offence or transgression against the Law of God; and it is styled mortal, because "it kills the soul by depriving it of its true life, which is sanctifying grace; and because it brings everlasting death and damnation on the soul." The mortal or deadly sins are reckoned by Romish divines seven in number,—pride, covetousness, lust, anger, gluttony, envy, sloth. All the commandments of the church are declared to be binding under pain of mortal sin. Those who die in mortal sin are alleged to go direct to the place of eternal torment. This distinction as taught by the Romanists was unknown to the ancient church. Augustine indeed speaks of mortal sins, such as murder, theft, and adultery, because they were not pardoned without the solemnity of a public repentance.

MORTAR (HOLY), used in the Romish Church for cementing altar-stone and relie-tomb. It is consecrated by the prayer, "O most High God, sanctify and hallow these creatures of lime and sand, Through Christ our Lord. Amen." Holy water is used in the preparation of this mortar, and when made the Pontiff, with his mitre on, blesses it.

MORTMAIN (mortua manu, by a dead hand), a donation or bequest of lands to some spiritual person or corporation and their successors.

MORTUARIES, a sort of ecclesiastical heriots, being a customary gift claimed by and due to the incumbent in very many parishes on the death of his parishioners.

MOSCABEANS, a Mohammedan sect, who hold the notions of the ANTHROPOMORPHITES (which see) in regard to the Deity, believing him to be possessed of a material body like a human being.

MOSCHATARA, one of the seven planets mentioned by Ptolemy, as having been worshipped by the ancient Arabians.

MOSHABBEHITES, or assimilators, a heretical sect of the Mohammedans, who maintain that there is a resemblance between God and his creatures. They suppose him to be a figure composed of members or parts, either spiritual or corporeal, and that he is capable of moving from one place to another. Some persons belonging to this sect believe that God can assume a human form as Gabriel does, and in proof of this they refer to Mohammed's words, that he saw the Lord in a most beautiful form, and that in the Old Testament Moses is said to have talked with God face to face.

MOSLEMS, a name derived from the Arabic verb salama, to be devoted to God, and applied to those who believe in the Koran, and who, in the Mohammedan sense of the word, form the body of the faithful.

MOSQUE, a Mohammedan place of religious worship. The Arabic term is Musjid, an oratory or place of prayer. Mosques are built of stone, and in the figure of a square. In front of the principal gate is a square court, paved with white marble, and all round the court are low galleries, the roofs of which are supported by marble pillars. In these the Mohammedans perform their ablutions before entering the place of prayer. The walls of the mosques are all white, except where the name of God is written in large Arabic characters. In each mosque there are a great number of lamps, between which hang crystal rings, ostrich-eggs, and other curiosities, which make a fine show when the lamps are lighted. About each mosque there are six high towers, each having three little open galleries raised one above another. These towers, which are called Minarets, are covered with lead, and adorned with gilding and other ornaments, and from these Minarets the people are summoned to prayer by certain officers appointed for the purpose, whom they call Muezzins. Most of the mosques have a kind of hospital attached to them, in which travellers, whether believers or infidels, may find entertainment for three days. Each mosque has also a place called Tarbé, which is the burying-place of its founders; within which there is a tomb six or seven feet in length, and covered with velvet or green satin; at each end are two wax tapers, and around it are several seats provided for those who read the Koran, and pray for the souls of the deceased. No person is allowed to enter a mosque with his shoes or stockings on; and hence the pavements are covered with pieces of stuff, sewed together in broad strips, each wide enough to hold a row of men in a kneeling, sitting, or prostrate position. Women are not allowed to enter the mosques, but are obliged to remain in the outer porches of the building.

MOSTEHEB, a word used by Mohammedan doctors to denote those things which ought to be observed, but which if neglected do not merit punishment nor even a reprimand.

MOTAZELISTS, or Separatists, a Mohammedan sect so called, because they separated from the orthodox. They are said to have twenty subdivisions, but all agree in excluding eternal attributes from the Divine essence, saying, that the Most High God knows not by knowledge, but by his essence; and they were led to this subtle distinction by the belief that their opponents, the Attributists, gave these attributes an actual existence, thus making them so many gods. Their object was to avoid the Christian doctrine of Persons in the Divine Essence. They also maintained the creation of the Koran; and some of them declared that its composition was no miracle, since it might be surpassed in eloquence.

MOTECALLEMUN, those who make profession of, or have written upon, the scholastic theology of the Mohammedans. See KELAM.

MOTETT, a term used in church music to denote a short piece of music, highly elaborated, of which the subject is taken from the psalms or hymns used in the Church of England.

MOURNING. The modes of giving expression to sorrow have varied in different ages and countries. In the East the mourner has always been remarkable for his dejected and haggard aspect. His dress is slovenly, his hair dishevelled, his beard untrimmed, and his whole apparel in a state of negligence and disorder. The Israelites of old were wont to rend their garments, sprinkle dust upon their heads, and to put on sackcloth and other mourning apparel. Hence we find it said of Joshua when the armies of Israel were compelled to flee before their enemies, that (Josh. vii. 6.) "he rent his clothes, and fell to the earth upon his face before the ark of the Lord until the eventide, he and the elders of Israel, and put dust upon their heads." And Jeremiah, when he foresaw the approaching desolation of their country, calls upon the Jews to prepare for the funeral obsequies of their nation in these affecting words, ix. 17, 18, "Thus saith the Lord of hosts, Consider ye, and call for the mourning women, that they may come; and send for cunning women, that they may come: and let them make haste, and take up a wailing for us, that our eyes may run down with tears, and our eyelids gush out with waters." On the Egyptian monuments also are seen represented various instances of extreme grief, indicated by similar tokens. Sir J. G. Wilkinson, who may be regarded as the highest modern authority on all that regards Egyptian antiquities, gives a very graphic description of the modes of expressing grief in the ancient land of the Pharaohs. "When any one died," he says, "all the females of his family, covering their heads and faces with dust and mud, and leaving the body in the house, ran through the streets, with their bosoms exposed, striking themselves, and uttering loud lamentations. Their friends and relations joined them as they went, uniting in the same demonstrations of grief; and when the deceased was a person of consideration, many strangers accompanied them, out of respect to his memory. Hired mourners were also employed to add, by their feigned demonstrations of grief, to the real lamentations of the family, and to heighten the show of respect paid to the deceased. 'The men, in like manner, girding their dress below their waist, went through the town smiting their breast,' and throwing dust and mud upon their heads. But the greater number of mourners consisted of women, as is usual in Egypt at the present day; and since the mode of lamentation now practised at Cairo is probably very similar to that of former times, a description of it may serve to illustrate one of the customs of ancient Egypt.

"As soon as the marks of approaching death are observed, the females of the family raise 'the cry of lamentation; one generally commencing in a low tone, and exclaiming, 'O my misfortune!' which is immediately taken up by another with increased vehemence; and all join in similar exclamations, united with piercing cries. They call on the deceased, according to their degree of relationship; as, 'O my father!' 'O my mother!' 'O my sister!' 'O my brother!' 'O my aunt!' or, according to the friendship and connection subsisting between them, as, 'O my master!' 'O lord of the house!' 'O my friend!' 'O my dear, my soul, my eyes!' and many of the neighbours, as well as the friends of the family, join in the lamentation. Hired mourning women are also engaged, who utter cries of grief, and praise the virtues of the deceased; while the females of the house rend their clothes, beat themselves, and make other violent demonstrations of sorrow. A sort of funeral dirge is also chanted by the mourning women to the sound of the tambourine, from which the tinkling plates have been removed. This continues until the funeral takes place, which, if the person died in the morning, is performed the same day; but if in the afternoon or evening, it is deferred until the morning, the lamentations being continued all night."

Mohammed forbade the wailing of women at funerals, but notwithstanding this prohibition of the Prophet, the custom is still found even where the Koran is in other respects most firmly believed. Thus Mr. Lane tells us that in modern Egypt he has seen mourning women of the lower classes following a bier, having their faces, which were unveiled, and their head-coverings and their bosoms besmeared with mud. The same writer informs us, that "the funeral of a devout sheikh differs in some respects from that of ordinary mortals; and the women, instead of wailing, rend the air with the shrill and quavering cries of joy, called zugharact; and if these cries are discontinued but for a minute, the bearers of the bier protest they cannot proceed, that a supernatural power rivets them to the spot."

The noisy mourning of the Egyptians appears to have been imitated by the Israelites, who hired professional mourners eminently skilled in the art of lamentation, and these, commencing their doleful strains immediately after the person had expired, continued at intervals until the dead body had been buried. Instrumental music was afterwards introduced on these occasions, the trumpet being used at the funerals of the wealthy, and the pipe or flute at those of the humbler classes. Such were the minstrels whom our Lord found in the house of Jairus, making a noise round the bed on which the dead body of his daughter lay. The mournful wailing over the dead was more particularly violent when the women were engaged in washing the corpse; in perfuming it; and when it was carried out for burial. While the funeral procession was on its way to the place of interment, the melancholy cries of the women were intermingled with the devout singing of the men. Hired mourners were in use among the Greeks, at least as early as the time of the Trojan war, as is seen in the description which Homer gives of a band of mourners surrounding the body of Hector, whose funeral dirge they sung with many sighs and tears.

Another mode of expressing intense sorrow in the East among the relations of the dead was by cutting and slashing their bodies with daggers and knives. (See CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH.) To this barbarous custom Jeremiah alludes, xlviii. 37, "For every head shall be bald, and every beard clipped: upon all the hands shall be cuttings, and upon the loins sackcloth." Moses forbids the practice, Lev. xix. 28, "Ye shall not make any cuttings in your flesh for the dead, nor print any marks upon you: I am the Lord;" and again, Deut. xiv. 1, "Ye are the children of the Lord your God. Ye shall not cut yourselves, nor make any baldness between your eyes for the dead." The Persians express their sorrow with similar extravagance when celebrating the anniversary of the death of HOSSEIN (which see).

The time of mourning in ancient times was longer or shorter according to the dignity of the person who had died. The Egyptians mourned for Jacob seventy days. Among the ancient Greeks the mourning lasted till the thirtieth day after the funeral. At Sparta the time of mourning was limited to eleven days. During the period allotted to mourning the relatives remained at home in strict seclusion, never appearing in public. They were accustomed to wear a black dress, and they tore, cut off, and sometimes shaved their hair. The Jews also in ordinary cases of sorrow let their hair hang loose and dishevelled upon their shoulders; when their grief was more severe, they cut off their hair, and in a sudden and violent paroxysm of grief they plucked the hair off with their hands. To this there is an allusion in Ezra ix. 3, "And when I heard this thing, I rent my garment and my mantle, and plucked off the hair of my head and of my beard, and sat down astonished."

It has been usual from remote ages for mourners to wear for a time a dress or badge of a particular colour. The official mourners at an ancient Egyptian funeral bound their heads with fillets of blue. The same colour is still adopted by mourners in modern Egypt. The dress worn by chief mourners at a Chinese funeral is composed of coarse white cloth, with bandages of the same worn round the head. In Burmah also white is the mourning colour. The ancient Greeks, as we have already noticed, wore outer garments of black, and the same colour was worn by mourners of both sexes among the ancient Romans under the Republic. Under the Empire, however, a change took place in this particular, white veils being at that time worn by the women, while the men continued to wear a black dress. Men appeared in a mourning dress only for a few days, but women for a year when they lost a husband or a parent. From the time of Domitian, the women wore nothing but white garments, without any ornaments of gold, jewels, or pearls. The men let their hair and beards grow, and wore no wreaths of flowers on their heads while the days of mourning lasted. Mourning was not used among the Greeks for children under three years of age.

It was an invariable custom among Oriental mourners to lay aside all jewels and other ornaments. Hence we find Jehovah calling upon the Israelites thus to manifest their heartfelt sorrow for sin, Exod. xxxiii. 5, 6, "For the Lord had said unto Moses, Say unto the children of Israel, Ye are a stiff-necked people: I will come up into the midst of thee in a moment, and consume thee: therefore now put off thy ornaments from thee, that I may know what to do unto thee. And the children of Israel stripped themselves of their ornaments by the mount Horeb." The same practice was followed by the ancient Greeks and Romans. In Judea mourners were often clothed in sackcloth of hair. To sit in sackcloth and ashes is a very frequent Oriental expression to denote mourning. In deep sorrow persons sometimes threw themselves on the ground and rolled in the dust. In the Old Testament we find various instances of individuals expressing their sorrow by sprinkling themselves with ashes. Thus Tamar "put ashes on her head," and Mordecai "rent his clothes and put on sackcloth with ashes." In the same way mourners sometimes put dust upon their heads. Thus Joshua, when lamenting the defeat of the Israelites before Ai, "rent his clothes and fell to the earth upon his face, he and the elders of Israel, and put dust upon their heads." In some cases mourners, with their heads uncovered, laid their hands upon their heads, and when in great distress they covered their heads. Haman, when his plot against Mordecai was discovered, "hasted to his house mourning, and having his head covered." To cover the face, also, was among the Jews, as among almost all nations, a symptom of deep mourning. Thus it is said of David when he heard of Absalom's death, "he covered his face and cried with a loud voice." Covering the lips also was a very ancient sign of mourning. Thus Ezekiel, when his wife died, is commanded, xxiv. 17, "Forbear to cry, make no mourning for the dead, bind the tire of thine head upon thee, and put on thy shoes upon thy feet, and cover not thy lips, and eat not the bread of men."

The Hebrew prophets sometimes describe mourners, when in deep distress, as sitting upon the ground. Thus Lam. ii. 10, "The elders of the daughter of Zion sit upon the ground, and keep silence: they have cast up dust upon their heads; they have girded themselves with sackcloth: the virgins of Jerusalem hang down their heads to the ground." A very common sign, more especially of penitential sorrow, was smiting upon the breast. This, indeed, among Eastern females, is a frequent mode of displaying excessive grief. They beat their breasts, tear their flesh and faces with their nails. The modern Greeks at their funerals employ women, who repeat a deep and hollow succession of prolonged monosyllables. The Chinese women, also, make loud lamentations and wailings over the dead, particularly in the case of the death of the head of a family. Mungo Park, in his Travels in Africa, mentions that among various tribes of negroes, when a person of consequence dies, the relations and neighbours meet together and engage in loud wailings. The same practice is followed at an Irish wake, when the keeners or professional mourners give way to the most vociferous expressions of grief.

Among the modern Jews the mourning which follows the death of a relative continues for seven days, during which the mourners never venture abroad, nor transact any business, but sit upon the ground without shoes, receiving the condolences of their brethren. They are not allowed to shave their beards, cut their nails, or wash themselves for thirty days. Among the natives of Northern Guinea, all the blood relations of the deceased are required to shave their heads, and wear none but the poorest and most tattered garments for one month. The wives are expected to come together every morning and evening, and spend an hour in bewailing their husband. This term of mourning is continued for one month, after which the male relations come together, and the wives of the deceased are distributed among them like any other property. They are then permitted to wash themselves, put away the ordinary badges of mourning, and before taking up with their new husbands, they are permitted to visit their own relations and spend a few weeks with them.

In Japan mourners are dressed in white, and remain shut in the house with the door fastened, and at the end of that time they shave and dress, and return to their ordinary employments. Bright colours, however, are not to be worn, nor a Sinto temple entered for thirteen months.

The early Christians, who were accustomed to contemplate death not as a melancholy but a joyful event, gave no countenance to immoderate grief, or excessive mourning, on occasion of the decease of a Christian brother or sister. The mourning customs of the Jews, accordingly, were completely discarded, as entirely inconsistent with Christian faith and hope. Some of the fathers actually censure the practice of wearing black as a sign of mourning. Augustine especially speaks with severity on this point. "Why," says he, "should we disfigure ourselves with black, unless we would imitate unbelieving nations, not only in their wailing for the dead, but also in their mourning apparel? Be assured these are foreign and unlawful usages; but if lawful, they are not becoming." No rules were laid down in the early Christian church as to the duration of mourning for the dead. This matter was left to custom and the feeling of the parties concerned. Heathen customs, however, gradually crept into the church, which called forth the animadversions of some of the fathers. Thus Augustine complains of some in his time who superstitiously observed nine days of mourning in imitation of the Novendiale of the Pagan Romans.

MOVEABLE FEASTS, those feasts observed in various sections of the Christian church which fall on different days in the calendar in each year; as for instance Easter and the feasts calculated from Easter. The English Book of Common Prayer contains several tables for calculating Easter, and also rules to know when the moveable feasts and holidays begin. Thus, Easter-day, on which the rest depend, is always the first Sunday after the full moon, which happens upon or next after the twenty-first day of March, and if the full moon happens upon a Sunday, Easter-day is the Sunday after. Advent Sunday is always the nearest Sunday to the feast of St. Andrew, whether before or after. The moveable feasts before Easter are Septuagesima Sunday, nine weeks; Sexagesima Sunday, eight weeks; Quinquagesima Sunday, seven weeks; and Quadragesima Sunday, six weeks. The moveable feasts after Easter are Rogation Sunday, five weeks; Ascension Day, forty days; Whit-Sunday, seven weeks; Trinity Sunday, eight weeks.

MOZARABIC LITURGY. See LITURGIES.

MOZDARIANS, a heretical Mohammedan sect who held it possible for God to be a liar and unjust. Mozdar, the founder of the sect, declared those persons to be infidels who took upon them the administration of public affairs. He condemned all indeed who did not embrace his opinions as chargeable with infidelity.

MUDITA, one of the five kinds of BHAWANA (which see), or meditation, in which the Buddhist priests are required to engage. The mudita is the meditation of joy, but it is not the joy arising from earthly possessions. It feels indifferent to individuals, and refers to all sentient beings. In the exercise of this mode of meditation, the priest must express the wish, "May the good fortune of the prosperous never pass away; may each one receive his own appointed reward."

MUEZZIN, an officer belonging to a Mohammedan mosque, whose duty it is to summon the faithful to prayers five times a-day at the appointed hours. Stationed on one of the minarets he chants in a peculiar manner the form of proclamation. Before doing so, however, the Muezzin ought to repeat the following prayer: "O my God! give me piety; purify me: thou alone hast the power. Thou art my benefactor and my master, O Lord! Thou art towards me as I desire, may I be towards thee as thou desirest. My God! cause my interior to be better than my exterior. Direct all my actions to rectitude. O God! deign in thy mercy to direct my will towards that which is good. Grant me at the same time, true honour and spiritual poverty, O thou, the most merciful of the merciful." After this prayer, he must make proclamation in the following terms: "God is great (four times repeated); I bear witness, that there is no God but God (twice repeated); I bear witness, that Mohammed is the prophet of God (twice repeated); Come to the Temple of salvation (twice repeated); God is great, God is most great; there is no God but God, and Mohammed is his prophet." The same proclamation is made at the five canonical hours, but at morning prayer, the Muezzin must add, "Prayer is better than sleep" (twice repeated).

MUFTI, the head of the Mohammedan faith in Turkey, and the chief ecclesiastical ruler. He is held in the highest respect, and his authority is very great throughout the whole of the Ottoman Empire. The person chosen to this responsible office is always one noted for his learning and the strict purity of his life. The election of the Mufti is vested in the Sultan, who uniformly receives him with the utmost respect, rising up and advancing seven steps to meet him; and when he has occasion to write to the Mufti, asking his opinion on any important point, he addresses him in such terms as these: "Thou art the wisest of the wise, instructed in all knowledge, the most excellent of the excellent, abstaining from things unlawful, the spring of virtue and true science, heir of the prophetic and apostolic doctrines, resolver of the problems of faith, revealer of the orthodox articles, key of the treasures of truth, the light to doubtful allegories, strengthened with the grace of the Supreme Guide and Legislator of mankind. May the most high God perpetuate thy virtue."

The office of Mufti is not restricted to religious but extends also to civil matters. He is consulted in all important points by the Sultan and the government. On such occasions the case is proposed to him in writing, and underneath he states his decision in brief but explicit terms, accompanied with these emphatic words, in which he repudiates all claims to infallibility, "God knows better." In civil or criminal suits the judgment of the Cadi or judge is regulated by the opinion which may be given by the Mufti.

In all matters of state the Sultan takes no step of importance without consulting this supreme ecclesiastical officer. No capital sentence can be pronounced upon a dignitary; neither war nor peace can be proclaimed, without the FETVA which secures the sanction of the Mufti, who generally, before giving his decision, consults the College of Ulemas. This privilege possessed by the head of the Mohammedan religion, or Sheikh-ul-Islam, as he is often called, has on some occasions been abused for the purpose of dethroning Sultans, and handing them over to the rage of the Janissaries. It has sometimes been necessary for a despotic Sultan to deprive a Mufti of his office, who happened by his obstinate and refractory conduct to obstruct the designs of government. Nay, we read in history that Mourad IV. actually beheaded one of these high ecclesiastical functionaries who ventured to oppose his will. The decisions of the Mufti are understood to be regulated by the teaching of the Koran, but at the same time he is considered as possessing a discretionary power to interpret the Sacred Writings in a liberal sense, accommodated to peculiar circumstances and exigencies. Such is the high estimation in which the office of these sacred dignitaries is held, that should one of them fall into crime, he is degraded before being punished. When guilty of treason he is brayed to pieces in a mortar.

MUGGLETONIANS, a sect which arose in England about the year 1657, deriving their name from Ludovic Muggleton, a journeyman tailor, who, with his associate Reeves, claimed to be possessed of the Spirit of prophecy. These two men declared their mission to be wholly of a spiritual character, and that they were the two last witnesses referred to in Rev. xi. 3—6, "And I will give power unto my two witnesses, and they shall prophesy a thousand two hundred and threescore days, clothed in sackcloth. These are the two olive trees, and the two candlesticks standing before the God of the earth. And if any man will hurt them, fire proceedeth out of their mouth, and devoureth their enemies: and if any man will hurt them, he must in this manner be killed. These have power to shut heaven, that it rain not in the days of their prophecy: and have power over waters to turn them to blood, and to smite the earth with all plagues, as often as they will." Reeves affirmed that the Lord Jesus from the throne of his glory thus addressed him: "I have given thee understanding of my mind in the Scriptures above all men in the world: I have chosen thee, my last messenger, for a great work unto this bloody unbelieving world; and I have given thee Ludovic Muggleton to be thy mouth." Thus Reeves professed to act the part of Moses, and Muggleton that of Aaron; and they boldly asserted that if any man ventured to oppose them, they had received power to destroy him by fire, that is, by curses proceeding from their mouths. They denied the doctrine of the Trinity, and alleged that God the Father assumed a human form and suffered on the cross; and that Elijah was taken up bodily into heaven for the purpose of returning to earth as the representative of the Father in bodily shape. After the death of Reeves, his companion Muggleton, who survived him for many years, pretended that a double portion of the Spirit now rested upon him. Among other strange opinions, he taught that the devil became incarnate in Eve, and filled her with a wickedness producing what he termed "unclean reason," which is the only devil we have now to fear. Within the last thirty years a small remnant of the sect of Muggletonians was still to be found in England, but no trace of them occurs in the Report of the last Census of 1851, so that in all probability they are quite extinct.

MULCIBER, a surname of Vulcan, the Roman god of fire. The euphemistic name of Mulciber is frequently applied to him by the Latin poets.

MUMBO JUMBO, a mysterious personage, frightful to the whole race of African diatrons. According to the description of Mr. Wilson, "he is a strong, athletic man, disguised in dry plantain leaves, and bearing a rod in his hand, which he uses on proper occasions with the most unsparing severity. When invoked by an injured husband, he appears about the outskirts of the village at dusk, and commences all sorts of pantomimes. After supper he ventures to the town hall, where he commences his antics, and every grown person, male or female, must be present, or subject themselves to the suspicion of having been kept away by a guilty conscience. The performance is kept up until midnight, when Mumbo suddenly springs with the agility of the tiger upon the offender, and chastises her most soundly, amidst the shouts and laughter of the multitude, in which the other women join more heartily than any body else, with the view, no doubt, of raising themselves above the suspicion of such infidelity."

MUNTRAS, mystic verses or incantations which form the grand charm of the Hindu Brahmans. They occupy a very prominent place in the Hindu religion. The constant and universal belief is, that when the Brahman repeats the Muntras, the deities must come obedient to his call, agreeably to the favourite Sanskrit verse:—"The universe is under the power of the deities, the deities are under the power of the Muntras, the Muntras are under the power of the Brahmans; consequently, the Brahmans are gods." The Muntras are the essence of the Vedas, and the united power of Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva. See GAYATRI.

MURTIA, a surname of Venus at Rome, supposed to be identical with Myrtia, because the myrtle tree was consecrated to this goddess.

MUSEIA, a festival with contests celebrated in honour of the Muses every fifth year at Thespiæ in Bœotia.

MUSERNI, an atheistical sect among the Mohammedans, who endeavoured to conceal from all except the initiated their gross denial of the existence of a God. They attempted to account for the existence and growth of all things by referring to the inherent power of Nature.

MUSES, originally nymphs who presided over song, and afterwards divinities, who were the patrons of the arts and sciences, but more especially of the art of poetry. They were generally regarded as the daughters of Zeus and Mnemosyne, though some affirm them to have been descended from Uranus and Ge. Their birth-place is said to have been Pieria, at the foot of Mount Olympus. Some difference of opinion has existed as to the number of the Muses. Originally they are said to have been three, who were worshipped on Mount Helicon in Bœotia, namely, Melete, Mneme, and Aœde. At one period they were reckoned to be four, at another seven, and at another eight. At length, however, they came to be recognized as nine. This is the number mentioned by Homer and Hesiod, the latter poet being the first who mentions their names, which are Clio, Euterpe, Thalia, Melpomene, Terpsichore, Erato, Polyhymnia, Urania, and Calliope. They were regarded by the earlier Greek poets as residing on Mount Olympus, and as being themselves the source of the inspiration of song among men. Hence the frequent and earnest invocations to the Muses. In many instances we find Apollo classed along with the Nine, who like him are viewed as possessing prophetic power. The original seat of the worship of the Muses was Thessaly, particularly the immediate neighbourhood of Mount Olympus, whence it passed into Bœotia. A solemn festival called MUSEIA (which see), was celebrated on Mount Helicon by the Thespians. Mount Parnassus was sacred to the Muses, and also the Castalian spring near which stood a temple dedicated to their worship. In course of time the Muses were worshipped throughout almost every part of Greece, and temples were reared and sacrifices offered to them at Athens, Sparta, and Corinth. The libations offered to them consisted of water or milk and of honey.

MUSIC (SACRED). The art of music may be traced back to a very early period of the world's history; it must have been known indeed to the Antediluvians, as is plain from Gen. iv. 21, "And his brother's name was Jubal: he was the father of all such as handle the harp and organ." In all probability the most ancient mode of handing down the memory of events was by poetry and song, which were admirably fitted to enbalm interesting or important transactions in the minds and hearts of the people. The ancient Hebrews held music to be an essential part of their religious ceremonies, festivals, nuptial rejoicings, or mourning occasions. We find the Israelites having recourse to music, both vocal and instrumental, in the solemn service of thanksgiving which followed their deliverance at the Red Sea.

For any degree of skill which they possessed in the musical art, they were chiefly indebted to the Egyptians. On this point, Sir J. G. Wilkinson makes some valuable observations. "The Israelites," he says, "not only considered it becoming to delight in music and the dance, but persons of rank deemed them a necessary part of their education. Like the Egyptians, with whom they had so long resided, and many of whose customs they adopted, the Jews carefully distinguished sacred from profane music. They introduced it at public and private rejoicings, at funerals, and in religious services; but the character of the airs, like the words of their songs, varied according to the occasion; and they had canticles of mirth, of praise, of thanksgiving, and of lamentation. Some were epithalamia, or songs composed to celebrate marriages; others to commemorate a victory, or the accession of a prince; to return thanks to the Deity, or to celebrate his praises; to lament a general calamity, or a private affliction; and others again were peculiar to their festive meetings. On these occasions they introduced the harp, lute, tabret, and various instruments, together with songs and dancing, and the guests were entertained nearly in the same manner as at an Egyptian feast. In the temple, and in the religious ceremonies, the Jews had female as well as male performers, who were generally daughters of the Levites, as the Pallaces of Thebes were either of the royal family, or the daughters of priests; and these musicians were attached exclusively to the service of religion, as I believe them also to have been in Egypt, whether men or women. David was not only remarkable for his taste and skill in music, but took a delight in introducing it on every occasion. And seeing that the Levites were numerous, and no longer employed as formerly in carrying the boards, veils, and vessels of the tabernacle, its abode being fixed at Jerusalem, he appointed a great part of them to sing and play on instruments at the religious festivals.

"Solomon, again, at the dedication of the temple, employed 'one hundred and twenty priests to sound with trumpets;' (2 Chron. v. 12;) and Josephus pretends that no less than 200,000 musicians were present at that ceremony, besides the same number of singers who were Levites.

"The Jews regarded music as an indispensable part of religion, and the harp held a conspicuous rank in the consecrated band. (2 Sam. vi. 5.) David was himself celebrated as the inventor of musical instruments, as well as for his skill with the harp; he frequently played it during the most solemn ceremonies; and we find that, in the earliest times, the Israelites used the timbrel or tambourine, in celebrating the praises of the Deity; Miriam herself, 'a prophetess and sister of Aaron,' (Exod. xv. 20, having used it while chanting the overthrow of Pharaoh's host. With most nations it has been considered right to introduce music into the service of religion; and if the Egyptian priesthood made it so principal a part of their earnest inquiries, and inculcated the necessity of applying to its study, not as an amusement, or in consequence of any feeling excited by the reminiscences accompanying a national air, but from a sincere admiration of the science, and of its effects upon the human mind, we can readily believe that it was sanctioned and even deemed indispensable in many of their religious rites. Hence the sacred musicians were of the order of priests, and appointed to this service, like the Levites among the Jews; and the Egyptian sacred bands were probably divided and superintended in the same manner as among that people. At Jerusalem Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun, were the three directors of the music of the tabernacle under David, and of the temple under Solomon. Asaph had four sons, Jeduthun six, and Heman fourteen. These twenty-four Levites, sons of the three great masters of sacred music, were at the head of twenty-four bands of musicians who served the temple in turns. Their number then was always great, especially at the grand solemnities. They were ranged in order about the altar of burnt sacrifices. Those of the family of Kohath were in the middle, those of Merari at the left, and those of Gershom on the right hand. The whole business of their life was to learn and practise music; and, being provided with an ample maintenance, nothing prevented their prosecuting their studies, and arriving at perfection in the art. Even in the temple, and in the ceremonies of religion, female musicians were admitted as well as men; and they were generally the daughters of Levites. Heman had three daughters, who were proficient in music; and the 9th Psalm is addressed to Benjamin, chief of the band of young women who sang in the temple. Ezra, in his narrative of those he brought back from the captivity, reckons two hundred singing men and singing women; and Zechariah, Aziel, and Shemiramoth, are said to have presided over the seventh band of music, which was that of the young women."

But while special arrangements were thus made for the due performance of the musical part of the Jewish service connected with the first temple, that of the second temple was probably of a far inferior description; and if we may take the service of the modern Jewish synagogue, as bearing some resemblance to the services of the latter days of the Hebrew state, it gives no idea, at all events, of the music for which the psalms of David were composed, and by which their solemn performance, as a part of public worship, was accompanied.

Among the ancient Heathens music was looked upon as a sacred exercise, Apollo being the tutelary god of musicians, and the whole of the Nine Muses being singers, who, by their sweet songs, delighted the ears of the gods, while the Sirens charmed the ears of men. The earliest specimens of sacred music were the Theurgic Hymns, or Songs of Incantation, which are supposed to have originated in Egypt.

Diodorus Siculus alleges, that the Egyptians prohibited the cultivation of music, but this is contradicted by Plato, who studied and taught in Egypt. The Theurgic Hymns were succeeded by popular or heroic hymns sung in praise of some particular divinity. Those sacred to Apollo and Mars were called Pæans, those to Bacchus Dithyrambics. The music of the Romans was far inferior to that of the Greeks.

Among the early Christians sacred music formed one of the principal parts of their religious services. It was with them a habitual, a favourite employment, the psalms of David, along with some sacred hymns, being adapted to appropriate airs, which were sung with the utmost enthusiasm. No specimens, however, exist of the melodies used by the Christians of the early church. Some of them would probably be borrowed from the Hebrew worship, others from the Pagan temples. Sometimes the psalm was sung in full swell by the whole assembly; at other times it was distributed into parts, while the chorus was sung by the entire congregation. Isidore of Seville says that the singing of the primitive Christians differed little from reading. At the midnight meetings, thirty, forty, and even fifty psalms were often sung, the delightful exercise being protracted till the morning dawn. In fulfilment of the exhortation of the Apostle Paul, the primitive Christians sang psalms and hymns and spiritual songs. And Pliny, in his celebrated letter to the Emperor Trajan, refers to the custom as prevailing among the Christians, of singing hymns to Christ as God. Nor was the practice limited to the orthodox brethren in the early church; heretics, also, recognizing the power which sacred melody exercises over the heart, availed themselves of church music as well calculated to serve the purpose of propagating their peculiar tenets.

We have seen that, in the time of David, singers were set apart in the Jewish church to conduct this important part of the devotional service of the sanctuary. These separate officers were continued in the temple and synagogue worship; and a similar class of functionaries was chosen in the apostolic and primitive Christian churches. It is somewhat remarkable, that the performance of the psalmody in public worship was restricted by the council of Laodicea to a distinct order in the church, styled by them canonical singers; but the psalms or hymns, which were to be sung, were regulated by the bishops or presbyters.

The first rise of the singers, as an inferior order of the clergy under the name of Psalmiste, or Psalter, a name evidently of Greek origin, appears to have been about the beginning of the fourth century. The design of their institution was to revive and improve the ancient psalmody; and for this purpose the temporary arrangement was adopted by the council of Laodicea, of forbidding all others to sing in the church, except only the canonical singers, who went up into the ambo or reading-desk, and sung out of a book. That such a mode of conducting public worship was only intended to be for a time, is evident from the circumstance, that several of the fathers of the church mention the practice as existing in their time, of the people singing all together. The order of Psalter, on their appointment to office, required no imposition of hands, or solemn consecration, but simply received their office from a presbyter, who used this form of words as laid down by the council of Carthage: "See that thou believe in thy heart what thou singest with thy mouth, and approve in thy works what thou believest in thy heart."

The service of the early church usually commenced, as among ourselves, with psalmody; but the author of the Apostolical Constitutions prescribes first the reading of the Old Testament, and then the Psalms. The most ancient and general practice of the church was for the whole assembly to unite with one heart and voice in celebrating the praises of God. But after a time alternate psalmody was introduced, when the congregation, dividing themselves into two parts, repeated the psalms by courses, verse for verse, one in response to another, and not as formerly, all together. The mode of singing altogether was called symphony, while the alternate mode was termed antiphony, and in the West, responsoria, the singing by responsals. This latter manner of conducting the psalmody originated in the Eastern church, and passed into the Western in the time of Ambrose, bishop of Milan. But in a short time antiphonal singing became the general practice of the whole church; and Socrates informs us, that the Emperor Theodosius the younger, and his sisters, were accustomed to sing alternate hymns together every morning in the royal palace. Augustine was deeply affected on hearing the Ambrosian chant at Milan, and describes his feelings in these words: "The voices flowed in at my ears; truth was distilled into my heart; and the affection of piety overflowed in sweet tears of joy." Eusebius tells us that the first regular Christian choir was established at Antioch in Syria, and that Ambrose brought his famous melodies to Milan from that city. These Ambrosian melodies, and the mode of their performance by canonical singers, continued in the Western church till the time of Gregory the Great, who was devotedly zealous in the cultivation of sacred music, having been the first to introduce singing schools at Rome. Gregory separated the chanters from the clerical order, and exchanged the Ambrosian chant for a style of singing named after himself the Gregorian Chant, besides introducing musical notation by Roman letters. It seems to be a point fully established, that antiphonal singing, and as Sir John Hawkins considers it, the commencement of church music, originated in the churches of the East, particularly those of Antioch, Cesarea, and Constantinople. The Greek fathers, Basil and Chrysostom, were the original institutors of the choral service in their respective churches. From the East Ambrose carried it to Milan, whence it was transferred to Rome, and afterwards passed into France, Germany, and Britain. Pope Damasus ordained the alternate singing of the Psalms along with the Gloria Patri and Hallelujah; in A. D. 384, Siricius introduced the Anthem; in A. D. 507, Symmachus appointed the Gloria in Excelsis to be sung; and in A. D. 600, the Gregorian Chant was brought into use. When Gregory, in A. D. 620, sent his Chant into Britain, such was the opposition manifested to its introduction into the church, that 1,200 of the clergy fell in the tumult which ensued, and it was not until fifty years after, when Pope Vitalianus sent Theodore the Greek to fill the vacant see of Canterbury, that the British clergy were prevailed upon to admit the cathedral service in accordance with the Romish ritual.

Besides the psalms which had been used from the earliest times, and short doxologies and hymns, consisting of verses from the Holy Scriptures, spiritual songs, especially those by Ambrose of Milan, and Hilary of Poitiers, came to be used in public worship in the Western church. The Te Deum, often styled the Song of St. Ambrose, is generally supposed to have been composed jointly by him and St. Augustine early in the fourth century, though Archbishop Usher ascribes it to Nicetius, and supposes it not to have been composed till about A. D. 500. Considerable opposition, it is true, was manifested to the introduction of such mere human compositions into Divine worship, but the unobjectionable purity of their sentiments led to their adoption by many churches. The complaint, however, began to be raised that church music had deviated from its ancient simplicity. Thus the Egyptian abbot, Pambo, in the fourth century, inveighed against the introduction of heathen melodies into the psalmody of the church. About this time church music began to be cultivated more according to rule. In addition to the Psalm and canonical singers, church choristers were appointed, who sang sometimes alone, sometimes interchangeably with the choirs of the congregation.

In the fourth century, the custom began to be introduced into some churches, of having a single person to lead the psalmody, who began the verse, and the people joined with him in the close. This individual was called the phonaseus or precentor, and he is mentioned by Athanasius as existing in his time in the church of Alexandria. The study of sacred music received peculiar attention in the sixth century, schools for instruction in this important art having been established and patronized by Gregory the Great, under whom they obtained great celebrity. From these schools originated the famous Gregorian chant, which the choir and the people sang in unison. Such schools rapidly increased in number, and at length became common in various parts of Europe, particularly in France and Germany. The prior or principal of these schools was held in high estimation, and possessed extensive influence.

In the eighth century Pope Adrian, in return for the services which he had rendered to Charlemagne in making him Emperor of the West, stipulated for the introduction of the Gregorian Chant into the Gallic Church, and the Emperor having paid a visit to Rome, where he kept Easter with the Pope, received from the hands of his Holiness the Roman antiphonary, which he promised to introduce into his dominions. About the end of this century, all opposition to cathedral music ceased, and, for seven centuries thereafter, church music underwent little or no change in the Church of Rome. It is a remarkable fact, however, that from the eighth till the middle of the thirteenth century, not only was it considered a necessary part of clerical education to understand the principles of harmony and the rudiments of singing, but the clergy were generally proficient in both in vocal and instrumental music.

In the Eastern Church, where sacred music, as we have seen, had its origin, there arose in the eighth century a remarkable man, John of Damascus, who was not only an eminent theologian, but a most accomplished musician. On account of his great skill in the art of vocal music, he was usually styled Melodos. To this noted master of music, the Eastern Church is indebted for those beautiful airs to which the Psalms of David are sung at this day. The Greek word Psallo is applied among the Greeks of modern times exclusively to sacred music, which in the Eastern Church has never been any other than vocal, instrumental music being unknown in that church as it was in the primitive church. Sir John Hawkins, following the Romish writers in his erudite work on the History of Music, makes Pope Vitalianus, in A. D. 660, the first who introduced organs into churches. But learned men are generally agreed that instrumental music was not used in churches till a much later date. For Thomas Aquinas, A. D. 1250, has these remarkable words: "Our church does not use musical instruments as harps and psalteries to praise God withal, that she may not seem to judaize." From this passage we are surely warranted in concluding that there was no ecclesiastical use of organs in the time of Aquinas. It is alleged that Marinus Sanutus, who lived about A. D. 1290, was the first that brought the use of wind organs into churches, and hence he received the name of Torcellus. In the East the organ was in use in the emperors' courts, probably from the time of Julian, but never has either the organ or any other instrument been employed in public worship in Eastern churches; nor is mention of instrumental music found in all their liturgies ancient or modern.

Towards the time of the Reformation, a general partiality for sacred music prevailed throughout Europe, owing, as is generally supposed, to the encouragement which Pope Leo X. gave to the cultivation of the art. It is no doubt true that Leo was himself a skilful musician, and attached a high importance to the art as lending interest, solemnity, and effect to the devotional services of the Romish church. But to no single individual can be traced the prevailing love for sacred music in the sixteenth century, for besides Leo X., we find Charles V. in Germany, Francis I. in France, and Henry VIII. in England, all of them countenancing sacred music, and treating musicians at their court with peculiar favour.

At the Reformation the greater part of the services of the Romish church was sung to musical notes, and on the occasion of great festivals the choral service was performed with great pomp by a numerous choir of men and boys. That abuses of the most flagrant kind had found their way into this department of Romish worship is beyond a doubt, as the council of Trent found it necessary to issue a decree on the subject, in which they plainly state, that in the celebration of the mass, hymns, some of a profane, and others of a lascivious nature, had crept into the service, and given great scandal to professors of the truth. By this decree, the council, while it arranged the choral service on a proper footing, freeing it from all extraneous matter, gave it also a sanction which it had hitherto wanted. From this time the Church of Rome began to display that profound veneration for choral music which she has continued to manifest down to the present day.

The Protestants at the Reformation differed on the subject of sacred music. The Lutherans in great measure adopted the Romish ritual, retained the choral service, and adhered to the use of the organ and other instruments. Some of the Reformed churches differed more widely from Rome than others. Calvin introduced a plain metrical psalmody; selecting for use in churches the Version of the Psalms by Marot, which he divided into small portions and appointed to be sung in public worship. This Psalter was bound up with the Geneva Catechism. When the Reformation was introduced into England, Henry VIII., himself a musician of considerable celebrity, showed his partiality for the choral service by retaining it. The cathedral musical service of the Reformed Church of England was framed by John Marbeck of Windsor, in a form little different from that which is at present in use. It is a curious fact that the ancient foundations of conventual, cathedral, and collegiate churches make no provision for an organist, but simply for canons, minor canons, and choristers.

The first Act of Uniformity, passed in the reign of Edward VI., allowed the clergy either to adopt the plain metrical psalmody of the Calvinists, or to persevere in the use of the choral service. The musical part of Queen Elizabeth's Liturgy is said to have been arranged by Parker, Archbishop of Canterbury. The Puritans, however, objected strongly to the cathedral rites, particularly "the tossing the Psalms from one side to the other," as Cartwright sur-castically describes the musical service, and which was regarded as inconsistent with that beautiful simplicity which ought ever to characterize the ordinances of Divine worship. The assaults made by the Puritans upon the musical, as well as other portions of the cathedral service, were answered with great ability and power by Richard Hooker, in his famous work on 'Ecclesiastical Polity,' the first four books of which appeared in 1594, and the fifth in 1597. From the appearance of this masterly defence of the Polity of the Church of England, down to the present day, no material change has taken place in the musical service of that church. The Lutheran and Episcopal churches, both in Europe and America, have also a solemn music service, while the Reformed churches, including the Presbyterian and Independent, have a plain selection of melodies, to which the metrical Psalms, Paraphrases, and Hymns are set, some churches with, but the greater number without, instrumental music. There is almost universally a precentor or leader of the sacred music in the congregation, and in some cases a select choir or band of male and female voices, while the whole congregation is expected to engage in this solemn part of the devotional exercises of the sanctuary. For a number of years past, while Romish churches in Europe and America have made a gorgeous display of their musical service, which is performed by regularly trained musicians, vocal and instrumental, the Protestant churches have aroused themselves to a more careful training of their whole congregations in the art of sacred music, that this interesting and impressive part of Divine worship may be conducted both with melody of the voice and of the heart unto the Lord.

MUSIMOES, festivals celebrated in honour of the dead among some of the native tribes of Central Africa.

MUSORITES, a superstitious sect of Jews, who are said to have revered rats and mice. The origin of this peculiarity is to be found in an event which is narrated in I Sam. vi. The Philistines had taken away the ark of the covenant, and detained it in their country for seven months, during which time the Lord in anger had sent among them a plague of mice, which destroyed the fruits of the ground. Under the dread inspired by this Divine judgment upon their land they restored the ark, and, by the advice of their priests and diviners, they prepared as a trespass-offering to the God of Israel five golden emerods and five golden mice. Perverting this solemn incident of Old Testament history the sect seems to have entertained a superstitious veneration for mice and rats.

MUSPELLHEIM, the sphere or abode of light in the ancient Scandinavian cosmogony. It was in the southern region, and was too luminous and glowing to be entered by those who are not indigenous there. It is guarded by Surtur, who sits on its borders bearing a flaming falchion, and at the end of the world he shall issue forth to combat, and shall vanquish all the gods, and consume the universe with fire.

MUSSULMANS, a term used, like Moslems, to denote the whole body of the Faithful who believe in the Koran.

MUTA. See TACITA.

MUTEVEL, the president or chief ruler of a Mohammedan mosque in Turkey, into whose hands the revenue is regularly paid.

MU-TSOO-PO, the tutelary goddess both of women and sailors, worshipped with great reverence among the Chinese. Her worship was introduced some centuries ago into the Celestial Empire; and she so strikingly resembles the Virgin Mary of the Romanists, that the Chinese at Macao call her Santa Maria di China, Holy Mother of China. The sailors especially make her an object of adoration; and there are very few junks that have not an image of her on board. She is also accompanied by very dismal satellites, the executors of her behests.

MUTUNUS, a deity among the ancient Romans, who averted evil from the city and commonwealth of Rome. He was identical with the Phallus or Priapus, who chiefly delivered from the power of demons. Mutunus had a temple inside the walls of Rome, which existed until the time of Augustus, when it was removed outside.

MWETI, a Great Spirit venerated by the Shekani and Bakile people in Southern Guinea. The following account of him is given by Mr. Wilson in his 'Western Africa': "He is supposed to dwell in the bowels of the earth, but comes to the surface of the ground at stated seasons, or when summoned on any special business. A large, flat house, of peculiar form, covered with dried plantain-leaves, is erected in the middle of the village for the temporary sojourn of this spirit, and it is from this that he gives forth his oracular answers. The house is always kept perfectly dark, and no one is permitted to enter it, except those who have been initiated into all the mysteries of the order, which includes, however, almost the whole of the adult male population of the village. Strange noises issue forth from this dark den, not unlike the growling of a tiger, which the knowing ones interpret to suit their own purposes. The women and children are kept in a state of constant trepidation by his presence; and, no doubt, one of the chief ends of the ceremonies connected with the visits of this mysterious being is to keep the women and children in a state of subordination. He is the great African Blue Beard whom every woman and child in the country holds in the utmost dread. Every boy, from the age of fourteen to eighteen years, is initiated into all the secrets pertaining to this Great Spirit. The term of discipleship is continued for a year or more, during which period they are subjected to a good deal of rough treatment—such, undoubtedly, as make a lasting impression both upon their physical and mental natures, and prevent them from divulging the secrets of the order. At the time of matriculation a vow is imposed, such as refraining from a particular article of food or drink, and is binding for life.

"When Mweti is about to retire from a village where he has been discharging his manifold functions, the women, children, and any strangers who may be there at the time, are required to leave the village. What ceremonies are performed at the time of his dismissal is known, of course, only to the initiated.

"When a covenant is about to be formed among the different tribes, Mweti is always invoked as a witness, and is commissioned with the duty of visiting vengeance upon the party who shall violate the engagement. Without this their national treaties would have little or no force. When a law is passed which the people wish to be especially binding, they invoke the vengeance of Mweti upon every transgressor, and this, as a general thing, is ample guarantee for its observance. The Mpongwe people sometimes call in the Shekanis to aid them, through the agency of this Great Spirit, to give sanctity and authority to their laws."

MYCALESSIA, a surname of the goddess Demeter, derived from Mycalessus in Boeotia, where she was worshipped.

MYESIS, a name sometimes applied to Baptism in the early Christian church, because it was the ordinance by which men were admitted to all the sacred rites and mysteries of the Christian religion.

MYIAGROS, a hero who was invoked at the festival of Athena, celebrated at Aliphera, as the protector against flies.

MYLITTA, a name which, according to Herodotus, was given by the Assyrians to the goddess Aphrodite, as the generative principle in nature.

MYRTLE, a tree very commonly found in Judea. It was accounted an emblem of peace, and hence, in the vision of Zechariah, the angel who was committed to deliver promises of the restoration of Jerusalem is placed among myrtle trees. Josephus relates that at the feast of tabernacles the Jews carried in their hands branches of myrtle. Herodotus states that among the Persians the individual who was engaged in offering sacrifices wore a tiara enriched with myrtle. This tree was sacred to Venus among the ancient Romans. That goddess, accordingly, was represented with a garland of myrtle on her head, and a branch of myrtle in her hand. In the symbolic language of Pagan antiquity, the myrtle was an emblem of love, marriage, and immortality. Among the ancient Greeks, accordingly, the young maiden was crowned on her marriage day with wreaths of myrtle leaves.

MYRIA, a surname of the ancient Grecian goddess Demeter, and also of the goddess Artemis, under which she was worshipped near Sparta. The term Myria is also applied to a festival celebrated by the inhabitants of Pellene in honour of Demeter. This feast lasted for seven days. During the first two days the solemnities were observed by both men and women; on the third day the women alone performed certain mysterious rites throughout the night; and on the two last days the men returned to the festival, and the remainder of the time was passed in merriment and raillery.

MYSTÆ, those who were initiated into the lesser ELEUSINIAN MYSTERIES (which see).

MYSTAGOGIA, communion in the sacred mysteries, a term applied by Chrysostom, Theodoret, and others to the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper.

MYSTAGOGUS, the high-priest of the Eleusinian goddess Ceres, who conducted the celebration of her mysteries and the initiation of the Myster. See HIEROPHANTS.

MYSTERIES, mystic festivals among the ancient Pagans, consisting of sacrifices and ceremonies which were performed in secret, or during the night, and to which only the initiated were admitted. In all ages, and among all nations, certain religious rites have been hidden from the multitude, and thus clothed, in their estimation, with a secret grandeur. Such observances may be traced back to a very remote age of Grecian history, and were probably intended to keep up the remembrance of the religion of a still more ancient period.

The most celebrated mysteries of the ancient Greeks were the Cabeiria and the Eleusinia. Other mysteries of an inferior description belonged to different divinities, and were peculiar to certain localities. Cases of profanation of the mysteries were tried by a court consisting only of persons who were themselves initiated. Such mysteries as were found among the Greeks were unknown to the Romans; and even those mystic rites which were connected with certain festivals were plainly of foreign origin. Thus the Bacchanalia of the Romans were drawn from the Dionysia of the Greeks.

From the sacredness attached to Pagan mysteries, the early Christians threw a similar air of hidden grandeur over certain holy rites, by concealing them from the world generally. This remark particularly applies to the solemn ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper, to which the term mysteria was specially attached. Hence the introduction into the primitive Christian church of the ARCANI DISCIPLINA (which see). In apostolic times, and those immediately succeeding the age of the apostles, no such practice seems to have existed as that of concealing the sacred mysteries from the knowledge of the Catechumens. The first writer who mentions this marked difference between Catechumens and the faithful is Tertullian. There is no appearance, as Romish writers would allege, that the worship of saints and images was included among the mysteries. On the contrary, they seem to have been limited to these specific points: (1.) The mode of administering baptism; (2.) The unction of chrism or confirmation; (3.) The ordination of priests; (4.) The mode of celebrating the eucharist; (5.) The liturgy or divine service of the church; (6.) And for some time the mystery of the Trinity, the Creed, and the Lord's Prayer. The Romish church regards the eucharist as more especially a mystery in consequence of the doctrine which they hold, that the elements of bread and wine are transubstantiated into the real body, blood, soul, and divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ.

MYSTERIES, theatrical representations made by the priests in the dark ages, of the events recorded in Scripture, that they might be brought more clearly and impressively before the minds of the unlearned multitude. Two series of these mysteries have been lately published from old manuscripts, namely, the Townley mysteries performed by the monks of Woodchurch near Wakefield; and the Coventry mysteries by the Grey Friars of that ancient city. Both these series of mysteries begin with the creation and end with the general judgment.

MYSTICAL TABLE, a name applied by Chrysostom to the COMMUNION TABLE (which see).

MYSTICAL VEILS, an expression sometimes used by early Christian writers to denote the hangings which separated the chancel from the rest of the church.

MYSTICS, a class of men found in every age of the world, who, whether philosophers or divines, have professed not only to be initiated into hidden mysteries, but to be the subjects of a divine manifestation to their intuition or self-consciousness. Almost infinitely varied are the forms of thought and modes of action in which mysticism has been developed in different periods and among different nations. It has appeared in the loftiest abstract speculation, and in the grossest and most sensuous idolatry. It has mingled itself up with Theism, Atheism, and Pantheism. Mr. Vaughan, in his 'Hours with the Mystics,' divides this extravagant class of religionists into three classes, the Theopathic, Theosophic, and Theurgic. Under the first class, or the Theopathic, are included all those who resign themselves in a passivity more or less absolute to an imagined divine manifestation. The Theosophists again are those who form a theory of God, or of the works of God, which has not reason but an inspiration of their own for its basis. And, finally, the Theurgic class of mystics includes all who claim supernatural powers generally through converse with the world of spirits.

Minds predisposed to mysticism have been found in every age and in every country. The earliest mysticism, that of India, as exhibited in the BHAGAVAT-GITA (which see), appears not in a rudimental and initial form, but full-developed and as complete as it has ever manifested itself in modern Christendom. The Jewish mystics are to be found at an early period among the ascetic Therapeutæ, a sect similar to the Essenes. "The soul of man," said they, "is divine, and his highest wisdom is to become as much as possible a stranger to the body with its embarrassing appetites. God has breathed into man from heaven a portion of his own divinity. That which is divine is indivisible. It may be extended, but it is incapable of separation. Consider how vast is the range of our thought over the past and the future, the heavens and the earth. This alliance with an upper world, of which we are conscious, would be impossible, were not the soul of man an indivisible portion of that divine and blessed Spirit. Contemplation of the Divine Essence is the noblest exercise of man: it is the only means of attaining to the highest truth and virtue, and therein to behold God is the consummation of our happiness here."

Jewish mysticism, combined with the profound philosophy of Plato, gave rise to the Neo-Platonist school, which, as shown in the teaching of Plotinus, its founder, was thoroughly mystical. The mystic, according to this sect, contemplates the divine perfections in himself; and in the ecstatic state, individuality, memory, time, space, phenomenal contradictions and logical distinctions, all vanish.

In the sixth century, Mysticism was strongly developed in the writings of Dionysius the Areopagite, who sought to accommodate to Christianity the theosophy of the Neo-Platonist school. The Greek theory compels Dionysius virtually to deny the existence of evil. "All that exists," says Mr. Vaughan, in describing the sentiments of Dionysius, "he regards as a symbolical manifestation of the super-existent. What we call creation is the divine allegory. In nature, in Scripture, in tradition, God is revealed only in figure. This sacred imagery should be studied, but in such study we are still far from any adequate cognizance of the Divine Nature. God is above all negation and affirmation: in Him such contraries are at once identified and transcended. But by negation we approach most nearly to a true apprehension of what He is.

"Negation and affirmation, accordingly, constitute the two opposed and yet simultaneous methods he lays down for the knowledge of the Infinite. These two paths, the Via Negativa (or Apophatica) and the Via Affirmativa (or Cataphatica) constitute the foundation of his mysticism. They are distinguished and elaborated in every part of his writings. The positive is the descending process. In the path downward from God, through inferior existences, the Divine Being may be said to have many names;—the negative method is one of ascent; in that, God is regarded as nameless, the inscrutable Anonymous. The symbolical or visible is thus opposed, in the Platonist style, to the mystical or ideal. To assert anything concerning a God who is above all affirmation is to speak in figure—to veil him. The more you deny concerning Him, the more of such veils do you remove. He compares the negative method of speaking concerning the Supreme to the operation of the sculptor, who strikes off fragment after fragment of the marble, and progresses by diminution."

Romanism in the Middle Ages presents us with several specimens of contemplative mystics, who, in the seclusion of the monastery, speculated so boldly, that they fell into the wildest extravagance. One of the most favourable examples of this mediæval tendency, is to be found in Bernard of Clairvaux, who goes so far as to identify his own thoughts with the mind of God. Full of monastic prepossessions, he spurns the flesh and seeks to rise by abstraction and elevated meditation to the immediate vision of heavenly things. He denounces reason and the dialectics of the schools; but Bonaventura in the thirteenth, and Gerson in the fifteenth century, strove to reconcile mysticism with scholasticism.

In the fellowships and spiritual associations which existed in the Netherlands and Germany throughout the thirteenth and part of the fourteenth centuries, mysticism was a predominant element, chiefly in the form of mystical pantheism. This, indeed, was the common basis of the doctrine found among the Brethren of the Free Spirit. Their fundamental principle, that God is the being of all beings, the only real existence, unavoidably led them to consider all things without exception as comprised in him, and even the meanest creature as participant of the divine nature and life. God, however, is chiefly present where there is mind, and consequently in man. In the human soul there is an uncreated and eternal principle, namely, the intellect, in virtue of which he resembles and is one with God. Such mystical doctrines were partially a revival of the tenets of the Amalricians and David of Dinanto. The most remarkable of the pantheistic mystics of the mediæval period was Henry Eckart, who elaborated the doctrines of the Beghards into a regular speculative system. The following brief epitome of his doctrines is given by Dr. Ullmann in his 'Reformers before the Reformation': "God is the Being, that is, the solid, true, universal, and necessary being. He alone exists, for he has the existence of all things in himself. All out of him is semblance, and exists only in as far as it is in God, or is God. The nature of God, exalted above every relation or mode (weise), and for that reason unutterable and nameless, is not, however, mere abstract being (according to the doctrine of Amalric), or dead substance; but it is spirit, the highest reason, thinking, knowing, and making itself known. The property most peculiar to God is thinking, and it is by exerting it upon himself that he first becomes God; then the Godhead—the hidden darkness—the simple and silent basis of the Divine Being actually is God. God proceeds out of himself, and this is the eternal generation of the Son, and is necessarily founded in the Divine essence. In the Son, or creative word, however, God also gives birth to all things, and as his operation, being identical with his thinking, is without time, so creation takes place in an 'everlasting now.' God has no existence without the world, and the world, being his existence in another mode, is eternal with him.

The creatures, although they be in a manner set out of God, are yet not separated from him; for otherwise God would be bounded by something external to himself. Much more the distinction in God is one which is continually doing itself away. By the Son, who is one with God, all things are in God, and that which is in God is God himself. In this manner it may be affirmed that 'all things are God,' as truly as that 'God is all things.' In this sense also, every created object, as being in God, is good.

"According to this the whole creation is a manifestation of the Deity; every creature bears upon it a 'stamp of the Divine nature,' a reflection of the eternal godhead; indeed, every creature is 'full of God.' All that is divine, however, when situated forth from the Divine Being, necessarily strives to return back to its source, seeks to lay aside its finitude, and from a state of division to re-enter into unity. Hence all created things have a deep and painful yearning after union with God, in untroubled rest. It is only when God, after having, by the Son, passed out of himself into a different mode of existence, returns by love, which is the Holy Spirit, into himself once more, that the Divine Being is perfected in the Trinity, and he 'rests with himself and with all the creatures.'"

To this Pantheistic Mysticism was opposed a less noxious kind of mysticism which reared itself on the basis of Christian Theism. The chief representative of this theistic mysticism is Ruysbroek, by whose efforts the mystical tendency in the Netherlands and Germany underwent a complete revolution. The system of this able and excellent writer, in so far as it affects life, is thus sketched by Ullmann: "Man, having proceeded from God, is destined to return, and become one with him again. This oneness, however, is not to be understood as meaning that we become wholly identified with him, and lose our own being as creatures, for that is an impossibility. What it is to be understood as meaning is, that we are conscious of being wholly in God, and at the same time also wholly in ourselves; that we are united with God, and yet at the same time remain different from Him. Man ought to be conformed to God and to bear his likeness. But this he can do only in so far as it is practicable, and it is practicable only in as far as he does not cease to be himself and a creature. For God remains always God, and never becomes a creature; the creature always a creature, and never loses its own being as such. Man, when giving himself up with perfect love to God, is in union with him, but he no sooner again acts, than he feels his distinctness from God, and that he is another being. Thus he flows into God, and flows back again into himself. The former state of oneness with, and the latter state of difference from, Him, are both enjoined by God, and betwixt the two subsists that continual annihilation in love which constitutes our felicity."

Gerson, himself a mystic, attempted to involve

Ruysbroek in the same charge of pantheistic mysticism which attaches to Henry Eckart. The accusation, however, is without foundation. The mysticism of Ruysbroek, which had the double advantage of being at once contemplative and practical, was thoroughly theistic in its character; and its influence was extensively felt. Through Gerhard Groot the practical mysticism was propagated in the Netherlands; through John Tauler the contemplative and spiritual in Germany. From this period, that is from the middle of the fourteenth century, we find in Germany a continuous chain of traditional mysticism reaching down to the Reformation, and by means of its most distinguished productions exerting the greatest influence upon the mind of Luther.

One feature which is common to all the mediæval mystics, and which pervades the writings of Thomas à Kempis, is, that they look upon oneness with God, attained by means of the annihilation of self, as the summit of all perfection. Henry Suso, whose mysticism assumed a poetical character, gives utterance to his sentiments in a single sentence: "A meek man must be deformed from the creature, conformed to Christ, and transformed to Deity." John Tauler, another devout mystic, and who, by his sermons, exercised a most remarkable influence upon the popular mind, unfolds his opinions in a few sentences. "Man, as a creature originating directly from God, who is one, longs to return, according to his capacity, back to the undivided unity. The efflux strives again to become a reflux: and only when all things in him have become wholly one in and with God, does he find entire peace and perfect rest. The means to this end, are to rise above sense and sensuality, corporeal and natural powers, all desires, figures and imagery, and thus freed from the creatures, to seek God solely and directly, spirit with spirit, and heart to heart. The divine perfect life can become ours only when we die within, and cease to be ourselves. But this cannot be effected by the power of nature. It must be done by grace, and through the mediation of Christ. What belongs to God by nature, man must acquire by grace. To this end the pattern of Christ has been given to him. As Jesus came from the Father, and returns to the Father again, so is this the destination of every man. As Christ died a bodily death, and rose again from the dead, so must every man spiritually die and revive, in order wholly to live in and with God. The image of Christ, however, which must be engraved on the heart, is the likeness not of what is created and visible, but of what is noble, divine, and rational in the Son of God, the God-man. He who has this image in his heart is never without God, and, wherever God is at all, there he is wholly. Such a man acquiesces fully in the divine will, resigns himself entirely to God, stands in bottomless patience, humility, and love, and herein enjoys perfect blessedness." The writings of John Tauler were afterwards highly prized, not only by Luther and Melancthon, but also by some Romish divines of the highest celebrity.

Among the mystical writings which prepared the way for the Reformation, a conspicuous place must be assigned to a small anonymous treatise, which appeared in the fourteenth century, under the name of 'Deutsche Theologie,' or German Theology. To this homely but admirable volume Luther lay under the deepest obligations. "Next to the Bible and St. Augustine," he says, "from no book with which I have met have I learned more of what God, Christ, man, and all things, are." The sound theology which pervades the work, though clothed in a somewhat mystical garb, conveyed much light to the Reformer's mind. The fundamental thought which the book contains is thus described by Ullmann: "If the creature recognise itself in the immutable Good, and as one therewith, and live and act in this knowledge, then it is itself good and perfect. But if, on the contrary, the creature revolt from that Good, it is then evil. All sin consists in apostatizing from the supreme and perfect Good, in making self an object, and in supposing that it is something, and that we derive from it any sort of benefit, such as existence, or life, or knowledge, or ability. This the devil did, and it was by this alone he fell. His presuming that he too was something, and that something was his, his 'I' and his 'me,' and his 'my' and his 'mine,' were his apostacy and fall. In the self-same way Adam also fell. Eating the apple was not the cause of his fall, but his arrogating to self his 'I' and 'me' and 'mine.' But for this, even if he had eaten seven apples, he would not have fallen. Because of it, however, he must have fallen, although he had not tasted the one. So is it with every man, in whom the same thing is repeated a hundred times. But in what way may this apostacy and general fall be repaired? The way is for man to come out of self (isolation as a creature), and enter into God. In order to this, two parties must concur, God and man. Man cannot do it without God; and God could not do it without man. And, therefore, it behoved God to take upon him human nature and to become man, in order that man might become God. This once took place in the most perfect way in Christ, and as every man should become by grace what Christ was by nature, it ought to be repeated in every man, and in myself among the rest. For were God to be humanized in all other men, and all others to be deified in him, and were this not to take place in me, my fall would not be repaired. In that way Christ restores what was lost by Adam. By Adam came selfishness, and with it disobedience, all evil, and corruption. By Christ, in virtue of his pure and divine life transfusing itself into men, come the annihilation of selfishness, obedience, and union with God, and therein every good thing, peace, heaven, and blessedness."

The 'Deutsche Theologie,' which thus unfolded Protestant truth so clearly before the Reformation, has since 1621 been inscribed in the Romish index of prohibited books; while on the part of Protestant, but especially Lutheran divines, it has always been held in the highest estimation. At the instigation of Staupitz, Luther issued an edition of this popular work, with a preface written by his own hand. Staupitz was himself a mystic, but his mysticism was of a more thoroughly practical character than those writers of the same class who had preceded him; and among all the contemporaries of Luther none had a more powerful influence in the spiritual development of the great Reformer.

The mediæval mysticism in its gradual progress from a mere poetical sentiment to a speculative system, and thence to a living, practical power, led men steadily forward towards the Reformation. In the view of Scholasticism, Christianity was an objective phenomenon, but in the view of Mysticism it was an inward life. The former pointed to the church as the only procuring means of salvation, but the latter pointed directly to God, and aimed at being one with him. The one concerned itself chiefly with a gorgeous hierarchy, outward forms, and necessarily efficacious sacraments; the other was mainly occupied with having Christ formed in the soul, the hope of glory. The Reformers therefore could not fail to sympathize far more deeply with the teachings of the Mystics than of the Schoolmen. Though an exceptional class, the Mystics possessed, with all their extravagances, more of the truth of God than could be found within the wide domains of the Roman church. But while Luther and his brother Reformers learned much from the Mystics, their theology went far beyond the doctrines of Mysticism. During the fifteenth century indeed, the Scripture element was gradually supplanting the Mystical in the religion of the times. The Bible began to displace the Schoolmen at the universities. Both in Germany and the Netherlands arose several able and orthodox divines, with whom the Word of God was brought into greater prominence than it had been for centuries as the standard of their teaching.

Meanwhile Mysticism, which had been training men in the West for a great religious revolution, sprung up and spread rapidly also in the East. No sooner had the doctrines of Islâm been proclaimed by the great Arabian Prophet, than a class of Mystics appeared who revolted against the letter of the Koran in the name of the Spirit, and boldly urged their claims to a supernatural intercourse with the Deity. For several centuries Persia was the chief seat of a body of Mohammedan Mystics, who are known by the name of Sûfis; and the writings of their poets during the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries are deservedly admired by every student of Oriental literature. These Eastern Mystics sought, and in some cases claimed, an immediate knowledge of God by the direct exercise of the intuitive faculty, which is a ray of Deity, and beholds Essence. Hence the indifference which they mi-formly exhibited to all the various forms of positive religion. Self-abandonment and self-annihilation formed the highest ambition of the Sufi. He is bound wholly to lose sight of his individuality; by mystical dearth he begins to live. The more extravagant among these Persian mystics claimed identity with God, and denied all distinction between good and evil. They held the sins of the Sufi to be dearer to God than the obedience of other men, and his impiety more acceptable than their faith. The Sufism of the East has continued unmodified in its character down to the present day, and is actually at this moment on the increase in Persia, notwithstanding the inveterate hatred which the other Mohammedans bear to its adherents. See SUFIS.

In the West, Mysticism has undergone no small modification since the Reformation in the sixteenth century. No sooner was the great Protestant principle announced by Luther that the Scriptures are the sufficient standard of Christian truth, than Traditionalism and Mysticism alike fell before it. Oral tradition and individual intuition were both of them rejected as infallible guides in an inquiry after truth. But while such was the general fate of mysticism among the Reformed, it broke forth in the most extravagant forms among the Zwickau prophets, and the various sects of Anabaptists who appeared in the Low Countries and different parts of Germany. Thus, as Mr. Vaughan has well said: "By the mystic of the fourteenth century, the way of the Reformation was in great part prepared; by the mystic of the sixteenth century it was hindered and imperilled." The wild fanaticism of the ANA-BAPTISTS (which see), was alleged to be a practical refutation of the alleged right of every man to the exercise of private judgment: and though Luther, Melancthon, Zwingli, and Bullinger exposed the fallacy of such an objection, yet for a time the work of reform was undoubtedly retarded thereby.

In the beginning of the seventeenth century, mysticism took an entirely new direction. Hitherto its great efforts had been put forth to reach union, and even identity with God. Now, however, it began to seek a supernatural acquaintance with the works of God. The leader of this movement was Jacob Behmen. It is true he had learned much from the theurgists who preceded him, particularly Cornelius Agrippa and Paracelsus, but the grand source of the knowledge which he professed to communicate in his mystical writings, was an inward illumination, which he claimed to have received from the Spirit of God, whereby he became minutely acquainted with the essences, properties, and uses of all the objects in nature. (See BEHMENISTS.) Then followed in the same track of mysticism the Rosicrucians and Freemasons, and secret societies which abounded so much in the eighteenth century.

Protestantism has had its mystics, and so also has Romanism. In France, in the sixteenth century, appeared St. Francis de Sales, and in Spain, St.

Theresa and St. John of the Cross; all of them making their mystical doctrines subservient to the interests of Mother church. "Nowhere," says Mr. Vaughan, "is the duty of implicit self-surrender to the director or confessor more constantly inculcated than in the writings of Theresa and John of the Cross, and nowhere are the inadequacy and mischief of the principle more apparent. John warns the mystic that his only safeguard against delusion lies in perpetual and unreserved appeal to his director. Theresa tells us that whenever our Lord commanded her in prayer to do anything, and her confessor ordered the opposite, the Divine guide enjoined obedience to the human; and would influence the mind of the confessor afterwards, so that he was moved to counsel what he had before forbidden! Of course. For who knows what might come of it if enthusiasts were to have visions and revelations on their own account? The director must draw after him these fiery and dangerous natures, as the lion-leaders of an Indian pageantry conduct their charge, holding a chain and administering opiates. The question between the orthodox and the heterodox mysticism of the fourteenth century was really one of theological doctrine. The same question in the sixteenth and seventeenth was simply one of ecclesiastical interests."

According to the mystical doctrine of St. Theresa, there are four degrees of prayer: (1.) Simple Mental Prayer. (2.) The Prayer of Quiet, called also Pure Contemplation. (3.) The Prayer of Union, called also Perfect Contemplation. (4.) The Prayer of Rapture or Ecstasy. The raptures and visions of this female saint of Romanism have gained for her a high name. But the mysticism of John of the Cross wore a different aspect. He delighted not in ecstatic prayer like Theresa, but in intense suffering. His earnest prayer was, that not a day might pass in which he did not suffer something.

In the history of mysticism, the seventeenth century was chiefly distinguished by the Quietist Controversy. The most remarkable exhibition of Quietism is to be found in the writings of Madame Guyon. Thus when describing her experience she observes: "The soul passing out of itself by dying to itself necessarily passes into its divine object. This is the law of its transition. When it passes out of self, which is limited, and therefore is not God, and consequently is evil, it necessarily passes into the unlimited and universal, which is God, and therefore is the true good. My own experience seemed to me to be a verification of this. My spirit, disenthralled from selfishness, became united with and lost in God, its Sovereign, who attracted it more and more to Himself. And this was so much the case, that I could seem to see and know God only, and not myself. . . . It was thus that my soul was lost in God, who communicated to it His qualities, having drawn it out of all that it had of its own. . . . O happy poverty, happy loss, happy nothing, which gives no less than God Himself in his own immensity,—no more circumscribed to the limited manner of the creation, but always drawing it out of that to plunge it wholly into his divine Essence. Then the soul knows that all the states of self-pleasing visions, of intellectual illuminations, of ecstasies and raptures, of whatever value they might once have been, are now rather obstacles than advancements; and that they are not of service in the state of experience which is far above them; because the state which has props or supports, which is the case with the merely illuminated and ecstatic state, rests in them in some degree, and has pain to lose them. But the soul cannot arrive at the state of which I am now speaking, without the loss of all such supports and helps. . . . The soul is then so submissive, and perhaps we may say so passive,—that is to say, is so disposed equally to receive from the hand of God either good or evil,—as is truly astonishing. It receives both the one and the other without any selfish emotions, letting them flow and be lost as they came."

This quotation contains the substance of the doctrine which pervades the mystical writings of Madame Guyon. The whole may be summed up in two words, "disinterested love," which she regarded as the perfection of holiness in the heart of man. A similar, if not wholly identical doctrine, was inculcated at the same period by Molinos in Italy, in a book entitled 'The Spiritual Guide.' Quietist opinions were now evidently on the advance in different countries of Europe, and among their supporters were some of the most illustrious men of the day, of which it is sufficient to name Fenelon, archbishop of Cambray. But the high character for piety and worth of the leading Quietists made them all the more obnoxious to the Jesuits. Nor was the hostile spirit which was manifested towards the Quietists limited to the Jesuits alone; the celebrated Bossuet also was one of the most bitter persecutors of Madame Guyon, and succeeded in procuring the public condemnation of her writings.

Fenelon was for a time conjoined with Bossuet in opposing Madame Guyon, but all the while he was conscious that his own opinions did not materially differ from hers. At length, in 1697, he openly avowed his sympathy with the sentiments of the Mystics in a work which, under the name of the 'Maxims of the Saints,' was devoted to an inquiry as to the teaching of the church on the doctrines of pure love, of mystical union, and of perfection. The publication of this treatise gave rise to a lengthened and angry controversy. Bossuet sought to invoke the vengeance of the government upon his heretical brother, and he had even hoped to call down upon him the fulminations of the Pope. In the first object he was successful; in the second he was, for a time at least, disappointed. A war of pamphlets and treatises now raged at Paris, the chief combatants being Bossuet on the one side, and Fenelon on the other. The 'Maxims' were censured by the Sor-bonne, and their author was persecuted by the King of France, but Pope Innocent XII. declined for a long time to pronounce a sentence of condemnation upon Fenelon, of whom he had been accustomed to say, that he had erred through excess of love to God. At length, with the utmost reluctance, and in measured terms, he sent forth the long-expected anathema, and Fenelon submitted to the decision of the Roman See. Madame Guyon, after a long life of persecution, thirty-seven years of which were spent in prison, died in 1717.

Among the Quietists of the seventeenth century may be mentioned Madame Bourignon and her accomplished disciple Peter Poiret, (see BOURIGNONISTS;) as well as the fascinating mystic Madame de Krüdener. England had its mystical votaries in the earnest followers of George Fox, with whom the doctrine of the Inward Light was the central principle of the gospel scheme. But the most extravagant of all the mystics of modern times is beyond all doubt Emanuel Swedenborg, the founder of the Church of the New Jerusalem. (See SWEDENBORGIANS.) One of the leading principles of this mystical system is the doctrine of Correspondence, which declares every thing visible to have its appropriate spiritual reality. Another principle which lies at the foundation of the Swedenborgian theory, is, that the Word of God is holy in every syllable, and its literal sense is the basis of its spiritual and celestial meaning.

Of the more modern mystics, William Law may be considered as the father. He was a clergyman of the Church of England in the last century; and the doctrines which he and his followers held exhibit so strong a tendency to mysticism, that it may be well to give an outline of his system: "Mr. Law supposed that the material world was the region which originally belonged to the fallen angels. At length the light and Spirit of God entered into the chaos, and turned the angels' ruined kingdom into a paradise on earth. God then created man, and placed him there. He was made in the image of the Triune God, (whom, like the Hutchinsonians, he compares to 'fire, light, and spirit,') a living mirror of the divine nature, formed to enjoy communion with Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and to live on earth as the angels do in heaven. He was endowed with immortality, so that the elements of this outward world could not have any power of acting on his body: but by his fall he changed the light, life, and spirit of God, for the light, life, and spirit of the world. He died on the very day of his transgression to all the influences and operations of the Spirit of God upon him, as we die to the influences of this world when the soul leaves the body; and all the influences and operations of the elements of this life were open to him, as they are in any animal, at his birth into this world: he became an earthly creature, subject to the dominion of this outward world and stood only in the highest rank of animals.

"But the goodness of God would not leave man in this condition: redemption from it was immediately granted; and the bruiser of the serpent brought the life, light, and spirit of heaven, once more into the human nature. All men, in consequence of the redemption of Christ, have in them the first spark, or seed, of the divine life, as a treasure hid in the centre of our souls, to bring forth, by degrees, a new birth of that life which was lost in paradise. No son of Adam can be lost, except by turning away from the Saviour within him. The only religion which can save us, must be that which can raise the light, life, and Spirit of God in our souls. Nothing can enter into the vegetable kingdom till it have vegetable life in it, or be a member of the animal kingdom till it have the animal life. Thus all nature joins with the gospel in affirming that no man can enter into the kingdom of heaven till the heavenly life is born in him. Nothing can be our righteousness or recovery, but the divine nature of Jesus Christ derived to our souls."

We are not altogether strangers to mysticism even in our own days. Only a few years have elapsed since we were asked to believe in the supernatural revelations made to the followers of Edward Irving; and the Spiritualists of North America profess to hold converse with the spiritual existences of another world. But passing from these we find a class of mystics in the INTUITIONISTS (which see), on both sides of the Atlantic, who substitute the subjective revelation of consciousness for the objective revelation of the written Word.

MYTH, a fable or fictitious narrative, under which are conched religious or moral principles. Facts often constitute the basis of the myth, and with these religious ideas are interwoven. A myth may also be of a mixed nature, partly true and partly fictitious, but designed to convey important principles which are embodied in the event narrated.

MYTHOLOGY (Gr. muthos, a fable, and logos, a discourse), a word used to denote the fabulous stories which have been invented and propagated by the ancient nations concerning the origin and history of their gods. The mythology of the ancient world is one of the most interesting departments of human inquiry. Man is naturally a religious being. He has been endowed by his Creator with certain faculties and powers which fit him for the investigation of spiritual and heavenly things. But even from the earliest period in the history of fallen man, we find a constant tendency to make to himself a religion of fable rather than of fact. He looked abroad upon the world with all its infinitely varied objects and phenomena, but instead of rising from nature up to nature's God, he clothed creation with the character of the Creator, and converted it into a deity to be adored. Polytheism and idolatry in the grossest forms were the necessary results of such perverted views of nature, and, accordingly, the religion of the primitive ages was, in its full extent, a system of Pantheism.

The heavenly bodies were probably first of all the objects of adoration; and next, the most conspicuous and important objects on the earth. Deified mortals, or a system of hero-worship, probably followed next in succession. The personification of abstract virtues or of physical laws, deduced from the operations of nature, belongs to a more advanced stage of society. It may be a pleasing exercise of intellectual power to trace in the religion of the ancient Egyptians a well-connected series of astronomical allegories, or in that of the ancient Greeks and Romans a series of profound and plausible myths. But the question may well be started, whether in the earlier ages of the world either priests or people maintained a religion, which, if we are so to understand it, was nothing more than an allegorical myth, a philosophical mystery. No such refined notions can be traced in the simple theology of the Homeric age. All classes, learned and illiterate, sacerdotal and lay, were, in plain language, gross idolaters. But as we advance onward in the course of history, we meet with a higher class of minds, who, not contented with being religious, seek to reason on the subject; and in the days of Aristotle and Plato, the mind of man, more enlightened, elevated, and refined, calls in the aid of allegory to reconcile the popular mythology with its more advanced conceptions. In viewing the subject of mythology, however, it is important to keep in mind the distinction between the primitive religions themselves, and the philosophic systems which have been attempted to be reared on the basis of these religions. The Tsabaism of the early Chaldeans affords an example of the extreme simplicity which characterized the first forms of idolatrous worship. The sun, the moon, the heavenly bodies in general, were looked upon as gods, and as exercising an influence, whether prosperous or adverse, upon the interests of mankind. In these circumstances the planetary deities were adored, and men bowed before them with solemn awe as the regulators of human destiny.

When we pass, however, from the simple and primitive Tsabaism of the Chaldeans, Phœnicians, and other primitive nations, and examine the more complex and intricate mythology of ancient Egypt, we cannot fail to be struck with the variety of opinion which exists among the learned as to its real nature. Many writers have regarded it as of a purely symbolic character, all its gods being deified personifications of nature; while Bryant, Faber, and many others, have come to the conclusion that the gods of the Egyptians, and indeed of all the heathen nations of antiquity, were the souls of their forefathers, to whom was assigned the control of the elements of nature. On this subject considerable doubt cannot fail to rest, from the circumstance that two different creeds existed among the Egyptians, the one a popular, and the other a sacerdotal system of belief. The priests were a separate class, who claimed to be the sole depositaries both of science and religion. To maintain their influence over the people, they seem to have constructed an elaborate metaphysical mythology which was carefully concealed from the knowledge of the vulgar. The Egyptian priests, accordingly, are supposed to have been the first who reduced mythology to a kind of system, which they unfolded only to a select class of the initiated. The more effectually to exclude the great mass of the people from the knowledge of their mystic allegorical theology, they conducted their religious ceremonies in an unknown tongue. What views then must the common people have entertained of the gods and goddesses whom they were taught to worship? This question it is difficult to answer satisfactorily. In all probability, however, they were satisfied with the observance of idolatry in its grossest forms, whether as applied to the starry heavens, and the other visible objects of nature, or to the souls of deified mortals. And as to the Egyptian sacerdotal creed, about which the learned have speculated to so little purpose, it is difficult to believe that at so early a period of the world's history, a body of priests actually devised a system of philosophical mythology so complicated and so profound as to elude the penetration of some of the most learned and most ingenious men of modern times. The truth is, that the primitive gods of Egypt, as represented on the most ancient monuments, were thirteen in number, and were in all probability worshipped both by priests and people as the spirits of their ancestors, whom they believed to inhabit and to preside over the heavenly bodies. The animals also which they worshipped may have been regarded as living representatives of the gods who inhabited their bodies, and through them received the homage which was paid by men.

The constant intercourse, commercial and otherwise, between Egypt and the Canaanitish tribes, must have led to the rapid propagation of idolatry; and as Canaan lay in the direct road between Babylon and Egypt, it was naturally to be expected that the gods of Babylon and Assyria would be readily transferred to the land of the Pharaohs. That the Tsabaism of the early Chaldeans and Egyptians was thus carried into Canaan, is plain from the fact that Ashtoreth or Astarte, the principal goddess of the Canaanites, is universally believed to have represented the Moon, and Bel or Baal the Sun.

The mythology of Greece and Rome, in every aspect of it, bears much more the appearance of a mythical hero-worship than do the religions of the earlier eastern nations. Its gods and goddesses are plainly men and women, actuated by the same motives, impelled by the same passions, characterized by the same virtues and vices as mortals of flesh and blood. They love, they hate; they doubt, they fear; they deliberate, they decide; all indicating a human origin, and that they were framed like ordinary men. And not only were they capricious and uncertain in their individual character, but they were believed to be divided and subdivided into factions ranged in hostile array against one another. The Iliad of Homer abounds in allusions to and even detailed descriptions of these unseemly dissensions among the Olympic gods.

The entire Pantheon of Greece and Rome was one immense graduated hierarchy, at the head of which sat enthroned in awful majesty Zeus or Jupiter, wielding the sceptre of universal empire. Next to him in order, but immeasurably inferior in authority and power, were the celestial deities whose business it was pre-eminently to rule in the affairs of men. Superior in number to these, but far beneath them in rank and power, were the terrestrial gods and goddesses presiding over fields and cities, mountains, rivers, and woods. Subordinate even to the terrestrial gods were the Penates and Lares, the Demigods and Deified Heroes, all claiming a share in the veneration, the homage and respect of the human family. Every nation, every town, nay, every family had its friends and its foes in the council of Olympus, and so numerous was the entire assemblage of Grecian and Roman divinities, that it was said to be easier to find a god than a man. Nor was this immense host of heavenly rulers idle or unemployed; to each was allotted his separate share in the government of the universe. "On Mercury," says Mr. Gross, "devolved the duty to be the messenger of his divine compeers; Bacchus bore sway over the convivial eup and its orgiastic rites; and stern Mars found his post wherever the cry of battle and the clash of arms resounded in martial discord. Apollo presided over the fine arts, medicine, music, poetry, and eloquence; while Neptune stretched his pronged sceptre over the green waters and mountain-waves of old ocean. Ceres introduced the cereal grains among mankind, and guided and fostered agrarian pursuits; to be the queen of love and the mistress of grace and soft delights, became none so well as Venus; Flora betrayed her refined taste in the cultivation of flowers; and the elastic and sprightly Diana strung her bow in the sports and fatigues of the chase."

The Greek mythology is justly believed to have been of Cretan origin, and Crete having been the primeval seat of Phœnician and Egyptian colonists, it is fundamentally, like the earlier religions, a strictly Tsabaian system of idolatry, the recognition and worship of the sun, moon, and stars as divinities, being the basis on which the whole complicated system is made to rest. Accordingly there is ample ground for the theory of Creuzer and other German writers, that the classical mythology of the ancient heathens is of a strictly allegorical and symbolic character. In the days of Homer, the gods of Greece were only eight in number, but as time advanced the Grecian divinities so rapidly multiplied, that the form in which it has come down to us is that of a perfectly complete mythic system, the exposition of which has engaged the earnest and profound investigation of some of the ablest and most erudite scholars of the age.

The mythology of the ancient Persians, as developed in the Zend-Avesta, has in it several peculiarities which distinguish it from the other religions of antiquity. One of these is its dualistic character, the two elementary principles, Ormuzd and Alriman, constituting an original antagonism between good and evil, which might seem at first contradictory and self-destructive. But above and beyond these contending elements, was the Supreme Being under the name of Zeruane Akerene. Fire was regarded as the omnipotent organ of the Divine energy, in the form of a twofold emanation, represented by Mithras the fire-god, and Mitra the fire-goddess. This fire-worship, which was simply a form of Tsabaism, appears to have been almost coeval with the human race. Under the name of Agni, fire was worshipped in India in the Vaidic age; and from India and Persia, this species of worship was propagated among other nations. The Ethiopians revered the Persian fire-god as their oldest lawgiver, and the founder of their religion. The Egyptians also had their Heliopolis, or city of the sun, where obelisks were erected in honour of the sun, the source of light and heat. From Persia, Mithras worship spread to Armenia, Cappadocia, Pontus, Cilicia, Greece, Rome, and even Germany. Humboldt discovered the same species of worship in the halls and temples of the Montezumas.

It is remarkable how far the mythologies of ancient times spread beyond the regions in which they originated. The Persian fire-worship, for instance, was introduced at Rome in the time of the Emperors, and thence it was rapidly diffused over the whole empire. "Troops of Egyptian priests," to use the language of Mr. Osburn in his 'Religions of the World,' "made their appearance in many of the cities of the Roman Empire, singing the praises and setting forth the temporal advantages of the worship of the gods of Egypt, especially of Isis, the wife or female half of Osiris. They had assuredly great success. This is evidenced by the number of Egypto-Roman statues of the gods of Egypt to be seen in all extensive collections of classical antiquities. The ruins of the temple of Isis have likewise been found at Pompeii, in South Italy. It was in the wake of the conquering arms of Rome that the Greek mythology travelled over the world. Both systems were, however, in this their propagation, associated with the very remarkable dogma of Pantheism. This word meant, in its ancient and true sense, that everything which ever had been worshipped by any race of mankind, was a god really, and ought still to be worshipped. It was in obedience to this teaching that the Egyptian priests were permitted to build temples to their gods in Rome, Byzantium, Carthage, and other great cities of the empire. It was in the same spirit that the Roman legionaries placed the altars and temples of their own gods in all the countries they had conquered. They were merely Roman names for the gods whose worship they found established there.

All were gods alike. All were indeed the same gods, and they merely worshipped them abroad under the names they had been accustomed to apply to them at home."

The varied forms of mythology which had thus found their way into the Roman Empire, gradually lost their power over the minds of the people, in consequence of the progress of science and philosophy, but more especially the introduction of Christianity, which rapidly extinguished the false lights of Pagan religions, substituting the full effulgence of the Sun of Righteousness with its illuminating and refreshing influence on the hearts and consciences of men.

The Scandinavian mythology holds a kind of intermediate place between the religions of antiquity and those of modern heathendom. It seems to have had its origin among the Teutonic tribes in the plains of Upper Asia, between the Euxine and the Caspian seas. Under the leadership of Odin, a portion of the people inhabiting this locality set out on an expedition towards the north-west, subduing the countries through which they passed, and settled at length in the country now called Jutland and the adjacent islands. Here was erected the kingdom of Denmark, over which Odin appointed his son, Skjold, to be the first king. The conquest of Scandinavia by Odin is calculated by the archaeologists of the North to have happened so recently as about forty years before the birth of Christ, and the whole history of the mythology of the Edda, from its origin to its final disappearance, does not include a longer space of time than 1,000 years. At the head of the Norse deities is Odin, the sun-god, and next to him Frigga, his spouse, who represents the earth. Thor, the son of Odin, is the god of thunder. Baldur is the personification of all that is great and good, and Loki, the principle of evil. The whole body of the Northern gods, or Æsir, as they were called, in the opinion of some writers, symbolized the laws and operations of physical nature; but according to others, they were planetary gods. In this latter view Mr Gross thus describes them: "Thor, the opener of the year, begins his reign at the period of the vernal equinox, in the sign of Aries; and as such he is symbolical of time and terrestrial fecundity. Next comes Uller in Taurus, when the earth begins to develop its latent energies, and gives promise of future plenty; and therefore the horn of taurus, or the ox, is typical of agrarian abundance; it is the horn of plenty, so frequently quoted in the ornate effusions of poets and orators. Frey, the floral god, who is at once the lovely and the loving, takes his turn in Gemini, and is now in the bloom and vigour of his strength, of which his sword is the emblem. June, or Cancer, claims the presence of Odin, and the sun-god is now in the culmination of his divine might: his creative and maturing planetary influence is complete. At this point of the ecliptic the sun begins its recession from the northern hemisphere,—Odin dies; retires to his hall Valhalla, in July; and in August, he already occupies Gladshelm—glad-home, or the abode of bliss, as the father of souls. Skadi succeeds in Libra, or September; and Baldur, the good, takes his station in Scorpio, or October, after the autumnal equinox. As to Heimdall, the preserver of the planetary world, he demands Sagittarius, or November, for his portion of zodiacal sway; while Freyja, the delight, is content with December, or Capricorn. Forsetti takes possession of Aquarius, or January; Njörd of Pisces, or February; and Vidar, without any definite abode, closes the cycle of the year, of the quiet, silent departure of which he is the type. Hence he is called the silent god."

It is somewhat remarkable, that from districts closely adjacent to that part of Asia from which Odin came, several other religious reformers issued on expeditions of conquest several centuries before. Thus Budha journeyed south-eastward into India, Confucius north-eastward into China, and Zoroaster southward into Persia. The earliest mythology which is known to have existed in India, is that of the Védas, which was essentially symbolic of the elements and energies of nature, one-half of the hymns and prayers of the Rig-Véda being addressed either to Indra, the god of light, or Agni, the god of fire. The next in prominence to these is Taruna, the god of water. And although a multitude of other gods are mentioned, they appear to have been simply personifications of the powers and processes of nature. "Perhaps," says Ritter, in his 'History of Ancient Philosophy,' "there is nothing more instructive in Indian archaeology, than, so to express ourselves, the transparency of their mythology, which permits us to perceive how, with a general sense of the divine, the co-existence of a special recognition thereof in the separate phenomena of nature was possible, and how, out of the conception of the one God, a belief in the plurality of gods could arise."

By what means the second phase of the mythology of India, that of Brahmanism, was produced, it is impossible even to conjecture. With the conquests of the Aryans came an entire change in the religion of the vanquished. For the worship of gods symbolizing the elements and processes of nature, was substituted the worship of gods more completely resembling men. But at the head of this humanized pantheon is a mere abstraction, which, under the name of Brahm, sits enthroned in solitary majesty the sole existing being in the universe, all else, though seeming to exist, being Maya or illusion. Subordinate to this supreme deity, is the Hindu Trimurti, consisting of Brahma, the creator, Vishnu, the preserver, and Shiva, the destroyer. The numberless gods of the Hindu pantheon are simply different names or attributes of these members of the sacred Triad.

In process of time Brahmanism or Hinduism succeeded, displacing the simpler mythology of the Vaidie period; but the complicated religion of the Aryans at length began to lose its hold of the thinking portion of the community, through the rise of certain philosophic schools, whose creed was that of undisguised Atheism, under the imposing title of a rational system of belief; but still more through the promulgation of Buddhism in the seventh century before the Christian era. The progress of this new faith was slow but sure, and at length it succeeded in overshadowing its rival for a thousand years, at the end of which a terrible revulsion took place in the feelings of the people: "The younger sister," to use the language of Mr. Hardwick, "was violently extruded by the elder from all parts of Hindustan, if we except one scanty remnant at the foot of the Himalaya. Yet meanwhile Buddhism had evinced a property unknown to every other heathen system. It was far more capable of transplantation. It flourished with peculiar freshness and luxuriance in Tibet, and ultimately in the Tatar tribes of central Asia. Above all, it kept possession of its ancient fortress in the island of Ceylon; and thither, in the early centuries of our era, flocked a multitude of foreign pilgrims, anxious by such visit to abridge their term of penitential suffering, to venerate the relics of Gautama Buddha, or to kiss the print of his gigantic foot."

The religion of Budha can scarcely be considered as having a mythology, since it not only disowns all belief in the numberless gods of Hinduism, but it is essentially atheistic and nihilistic in its whole character. All nature is in Buddhism nothing more than an eternal and necessary chain of causes and effects; and in the case of the human family an infinite succession of births and new births. It teaches, accordingly, that the grand aim of all religions is to deliver us from this terrible necessity of repeated births,

When driven from Hindustan, Buddhism found a home in Thibet and Tartary, where it assumed the form of Lamaism, with its doctrine of perpetual incarnations. In China, again, where it was introduced shortly after the Christian era, it is known by the name of Fo-ism. But the orthodox Buddhists are found chiefly in Ceylon. A remnant of the system still exists in India in the religion of the JAINS (which see). Gutzlaff tells us, that the only genuine Buddhists in China are the monks and mendicants. The Buddhist mythology of Nepál exhibits a peculiarity which is not found in any other country, that it recognizes an Adi-Budha or a first Budha, in the character of a Supreme Creator—a doctrine which may possibly have been borrowed from the adjacent Brahmanism. In the numerous Fo-ist temples of China, the chief object of adoration is a perfect Budha named O-me-to, who is looked upon as the great source of deliverance from all kinds of evil. One prayer of faith addressed to this imaginary deity will, it is believed, secure a man's salvation. It is a remarkable fact, that in the revolution which is at present going forward in China, the rebels manifest a special hatred to the Fo-ists, and so rapidly has Buddhism in that country been declining for some years past, that as the missionary Gutzlaff informs us, "The Fo-ist temples are now mostly deserted and in a state of ruins; the votaries fewer and fewer, and the offerings very sparing." To compensate this state of matters Buddhism seems to flourish vigorously in Burmah and Siam, though the progress of British conquest, in the former country, is likely to check its further advances.

About the middle of the sixth century before Christ, a remarkable sage, named Confucius, was born in China, who gave rise to a system of philosophy which, partaking partly of a political and partly of a religious character, has established itself as one of the leading forms of belief among the Chinese. The most ancient creed of the Middle Kingdom appears to have been a kind of Tsabaism, or worship of the heavenly bodies, combined with a worship of demons or spirits, who were believed to preside over different realms of creation. Confucius modified the ancient mythology of the Chinese, by adding to it a system of hero-worship, while to the sage himself was assigned a most conspicuous place in the already crowded pantheon. Nor are the Chinese at this day strangers to this system of apotheosis, men and even women having temples erected in honour of them, and prayers said before their images. The most prominent superstition, indeed, among this strange people at the present moment, is the worship of the holy mother Ma-tso-poo, which chiefly prevails among the sailors. But throughout the whole Chinese Empire, creature-worship is almost universally found in the form of veneration paid to departed ancestors.

Half-a-century earlier than the birth of Confucius, an ascetic philosopher, named Lao-tse, appeared, who gave origin to a sect called the Tao-ists, who worshipped their founder, and zealously adhered to and propagated his doctrines as developed in the Tao-te-king. This School of the Fixed Way, as it is called, seems to have aimed at banishing from the mythology of China those numberless deities, demons, and heroes with which it was encumbered, and to have set themselves to promulgate among their countrymen the 'Doctrine of Reason,' as they termed it, which alleges the existence of a great nameless Unity in nature, of which Lao-tse was believed to be an incarnation. For a time this sect made little progress, but about B. C. 140, the then reigning Emperor having along with his Empress embraced the system, it received a very large accession to the numbers of its adherents. The Tao-ists now began to claim supernatural powers, and from this time they gave themselves to magic, fortune-telling, and superstitious practices of various kinds. Their chief men accordingly are styled "heavenly doctors," and the head of the whole sect is believed to be an incarnation of Tao, and to exercise absolute dominion over unseen spirits.

In both North and South America the most ancient forms of religion were, as in China, spirit-worship and element-worship, which may be considered as primitive forms of heathenism. The spirits which they venerate are some of them the manes of their departed ancestors, and others the tenants of various natural objects which are thus converted into Fetishes, such as are worshipped in Greenland, Western Africa, and Siberia.

The sun, moon, and stars are the chief objects of the adoration of the American savage, believing them, as he does, to be animated and even intelligent. Amid the polytheism, however, which pervades his mythology, he believes in one Great Spirit, who rules over and regulates the universe, but who is nevertheless merely one of a whole host of deities, and in fact little more than a personification of the powers of nature, the Sun-god, as he is often termed. And while the American Indian believes in an array of benevolent spirits headed by the Sun, he puts equal faith in the existence of an army of evil spirits headed by the Moon. To propitiate the favour of the one, and avert the anger of the other, constitutes one of the chief aims of his religion.

Of a similar character was the mythology of the ancient Mexicans. Originally partaking of the distinctive characteristic of a Nature-worship, it gradually assumed the features of a species of Hero-worship. The deities came more nearly to resemble human beings. It is generally believed, however, that the Mexicans believed in a Supreme Being, whom they termed Tco-tl. Their pantheon consisted of thirteen chief divinities, at the head of which was Tezcatlipoca, who appears to have been a Sun-god. Another deity, who was the object of dread to the Mexicans, was Mexitli or Huitzilopochtli, who may be called the Mars of Central America. To propitiate this awful divinity, his altars were made continually to stream with the blood of human victims. A third important member of the Aztec pantheon was Quetzalcoatl, or the "Feathered Serpent."

The mythology of many nations of modern heathendom consists of a series of fables in reference to demons or devils whom they worship. Of this character is the Shamanism of the Ugrian tribes of Siberia, Lapland, and other northern countries, and the same mode of worship prevails among the aboriginal tribes of Hindustan, and the inhabitants of Polynesia or the islands of the South Pacific Ocean. Such, so varied is the mythology of the nations of the world.

N

NAAMAH, the sister of Tubat-cain, as we learn from Gen. iv. 22. Her name signifies in Hebrew, "the fair one," and the Arabian writers are generally agreed in representing her as a very beautiful woman. She is one of the four females from whom the Jewish Rabbis allege the angels to have sprung. Some have supposed her to be identical with Ash-taroith.

NADAB, the ecclesiastical head of the Mohammedans in Persia. His office corresponds to that of the Mufti in Turkey, with this difference, however, that the Nadab can divest himself of his spiritual functions, which the Mufti cannot do.

NADHAMIANS, a heretical Mohammedan sect, which maintained that God could do evil, but that he never does it, lest he should appear an imperfect and wicked Being.

NENIA, a funeral dirge, which was sung among the ancient Greeks in praise of the deceased. A goddess bearing this name was worshipped at Rome, but being connected with the dead, her temple was outside the city.

NAGAS, snake-gods, who, according to the system of Buddhism, have their residence under the sacred mountain Méru, and in the waters of the world of men. They have the shape of the spectacle-snake, with the extended hood; but many actions are attributed to them that can only be done by one possessing the human form. They are demi-gods, who are usually considered as favourable to Budha and his adherents; but when roused to anger they are very formidable.

NAGAS, a class of Hindu mendicant monks who travel about in a state of nudity, but armed with warlike weapons, usually a matchlock, and sword, and shield. They are not limited to one sect, there being Vaishnava and Saiva Nagas, the latter of whom smear their bodies with ashes, allow their hair, beards, and whiskers to grow, and wear the projecting braid of hair, called the Jata. The Sikh Nagas, however, differ from those of the other sects by abstaining from the use of arms, and following a retired and religious life.

NAHAT. See ANATHIS.

NAHMEH, the goddess of health among the ancient Egyptians. She was the spouse of THOTH which see.

NAIADS, nymphs who were considered among the ancient Greeks and Romans to preside over rivers, fountains, lakes, and streams.

NAINS, spirits in the Scandinavian mythology who dwelt in caverns, and excelled in the art of working metals. They only appeared during the night, and if they allowed themselves to be overtaken by the rays of the rising sun, they were straightway changed into stones.

NAKIB, the chief of the EMIRS (which see) among the Turkish Mohammedans, who is held in great respect as being the head of the descendants of the prophet. He has the power of life and death over the other Emirs.

NAKIR, one of the two angels who, according to the Mohammedans, preside at the examination of the dead. See DEAD (EXAMINATION OF THE).

NAMANDA, a short ejaculatory prayer usually addressed by the Japanese to their god AMIDAS (which see). This prayer, which is either sung or repeated to the tinkling of a little bell, consists of only three words, which signify, "Ever blessed Amidas, have mercy upon us." The frequent repetition of the Namanda is considered by the Japanese as conducive to the deliverance of their friends and relations from suffering in another world. Societies also are formed to repeat this short prayer for the comfort and relief of their own souls. Oriental scholars allege that the words in which the Namanda is expressed are pure Sanskrit.

NAMAZI, the five daily prayers which the Mohammedans regularly repeat every twenty-four hours. According to a tradition, the prophet was commanded by God to impose upon his disciples the daily obligation of fifty prayers. By the advice of Moses he solicited and obtained permission to reduce them to five, which are indispensable. The five times of prayer in the course of a day are, 1. Day-break; 2. Noon; 3. Afternoon; 4. Evening; and 5. The first watch of the night. These prayers are of divine obligation. The introduction of the first is attributed to Adam, of the second to Abraham, of the third to Jonah, of the fourth to Jesus, and of the fifth to Moses. On Friday, which is the Mohammedan Sabbath, a sixth prayer is added, and this additional prayer is repeated between day-break and noon. If the prayers are not repeated at the prescribed hours, they are accounted vain and useless. The arrival of each of the hours of prayer is publicly announced by the proclamation of a MUEZZIN (which see).

NANA, the mother of the Phrygian god Atys, and the great goddess of the Armenians.

NANAK SHAHIS. See SIKHS.

NANEA, an ancient Persian goddess, whose temple and priests are mentioned in 2 Mac. i. 13. The name is supposed to be derived from the Persian word nahida, a ripe virgin.

NAOS. See NAVE.

NAPÆÆ, nymphs among the ancient Greeks who presided over groves and forests, and who were believed sometimes to frighten solitary travelers.

NARADA, a Hindu deity, the offspring of Brahma and Saraswati. He was believed to be the inventor of the Æolian harp, and to preside over the sacred music of heaven and earth, of nature and humanity.

NARAKAS, the principal places of suffering in the system of the Buddhists. These are reckoned eight in number, each of them 10,000 yojanas in length, breadth, and height. The walls are nine yojanas in thickness, and of so dazzling a brightness, that they burst the eyes of those who look at them, even from the distance of a hundred yojanas. Each hell is so enclosed that there is no possibility of escape from it. There are in all 136 Narakas, and the whole are situated in the interior of the earth.

NARAYANA, a surname given in the laws of Manu to Brahma as resting on an aquatic plant, the lotus flower, in the midst of the great abyss of waters. There he reclines on the serpent Ananta or eternity, with closed eyes, and reposes in mysterious slumber.

NARTHEX, the name given by the early Christians to that portion of a church which formed its outer division within the walls. It was an oblong section of the building, extending across and occupying the front part of the interior of the house. It was entered by three doors leading from the outer porch. From the narthex there were also three entrances, the main entrance being in the middle, directly opposite the altar, and opening immediately into the nave. Two smaller doors upon each side appear to have opened into the side aisles, from which the nave was entered by doors on the north and the south. The doors consisted of two folding leaves, and the different classes of worshippers entered the nave at different doors, which were appropriated to them. The vessel or font of water for purification, which stood at one time outside the church, was afterwards introduced into the narthex. In this part of the church the penitents and catechumens stood during divine service to hear the psalms and scriptures read, and the sermon preached, after which they were dismissed without any prayers or solemn benediction. In the narthex also Jews, heathens, heretics, and schismatics were sometimes allowed to take their place. The term narthex seems to have been applied to the ante-temple of a church, because it was of an oblong figure. Some churches had three or four narthexes, but these were without the walls, not like the ordinary narthex inside the church.

NASAIRIAH. See ANSARIANS.

NASCIO, a Roman goddess who was believed to preside over the birth of children.

NASI, the name given by the Jews to the president of the great Sanhedrim, who was held in high respect by the court, who received him standing when he entered the place of meeting. Till the Captivity the sovereign or chief ruler acted as Nasi. Moses is said by the Rabbis to have been the first president of the Sanhedrim, but after the Captivity the two offices became quite distinct. According to the Rabbis it was the prerogative of the descendants of Hillel to execute the duties of this high office.

NASIB, the Mohammedan destiny or FATE (which see).

NASR, one of the five gods of the ancient Arabians mentioned in the Koran. He was the supreme deity of the Arabs of Yemen, and as the name signifies an eagle, he may have been the sun-god.

NASTROND, the shore of the dead, one of the two places of punishment among the ancient Scandinavians. In this place, which was to endure for ever, the Edda declares, "there is a vast and direful structure with doors that face the north. It is formed entirely of the backs of serpents, wadded together like wicker work. But the serpents' heads are turned towards the inside of the hall, and continually vomit forth floods of venom, in which all those wade who commit murder, or who forswear themselves."

NATALES EPISCOPATUS, the birth-days of bishops or their ordination, being at first anniversaries of their ordination, which they themselves kept in their lifetime, and which were continued in memory of them after their death. By this means these festivals came to be inserted in the Martyrologies as standing festivals in remembrance of their ordination or nativity to the episcopal office. These anniversaries were celebrated with reading, psalmody, preaching, praying, and receiving the eucharist.

NATIVITY OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY, a festival observed by the Church of Rome annually on the 8th of September.

NATURALISTS. See RATIONALISTS.

NATURAL RELIGION, an expression used to denote those religious truths which are derived from the teaching of the light of nature, or the exercise of the unassisted powers of human reason. These primary truths of religion are few in number, including simply the Being and Perfections of God; the different relations in which we stand to this Great Being, and the duties arising therefrom; the Divine government of the world; the immortality of the soul, and the future state of rewards and punishments. These are the great articles of Natural Religion; but though said to be derived from the simple unaided efforts of human reason, mankind are far from being unanimous in their admission of these articles. Some have even gone so far as to deny that human reason can possibly discover for itself religious truths of any kind. But without utterly rejecting Natural Religion, we may remark that there is no point which it is of greater importance to keep constantly in view, in all our inquiries into matters of religion, than the precise line of distinction which separates the province of reason from that of revelation. The two are constantly in danger of being confounded, more especially by those who have been educated in a professedly Christian country, and under the influence, perhaps imperceptible, which a knowledge of divine truth, however superficial, exercises over all our opinions and judgments. So liable, indeed, are we to be modified in our sentiments by the peculiar circumstances amid which we are placed, that it is often difficult, if not impossible, to state from what precise source any particular opinion has been derived. Hence it not unfrequently happens, that we attribute to the pure native operations of reason, sentiments which we have acquired only in consequence of our acquaintance with the truths of revealed religion; and conversely also we sometimes imagine that the perverse deductions of our own unassisted reason are sanctioned by, or perhaps originate in, the dictates of inspiration. Of these two classes of errors, though the latter is attended with the worst practical consequences, the former is the more subtle and imperceptible in its influence. We have formed many of our religious opinions directly from our knowledge of revealed truth, and yet so familiar have we become with them, and so deeply convinced of their reality, that we are in danger of confounding them with the plainest and simplest deductions of human reason. They bear upon our minds with the force of independent axioms, until at length we conclude them to have reached us in consequence of the primary operations of our own minds. It is more difficult than is often imagined to separate between the conviction arising from our belief in the doctrines of Scripture and the conviction arising from the simple exercise of our minds upon the evidence in favour of that truth of which we are become convinced. Thus, the doctrine of the immortality of the soul is taught clearly in the pages of revelation, but it is also alleged to be ascertainable by the exercise of unassisted reason. Now, in reference to all those who have been familiar from infancy with the statements of the Bible, the difficulty is to calculate what amount of conviction, as to the soul's immortality, they have drawn from the one source, and what from the other. Do they believe the doctrine because nature has taught them to believe it, or is it not rather because the Bible has taught them? The proofs which have passed before the minds of the heathen unenlightened by the Gospel, have, with at least equal force, pressed themselves upon the attention of those who are blessed with the light of revelation; they have learned much upon the subject, no doubt, from the dictates of nature, but how much more have they learned from the lessons of Scripture! The danger lies in their confounding the teaching of the one with the teaching of the other; in attributing to reason what they have received solely from revelation; and, on the other hand, in endeavouring to make revelation responsible for what are purely and entirely the perverse judgments of unaided reason. In a sound condition of our intellectual and moral powers, reason and revelation must always be at one; but we are too prone to exalt the former at the expense of the latter. To keep the province of the one separate and distinct from the province of the other, is in fact one of the most difficult, but nevertheless one of the most important lessons which the theological student is called upon to learn. It is to ignorance and recklessness on this one point, that we would be inclined to attribute the greater part of the heresies which have distracted the Christian Church.

We have been endowed by our Creator with reason for the most valuable and necessary ends; but these ends in reference to theology, are too little regarded. The Socinian entertains the most vague and extravagant views as to the illimitable extent to which reason can go, while the enthusiast, on the other hand, restricts it within too narrow bounds; and one of the most necessary points, we conceive, in the logical training of the speculative inquirer in theology, is to enable him to ascertain the precise and definite limits which bound the province within which the exercise of human reason must be strictly confined. As long as we investigate the evidence on which the truth of revelation rests, reason is employed within her own sphere; and even after having ascertained that there is sufficient evidence to prove that the alleged revelation has indeed come from God, reason may legitimately inquire what is the precise meaning of its contents, and the relative bearing of its parts upon each other, or, in other words, what is usually termed the analogy of faith. Here, however, we have reached the point at which reason must pause, and revelation assume the sole and undivided supremacy. The truth of the individual doctrines is founded not on their reasonableness, though that may be admitted as an additional evidence in their favour, but solely on the authority of Him from whom we have ascertained the revelation to have come. It is not necessary, as the Socinian would argue, that what the Bible teaches should be proved to be consistent with reason; this were to make the reason of man, feeble though it be, the arbiter and judge in matters which, from their very nature, must be regarded as beyond the limits of human investigation. Revelation presupposes man to be ignorant of those truths which it unfolds, and shall he notwithstanding dare to exalt reason so extravagantly as to imagine it, in point of fact, superior in authority to the dictates of inspiration? No, by no means. It is in condescension to the feebleness and inadequacy of human reason, that a revelation has been imparted at all, and ever recollecting that what we do not understand is far from being, on that account, necessarily untrue, let us bow implicitly to the simple statements of that Being whose "understanding is infinite."

No little injury has been done to the cause of Christianity by the extravagant adulators of human reason. Under the delusive idea, that by depriving the religion of the Bible of all that was peculiar, and by endeavouring to reduce it to a perfect consistency and harmony with what are imagined to be the necessary truths taught by nature, they have furnished the infidel with powerful, and we fear too effective, weapons, wherewith to destroy the whole Christian system. The result, accordingly, has been such as might have been anticipated. Bolingbroke, Tindal, Collins, and many others of the same school, have directed their whole efforts to show that there is nothing in Christianity which was not previously revealed to us in the religion of nature; and if any mysteries are recorded, they are merely resolvable into the figurative phraseology in which the author wrote, or into subsequent corruptions and interpolations of the record itself. Thus it is, that under the guise of friendship the deadliest blows have been struck at all that is vital in the Christianity of the Bible; and that, too, arising from no other cause than the injudicious conduct of its real friends. It is not in Germany alone that this spirit of rationalism has been diffusing its withering influence; in Britain, also, has such a spirit been gradually gaining ground. The consistency of revelation with reason is, no doubt, when properly conducted, a powerful argument in its favour; but there is a point in the argument beyond which we dare not go, and the exact position of which, it is absolutely necessary for us previously to ascertain. It was an investigation of this kind that gave rise to one of the most valuable works on mental science that has ever appeared—the immortal essay of Locke on the Human Understanding. "Were it fair to trouble thee with the history of this essay," says the author in his Epistle to the reader, "I should tell thee, that five or six friends meeting at my chamber, and discoursing on a subject very remote from this, found themselves quickly at a stand, by the difficulties that rose on every side. After we had a while puzzled ourselves, without coming any nearer a resolution of those doubts which perplexed us, it came into my thoughts that we took a wrong course, and that before we set ourselves upon inquiries of that nature, it was necessary to examine our own abilities, and see what object our understandings were or were not fitted to deal with." It were well for the cause of Christianity, and well for the cause of science in general, that the example of Locke were more frequently followed, and the fact rendered familiar to our minds, that there is a point where reason ends, and implicit faith in revelation must begin. The human mind has not previously discovered all that the Bible unfolds to us, otherwise what necessity for the Bible at all? If, then, there be truths peculiar to the Christian system, there is no necessity for the slightest anxiety on the part of the defenders of Christianity to reconcile any apparent inconsistency between these peculiar Christian truths and the principles of reason. A strong presumptive argument, it is true, may be founded on the fact which, in most instances, can be shown by analogy, that what is peculiar to Christianity is not contrary to reason. Such an argument, however, can never amount to more than a presumption in its favour; and though it may be powerful enough to silence the cavils of objectors, it adds little to the direct force of the Christian evidence.

The essential and primary elements of all religious truth may be learned by the pure efforts of reason unaided by revelation, and all revealed religion, in fact, proceeds on the existence of that class of truths which is included under the term Natural Religion. But to assert this, is just tantamount to the assertion that the Scriptures are accommodated to the nature of the beings to whom they are addressed. This is not all, however, that may be said in reference to their value. They state, no doubt, what is addressed to our reason, and what proceeds on the supposition that there are some truths which unassisted reason has discovered; but they do more, for they state, and in this their peculiar excellence consists, many truths which the reason of man hath not discovered, and by its most strenuous and sustained exertions never could discover. And the danger is, that in deference to a certain class of sceptics and unbelievers, these peculiarities of the Christian system should either be entirely overlooked, or attempted to be so modified as to suit the caprice of those who, while they profess an adherence to the doctrines of revelation, are all the while still more devoted admirers of human reason. All human systems of religion, even the most degrading, are founded to some extent on natural religion, or, in other words, on those religious sentiments and feelings which are inherent in the constitution of every mind. But from these human religions, Christianity stands separate and apart; and the exhibition of its peculiarities, as contradistinguished from every other system of religious doctrine, forms a most important branch of the Christian evidences. This argument skilfully conducted would tend to destroy the force of the infidel maxim which is too often assumed as the shibboleth of a self-styled liberal party—that all religions are alike. The counterfeit, we admit, may resemble the true coin in one point—that they are both of them coins, but in every other point they are diametrically opposed. Between truth and falsehood in the eyes of God there is and must ever be a great gulf fixed; and though man may impiously dare to approximate the two, and even to mistake the one for the other, the eye of Omniscience discerns between them an inconceivable, an infinite distance.

NATURE-WORSHIP. See FETISH-WORSHIP, MYTHOLOGY.

NAULEM, the fare which Charon, according to the belief of the ancient Greeks and Romans, demanded from those whom he ferried over the rivers Styx and Acheron in the Infernal regions. To enable the dead to satisfy this demand, it was customary to put a small piece of money in the mouth of a corpse before burial.

NAVE, the name given in ancient times to the main body of a Christian church, where the people met for religious worship. It was also called the place of assembly, and the quadrangle, from its quadrangular form, in contrast with the circular or elliptical form of the chancel. In a central position in the nave stood the ambo or reading-desk, elevated on a platform above the level of the surrounding seats. The choristers and professional singers were provided with seats near the desk. The seats in front, and on either side of it, were occupied by the believers or Christian communicants. At a very early period the nave was divided into separate parts, and specific seats assigned to the several classes of which the audience consisted. As the rules of the primitive church required the separation of the sexes, the male and female portion of the audience were separated from one another by a veil or lattice. In the Eastern churches the women and catechumens occupied the galleries above, while the men sat below. In some churches a separate apartment was allotted to widows and virgins. The ordinary place for the catechumens was next to the believers, and arranged in the order of their several classes. Behind the catechumens sat those penitents, who had been restored to a place in the church. The nave was separated from the narthex by wooden rails, in which were gates, called by the modern rituals and Greek writers, the beautiful and royal gates, where kings and emperors were wont to lay aside their crowns before entering the body of the church.

NAZARENES, a term of reproach applied to the early Christians by the Jews, by whom they were sometimes styled the sect of the Nazarenes, as we find in Acts xxiv. 5. A particular sect, however, arose in the second century, which Jerome and Epiphanius mention as called by this name, and who taught that the Jewish law, and especially circumcision, was obligatory on Jewish Christians, and moreover, they believed Jesus to be the son of the Virgin Mary, but a mere man. The Jews, we are told by early Christian writers, were wont to curse and anathematize this sect of Nazarenes, three times a-day, morning, noon, and night, using this imprecation in their prayers in the synagogue, "Send thy curse, O God, upon the Nazarenes." Jerome mentions a Hebrew gospel which he had received from the Nazarenes near the close of the fourth century. They then dwelt at Beræa in Syria. Their views of Christ, as exhibited in the gospel which bears their name, are thus detailed by Neander: "He is described by them as the one towards whom the progressive movement of the theocracy tended from the beginning; as the end and aim of all the earlier divine revelations. In him, the Holy Spirit, from whom, down to this time, only isolated revelations and excitations had proceeded, first found an abiding place of rest, a permanent abode. Inasmuch as the Holy Spirit was the productive principle of his entire nature, and it was first from him that the efficiency of the Spirit, in shaping the entire life of humanity, and forming other organs of action, could proceed, he is called the first-born of the Holy Spirit;—as the Holy Spirit is also denominated his mother. Where this gospel describes how the whole fountain of the Holy Spirit descended on Christ at his baptism and abode permanently with him, the following words of salutation are ascribed to the former: 'My Son, in all the prophets I expected thee, that thou shouldst come, and I might find in thee a place of rest; for thou art my resting place, thou art my first-born Son, who reignest for ever.'" The Nazarenes are often confounded with the Ebionites, with whom to a certain extent they agreed in opinion.

NAZARITE, one consecrated to God under the Jewish law by a peculiar vow, which is fully explained in Num. vi. 13—21. Samson was dedicated to the Lord even before his birth under the vow of a Nazarite. The same also was done in the case of Samuel, whose mother Hannah, we are informed in 1st Samuel i. 11, "vowed a vow, and said, O Lord of hosts, if thou wilt indeed look on the affliction of thine handmaid, and remember me, and not forget thine handmaid, but wilt give unto thine handmaid a man-child, then I will give him unto the Lord all the days of his life, and there shall no razor come upon his head." Michaelis alleges that Nazaritism was not instituted by Moses, but was of more ancient, probably of Egyptian origin. The vow of the Nazarite was the only rite of an ascetic character in use among the Israelites. It was called the Great Vow, and those who observed it were accounted of equal sanctity with the high-priest. The vow was either for life, or only for a short time, which the Jews say was at least thirty days. From Acts xxii. 26, however, it appears that the duration of the vow might last no longer than a week. Women, if they wished, might become Nazarites as well as men, provided they were at their own disposal, and not under the authority of parents or husbands who might cancel their vow. One part of the obligations under which a Nazarite came, was to abstain altogether from wine, and other intoxicating liquors, that he might be the better fitted to study the law, and devote himself to religious exercises. He was also bound to let his hair grow until the time of his vow was ended. That he might be always ready to engage in divine service, he was prohibited from touching a dead body, or even accompanying a funeral procession, lest he should contract ceremonial defilement. During his separation, a Nazarite was usually dressed in a garment of hair, called by the Hebrews Addereth. At the expiry of his vow the Nazarite was obliged to offer a lamb of the first year without blemish for a burnt-offering; a ewe lamb of the first year without blemish for a sin-offering, and a ram without blemish for a peace-offering. He was now allowed to shave his head, and was obliged to carry his hair into the room of the Nazarites, which, in the second temple, was situated in the north-east corner of the court of the women, and there to commit it to the flames. This was done as a token that he had performed his vow.

NDA, a secret association among the people of Southern Guinea in West Africa. It is confined to the adult male population, and is thus described by Mr. Wilson, who, from his long residence in the country, acquired an intimate acquaintance with its peculiar customs. Speaking of this association, he says, "It is headed by a spirit of this name, who dwells in the woods, and appears only when summoned by some unusual event, at the death of a person connected with the order—at the birth of twins, or at the inauguration of some one into office. His voice is never heard except at night, and after the people have retired to rest. He enters the village from the woodside, and is so bundled up in dried plantain leaves that no one would suspect him of belonging to the human species. He is always accompanied by a train of young men, and the party dance to a peculiar and somewhat plaintive air on a flute-like instrument as they parade the streets. As soon as it is known that he has entered the village, the women and children hurry away to their rooms to hide themselves. If they should have the misfortune to see Ndâ, or should be discovered peeping at him through the cracks of the houses, they would be thrashed almost to death. Perhaps no woman has ever had the temerity to cast eyes upon this mysterious being. Ndâ frequently stops in front of the dwelling of a man who is known to have rum in his possession, and exacts a bottle, in default of which his property would be injured. The leading men of the village show the utmost deference to his authority, and no doubt for the purpose of making a stronger impression upon the minds of the women and children. If a distinguished person dies, Ndâ affects great rage, and comes the following night with a large posse of men to seize the property of the villagers without discrimination. He is sure to lay hands on as many sheep and goats as are necessary to make a grand feast, and no man has any right to complain. Many take the precaution to lock up their sheep and other live stock in their dwelling-houses the night before, and in this way alone can they escape the ravages of this monster of the woods, who is sure to commit depredations somewhat in proportion to the importance and rank of the man who has died. The institution of Ndâ, like that of Mwetyi, is intended to keep the women, children, and slaves in subjection. I once heard a man who belonged to the order acknowledge that there was no such spirit; 'but how,' said he, 'shall we govern our women and our slaves if we do away with the impression that there is such a being.'"

NDENGEI, the highest deity worshipped by the inhabitants of the Feejee Islands. They believe that this god manifests himself in a variety of forms from age to age, but he is actually worshipped in the form of a huge serpent. The word Ndengei is supposed by some to be a corruption of the first part of the name Tanga-roa, or great Tanga, the chief divinity of Polynesia; but whether this idea be well founded or not, great veneration is entertained for Ndengei, as they believe that to this deity the spirit goes immediately after death, either to be purified or to receive sentence. All spirits, however, are not permitted to reach the judgment-seat of Ndengei, for the road is obstructed by an enormous giant, wielding a large axe, with which he attacks all who pass him, and those who are wounded dare not present themselves to Ndengei, and are obliged to wander about in the mountains. "At Rewa," says Captain Wilkes of the American Exploring Expedition, "it is believed that the spirits first repair to the residence of Ndengei, who allots some of them to the devils for food, and sends the rest away to Mukalon, a small island off Rewa, where they remain until an appointed day, after which they are all doomed to annihilation. The judgments thus passed by Ndengei seem to be ascribed rather to his caprice than to any desert of the departed soul."

NEBO, a god of the ancient Babylonians, mentioned in Isa. xlv. 1. in connexion with Bel or Baal, with which deity Calmet supposes it to have been identical. This god was worshipped also by the Moabites. It presided over the planet Mercury. The estimation in which Nebo was held is evident from the circumstance, that it forms a part of the names of various princes, as Nebuchadnezzar, Nabonassar, Nabopolassar, and others.

NECESSARIANS, or NECESSITARIANS, a name applied to those who believe in the doctrine of necessity, whether natural or moral, philosophical or theological. This profound subject has engaged the attention, and exercised the ingenuity of many thoughtful men in every age. The question may be considered either in a wider sense, including all objects, whether material, mental, or moral; or it may be viewed in a more restricted sense, as applied to mere human agency. In either case it is necessary to bear in mind the important distinction which exists between natural and moral necessity. The former may be defined as that necessity which is of mere nature, without anything of choice; the latter as that necessity which is connected with the exercise of choice, and, therefore, arises from strictly moral causes. Matter being, in its very nature, inert, passive, and unconscious, the assertion of necessity, as applied to material objects alone, is tantamount to the assertion of the eternity of matter, and that too not only in its substance or essence, but in all its forms. If material things cannot but be what they are, then they must have been such from all eternity. Such is accordingly the doctrine of the Naturalists or Rationalists (which see). Such was the theory of the Epicureans and the Materialists of ancient times, and such is still the opinion of the Positivists in our own day.

The term Necessitarians, however, is generally used to denote those who maintain the doctrine of moral necessity as bearing upon human will and human agency. This, it is obvious, may be as absolute as natural necessity. "That is," to use the words of President Edwards, "the effect may be as perfectly connected with its moral cause, as a natural necessary effect is with its natural cause. Whether the will in every case is necessarily determined by the strongest motive, or whether the will ever makes any resistance to such a motive, or can ever oppose the strongest present inclination, or not. If that matter should be controverted, yet I suppose none will deny, but that, in some cases, a previous bias and inclination, or the motive presented, may be so powerful, that the act of the will may be certainly and indissolubly connected therewith. When motives or previous bias are very strong, all will allow that there is some difficulty in going against them. And if they were yet stronger, the difficulty would be still greater. And therefore, if more were still added to their strength, to a certain degree, it would make the difficulty so great, that it would be wholly impossible to surmount it; for this plain reason, because whatever power men may be supposed to have to surmount difficulties, yet that power is not infinite; and so goes not beyond certain limits. If a man can surmount ten degrees of difficulty of this kind with twenty degrees of strength, because the degrees of strength are beyond the degrees of difficulty: yet if the difficulty be increased to thirty, or an hundred, or a thousand degrees, and his strength not also increased, his strength will be wholly insufficient to surmount the difficulty. As, therefore, it must be allowed, that there may be such a thing as a sure and perfect connexion between moral causes and effects; so this only is what I call by the name of moral necessity."

Dr. Priestley, in perfect consistency with his materialistic views which resolved mind into a mere property of matter, was a keen supporter of the doctrine of necessity, not, however, of moral, but philosophical, or rather mechanical necessity. He held that in the same state of mind, and in the same view of things, man would make always the same choice, since motives act upon the mind as weights do upon the scale, by a mechanical necessity. Were this the true state of matters in regard to human agency, man would be nothing more than a mere passive machine, and responsibility for his actions would, of course, be excluded. But with the exception of writers of the materialist school, Necessitarians uniformly regard motives as governing the will not by a mechanical but a moral influence, the two modes of influence being essentially distinct from each other, and not as Priestley and others allege, capable of being blended into one.

Leibnitz, the eminent German philosopher of the 17th century, was a keen advocate for the doctrine of necessity, founding it on his system of Optimism. The perfection of the universe was with him a fundamental principle, and this perfection required the best order of combination, which was accomplished by the evolutions of each monad being adapted to the evolutions of all the others. To fulfil the Divine decrees in the attainment of the greatest possible perfection, Leibnitz considered the doctrine of necessity to be essential in a twofold aspect; mechanical necessity in the motions of material and inanimate objects, but moral and spiritual necessity in the voluntary determinations of intelligent beings. All events that happen, whether for good or evil, form part of the Divine plan predetermined from all eternity, and, therefore, necessarily must come to pass. Things could not possibly on this scheme be different from what they are. They are under the power of a mechanical necessity in the case of material things, and a moral necessity in the case of human beings, which bring them into harmony with the entire plan of the universe.

The most strenuous and powerful supporter of the doctrine of necessity, however, is President Edwards, in his very able treatise on the Freedom of the Will, in which he contends strongly for moral necessity, or, in other words, that the will is, in every case, necessarily determined by the strongest motives. He argues most conclusively against the Arminian notion of liberty, as implying a self-determining power in the will, and defines liberty or free-will to be the power which any one possesses of doing what he pleases. This freedom of the will Mr. Edwards shows with the most convincing clearness to be completely consistent with moral necessity; arguing the matter in various ways. Thus he proves that every effect has a necessary connexion with its cause, or with that which is the true ground and reason of its existence; that every act of will has a necessary connexion with the dictates of the understanding; that every act of will is excited by a motive, which is, therefore, the cause of the act of the will; and finally, that God's certain foreknowledge of the volitions of moral agents is utterly inconsistent with such a contingency of those volitions as excludes all necessity.

But it has often been maintained in opposition to the doctrine of necessity, that if the whole series of events, material, mental, and moral, be necessary, then human liberty is impossible. The reply which Dr. Dick gives to this objection, in his 'Lectures on Theology,' though brief, is conclusive: "Those actions," says he, "are free which are the effect of volition. In whatever manner the state of mind which gave rise to the volition has been produced, the liberty of the agent is neither greater nor less. It is his will alone which is to be considered, and not the means by which it has been determined. If God fore-ordained certain actions, and placed men in such circumstances that the actions would certainly take place agreeably to the laws of the mind, men are nevertheless moral agents, because they act voluntarily, and are responsible for the actions which consent has made their own. Liberty does not consist in the power of acting or not acting, but in acting from choice. The choice is determined by something in the mind itself, or by something external influencing the mind; but, whatever is the cause, the choice makes the action free, and the agent accountable." Thus the freedom of the will may be reconciled with absolute decrees involving irresistible necessity. And if the will be free, moral responsibility becomes quite possible.

Lord Kames, in his Essays on the Principles of Morality, declares himself a Necessitarian, but on grounds altogether different from those on which President Edwards rests his scheme. There is nothing in the whole universe, his Lordship argues, which can properly be called contingent; but every motion in the material, and every determination and action in the moral world, are directed by immutable laws, so that while those laws remain in force, not the smallest link in the chain of causes and effects can be broken, nor any one thing be otherwise than it is. In this condition man, though goaded on by stern necessity which by no effort on his part he can possibly overcome, is provided, according to the hypothesis of Lord Kames, with a delusive sense of liberty which fits him for discharging his duties in this world with greater efficiency than if he had the full consciousness of being the victim of an insuperable necessity which exempted him alike from either praise or blame, reward or punishment. In vindication of this deception alleged to be practised on man by his Creator, his lordship refers to various illusions to which the senses of man are liable. His eyes, for example are neither microscopic on the one hand, nor telescopic on the other, but limited in power of vision to a certain narrow range. The objects, accordingly, on which he looks assume a very different aspect from that in which they appear to creatures whose eyes are differently constructed.

Such an argument, however, as applied to the freedom of the will, is altogether irrelevant and without force. It is unnecessary even to suppose such a deception, seeing no such necessity exists as is inconsistent with perfect freedom of will. Both necessity and freedom exist, and both exist in harmony. But the bond which connects the two together is hid from human vision, and belongs to the region of humble faith.

NECOUSIA, offerings among the ancient Greeks and Romans on the anniversary of the day of the death of a relative. According to some, the Necousia were the same with the GENESIA (which see).

NECRODEIPNON (Gr. neeros, dead, and deipnon, a supper), a feast among the ancient heathens, commonly held after a funeral. It took place at the house of the nearest relative of the deceased, and was usually attended by the whole friends and relations, it being regarded as a sacred duty to be present on the mournful occasion.

NECROMANCER (Gr. neeros, and manteia, divination), one who consults the dead, imagining them to have the power of revealing secrets and foretelling future events. From a very remote antiquity such persons existed. Thus we find them mentioned in Deut. xviii. 11, and an instance is set before us in the witch of Endor, who pretended to possess the power of summoning the dead to return to earth. Maimonides describes a necromancer as one who, having afflicted himself with fasting, goes to the burying-place and there lies down and falls asleep, and then the dead appear to him and give him the information he requires. In the early Christian church the severest ecclesiastical censures were inflicted upon all who practised necromancy or similar arts of divination.

NECROMANCY, the art of evoking the dead, and questioning them as to the secrets of the future. In ancient Greece, Orpheus was believed to have been the inventor of this magical art. Thessaly was regarded as the chief residence of all who excelled in divination. Ulysses in the Odyssey of Homer evokes the manes of the dead. One of the most famous of the oracles of antiquity was that of Trophonius, in which the dead were believed to answer from the bowels of the earth. The Scandinavians ascribed the origin of necromancy to Odin. In several heathen nations, but particularly among the negro tribes in Western Africa, the art of consulting the spirits of the dead is constantly practised. Native priests pretend to hold converse with them, and act as a medium of intercourse between the living and the dead. In the United States of North America, even in this enlightened age, a class of people has arisen, usually called Spiritualists, who pretend by table-turning, spirit-rapping, and different kinds of incantation, to put themselves in relation with the tenants of the world of spirits, and to converse with them freely on all subjects which concern the past, the present, or the future.

NECROTHAPTÆ (Gr. necros, dead, and thapto, to bury), a name given by the ancient Greeks to undertakers at funerals. Among the Romans they were called Libitinarii, from the goddess LIBITINA (which see).

NECTAR, the drink of the immortal gods, according to the early Greek poets, which was served round to them by the hands of Hebe or Ganymede. It is confounded by some of the ancient writers with ambrosia, the food of the gods.

NEDUSIA, a surname of Athena, derived from the river Nedon, on the banks of which she was worshipped.

NEFASTI DIES, unlawful days among the ancient Romans. Neither courts of justice nor assemblies of the people could be held on these days; and afterwards they were dedicated chiefly to the worship of the gods. Numa Pompilius is said to have been the originator of the dies nefasti.

NEGES. See CANUSIS.

NEGOMBO, a priest and prophet among the inhabitants of Congo in West Africa. He pretends to foretell future events, and to heal all kinds of disease.

NEGORES, a religious sect in Japan, which derives its origin from Cambodoxi, a disciple of Xaca. This sect consists of three classes. The first, which is less numerous than the others, devote themselves to the worship of the gods, and the performance of religious ceremonies; the second employ themselves in military affairs, and the third in the preparation of weapons of war. The Negores, as a body, are so numerous and influential, that the Emperor finds it necessary to secure their favour. They are scrupulously careful about the life of inferior animals, but their quarrels with one another often end in bloodshed.

NEGOSCI, the title of a priest among the natives of Congo. He must have eleven wives, and as is usual among African tribes, he acts the part of a magician. When any native meditates revenge upon an enemy, he applies to a Negosci, who cuts off some locks of his hair, and binding them together throws them into the fire, uttering all the while various imprecations upon the enemy and all that belongs to him.

NEHALENNIA, a Pagan goddess, the origin of whose name it is difficult to trace. An image of this female deity was first discovered in 1616 in Zealand, among some ruins which had long been covered by the sea. Montfaucon in his Antiquities gives seven pictures of the goddess. She is represented carrying a basket of fruit, and with a dog at her side.

NEHUSHTAN, a name given by Hezekiah to the brazen serpent which Moses had set up in the wilderness, and which had ever since that time been carefully preserved by the Israelites. The good king finding that his people had actually converted the serpent into an idol, and were burning incense before it, resolved to put an end to this form of idolatry. We are told accordingly in 2 Kings xviii. 4, "He removed the high places, and brake the images, and cut down the groves, and brake in pieces the brazen serpent that Moses had made: for unto those days the children of Israel did burn incense to it: and he called it Nehushtan." It is difficult to ascertain when this brazen serpent began to be worshipped. Rabbi Kimchi supposes that the people had burnt incense to it from the time when the kings of Israel corrupted themselves; and that this species of idolatry escaped the notice of Asa and Jehoshaphat when they reformed the church. For a long period, in all probability, the serpent of brass had been piously preserved like the pot of manna, or Aaron's rod, as a memorial of God's miraculous goodness to his people. In process of time, however, the serpent was worshipped as a god. Hezekiah in his indignation called it Nehushtan, which Bishop Patrick interprets to mean "foul-fiend, the old Dragon or Satan," and he broke it in pieces; that is, as the Talmudists explain it, he ground it to powder, and scattered it in the air, that no relic of it might remain to be worshipped by a superstitious people. See SERPENT-WORSHIP.

NEITH, the goddess of wisdom among the ancient Egyptians, identified with Athena of the Greeks. She was chiefly worshipped in the Delta, where a city was built bearing her name.

NEMEAN GAMES, one of the four great festivals of ancient Greece, deriving its name from Nemea, where it was celebrated, as Pindar tells us in honour of Zeus. The games consisted of horse-racing, chariot-racing, running, wrestling, boxing, throwing the spear, shooting with the bow, and other warlike exercises. The victors were crowned with a chaplet of olive, and afterwards of green parsley. The Nemean games were regularly celebrated twice in the course of every Olympiad. They appear to have been discontinued soon after the reign of the Roman Emperor Hadrian. See GAMES.

NEMEUS, a surname of Zeus, under which he was worshipped at Nemea, where games were celebrated in his honour. See preceding article.

NEMESIACI, the officers of the goddess Nemesis, who presided over good fortune, and was the dispenser of fate. See next article.

NEMESIS, the goddess among the ancient Greeks who was believed to regulate human affairs, dispensing at pleasure happiness or unhappiness, the goods or the ills of life. She was looked upon also as an avenging deity, who punished the proud. There is a tradition that Zeus begot by Nemesis an egg, which Leda found, and from which Helena and the Dioscuri sprung. Rougemont, in his 'Le Peuple Primitif,' regards Nemesis as a goddess, symbolizing the separation of the elements in the act of creation. She was represented at Smyrna with wings, and Hesiod calls her the daughter of Night, or of the darkness which enveloped the waters of chaos.

NEOCORI, officers attached to the Pagan temples in ancient Greece, whose office it was to sweep the temple, and perform other menial offices connected with it. In course of time these duties were intrusted to slaves, and the Neocori came to occupy a higher position, superintending the temples, guarding the treasures, and regulating the sacred rites. In some towns there was a regular college of Neocori; and the office having considerable honour attached to it, was sought by persons even of high rank. In the time of the Emperors, nations and cities eagerly sought the title Neocori, and counted it a special privilege to have the charge of a temple. Thus in the Acts of the Apostles, we learn, that the city of Ephesus was Neocora of the great goddess Diana.

NEOMENIA. See NEW MOON.

NEONOMIANS (Gr. neos, new, and nomos, law), a word used to describe those who believe the gospel to be a new law, which no longer exacts a perfect, uniform, universal obedience, but accepts of faith and a sincere though imperfect obedience, as the passport to eternal life. This doctrine has been a favourite hypothesis with Arminian writers from the time of the Synod of Dort in 1618, when it was fully canvassed and explicitly condemned. Towards the end of the seventeenth century, a controversy arose among the English Dissenters on this subject, the BAXTERIANS (which see), being branded as Neonomians. It must be borne in mind, however, that Mr. Baxter, followed by Dr. Daniel Williams, was called upon to contend against the Crispites, who were avowed Antinomians, and it is not wonderful that in his anxiety to uphold the claims of the law of God as eternally binding upon all his creatures, this ardent controversialist should have expressed himself in language which laid him open to the charge of taking a legal view of the gospel. The HOPKINSIANS (which see) in America have also exposed their teaching to the same objection. Not only do they fearlessly set forth the extent, spirituality, and unflinching demands of the law; they think it necessary also to urge upon sinners the legal dispensation, if we may so speak, of the gospel. Now that such a view of the gospel is in one sense consistent with truth, we readily admit. The law, no doubt, extends its wide and all-comprehensive requirements over the whole range of human duty, and it denounces with unmitigated and unmitigable severity its awful threatenings against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men. Viewing man, therefore, as simply under the law, without any reference, in the mean time, to his having either kept or broken the law, it is the bounden duty of every human being instantly to "repent and believe the gospel." In this sense "God commandeth all men everywhere to repent." They are subject to that immutable and everlasting law which binds in holy and harmonious subjection the whole intelligent creation to its God; and it is at his peril if any one shall neglect to perform, in all its purity, and in all its perfection, this or any other branch of moral duty. The commands to believe, to repent, and to obey, are equally obligatory upon every man as a subject of God's moral government. The law of God was originally formed with the express design of being applicable to man, not in one situation merely, but in all the possible circumstances in which he might be placed. And hence it is, that in this abstract view of the subject, man being considered as simply under the law, the divine statutes extend their claims of obedience even to the faith and repentance of the gospel. So that there is in fact a legal dispensation of the gospel; for if Christ hath been therein set forth, and even if in the Mosaic law he was, however obscurely, exhibited as the sole ground of justification, we are bound by the commands of that moral or natural law, which is immutable and eternal in its obligations, to accept of the blessings held out to us in the gospel. And indeed it is expressly declared in Sacred Scripture, that "he who believeth shall be saved; and he that believeth not is condemned already." He is condemned by the terms of that very law to which, in rejecting the gospel, he professes to adhere; he is condemned, because, instead of yielding obedience to the express injunction of the law, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart," he dares to disbelieve "the record which God hath given of his Son."

We may remark, however, still further, in illustration of the evangelical law, that it is binding upon the saint equally with the sinner. If the moral law, which it must be observed has not been and never can be abrogated, takes cognizance of every man's acceptance or non-acceptance of the gospel, it is evident that the same law must take cognizance also of the Christian's actings, whether of faith, repentance, or true obedience, posterior as well as anterior to the period of his reception of "the truth as it is in Jesus." It demands with equal firmness that he shall exercise faith and repentance, and that he shall exercise them sincerely, habitually, and without imperfection. And accordingly every believer knows that if his salvation depended upon his performance of these or any other duties in a legal sense, he must be certainly and irremediably lost. And yet it is indubitably true that the same law which declares "Thou shalt not steal," commands us, under still severer penalties, to "repent and believe the gospel;" to "live by the faith of the Son of God," and to "adorn the doctrine of our Saviour by a conversation becoming the gospel."

All this we readily admit is abstractly true, in reference to man viewed simply as a moral agent, placed "under the law;" but this is scarcely the attitude which the gospel assumes in addressing man as a fallen being, a breaker of the law. It regards him as ruined, and, in so far as the law is concerned, irretrievably ruined. And as the most melancholy proof of his undone condition is his utter insensibility to his true character in the sight of God, the first step towards his recovery must obviously be to arouse him from this state of moral torpor and death. The mode of accomplishing this in an humble dependence upon the blessing of the Spirit, we allege to be, in the first instance, a faithful and energetic proclamation of the original law, in all its spirituality of extent and inflexibility of demand; and chiefly with the view of convincing the careless sinner that by the law of God he is a guilty, condemned, helpless criminal; that in his present condition, wherever he goes, and in whatever circumstances he is placed, he is under the curse, and every moment liable to undergo the wrath, of the Almighty. And accordingly in thus making a legitimate, a sanctioned use of the law, we have reason to expect that the sinner will be compelled anxiously and eagerly to exclaim "what shall I do to be saved?"

But the species of Neonomianism to which we have now been adverting, is very different from that which is held by many Arminian divines, both in Britain and on the Continent. According to their view of the matter, the new law of the gospel is substituted for the old law of the ancient economy, which is abrogated and annulled. Christ by his vicarious sufferings hath purchased, they allege, the relaxation of God's law, and the consequent acceptance of an imperfect, if only sincere obedience. But inflexible justice, which is a necessary part of moral perfection, forbids any such demonstration of leniency on the part of Jehovah. Justice unflinchingly demands a fulfilment of all the obligations under which as creatures we have come, and even were it possible for the mercy of God to incline towards a depression of the standard of morality, holiness and righteousness and truth must alike oppose it. If the law of God be relaxed, where is the security of the Divine government, where the immutableness of the Divine character? But it were altogether inconsistent with the purity of the Almighty to connive at imperfection in any of his creatures. Neither can faith under the gospel be accepted as equivalent to perfect obedience under the law. And in proof of this, we remark, that faith is either perfect, or it is imperfect. Now it cannot be perfect, seeing it is the act of a sinful creature; and if it be imperfect, God can neither regard it as perfect, nor ground any act of judicial acquittal on the performance of an act which is admitted to be imperfect. Hence the necessity of the righteousness of Christ, since by the deeds of no law, whether new or old, can a man be justified before God, but we are justified freely by God's grace, through the imputed righteousness of the Lord Jesus.

NEOPHYTES (Gr. neos, new, and phumai, to be born), new-born or regenerated, a term sometimes applied in ancient times to those who were newly baptized, or to new converts to Christianity. It has also been often used to denote those who had recently joined a religious order.

NEPAUL (RELIGION OF). See BUDDHISTS.

NEPENTHE, a magic potion mentioned both by Greek and Roman poets, which was supposed to make persons forget their sorrows and misfortunes. It was the juice or infusion of a plant now unknown. Homer says that it grew in Egypt.

NEPHALIA (Gr. nephalios, sober), festivals and sacrifices of the ancient Greeks, but more especially of the Athenians, which received their name from the circumstance that no wine was offered, but only milk, mead, and other simple liquors. The vine, the figtree, and the mulberry were prohibited from being used in the Nephalia, because they were looked upon as symbols of drunkenness.

NEPHILIM, demons of gigantic stature in the mythology of ancient Egypt, which attended on Typhon, the god of evil. The Nephilim or giants mentioned in Gen. vi. 4, and Num. xiii. 33, have been sometimes regarded as men noted for deeds of violence and oppression, rather than remarkable for height of stature.

NEPHTHYS, the sister and the wife of Typhon, the evil god of the ancient Egyptians. To Osiris she bore Anubis, who is represented with the head of a dog. Nephthys belongs to the third order of the deities, as classified by Sir J. G. Wilkinson in his Materia Hieroglyphica.

NEPINDI, a priest among the natives of Congo in Western Africa, who styles himself the master of the elements, and pretends to control the thunder, lightning, storms, and tempests. To display his power in this respect he raises large heaps of earth, out of which, after he has performed various sacrifices and magical incantations, creeps a little animal, which raises itself slowly, and at length takes its flight towards heaven. Then thick clouds darken the skies, and thunder, lightning, and rain immediately come on.

NEPTUNALIA, a festival anciently celebrated at Rome in honour of NEPTUNE (which see), on the 23d of July. Little information can be got as to the manner in which this festival was kept, but it would appear that huts were wont to be erected with the branches and foliage of trees, where the people probably feasted and amused themselves in various ways.

NEPTUNE, the chief god of the sea among the ancient Romans. A temple was erected to this deity in the Campus Martius, and before a naval expedition was undertaken, it was customary for the commander of the fleet to offer a sacrifice to Neptune, which he threw into the sea. The Neptune of the Romans is identical with the Poseidon of the Greeks.

NEQUITI, a secret association among the natives of Congo, who celebrate their mysteries in dark and sequestered places, where none but the initiated are allowed to enter.

NEREIDS, nymphs of the sea among the ancient Greeks. They were fifty in number, and daughters of Nereus, the old man of the sea. They are generally represented as having been very beautiful, and particularly favourable to sailors. They were worshipped in several parts of Greece, but more especially in seaport towns.

NEREUS, a marine god among the ancient Greeks, who was believed to dwell at the bottom of the sea with his lovely daughters, the Nereids. He ruled principally over the Ægean sea, and was believed occasionally to appear to men in different shapes, predicting what should befall them in future. Nereus yielded his place, and gave his daughter Amphitrite to Poseidon.

NERGAL, an idol of the Cuthæans, mentioned in 2 Kings xvii. 30. The Rabbis allege that this deity was in the form of a cock; but this has been supposed to be a calumny, arising from their hatred against the Samaritans, who were descended from the Cuthæans sent by Shalmaneser to occupy the place of those belonging to the kingdom of Israel who had been carried into Assyria.

NERIO, the spouse of Mars, who was the god of war among the ancient Romans. Little or nothing is known concerning her.

NESSA, an intercalary month introduced by the ancient Arabians, to bring the lunar, every third year, into conformity with the solar year. The use of this month was forbidden by Mohammed in the Koran.

NESSUS, the god of a river in Thrace, which bore the same name.

NESTORIANS, a sect which arose in the fifth century, deriving its name from Nestorius, a Syrian monk, remarkable for the austerity of his habits, and his eloquence as a preacher. According to the historian Socrates, who has written his life, he was born at Germanicia in the northern parts of Syria. After an education somewhat imperfect, he was ordained presbyter at Antioch, where, by the popularity of his pulpit gifts, he attracted large and attentive audiences. He became quite a favourite with the people, and great was the satisfaction felt throughout the Christian community in the East, when, in A. D. 428, he was consecrated patriarch of Constantinople. No sooner was he promoted to this elevated and responsible position than he began to display an intemperate zeal, which partook more of the bigotry of the monk than the gentle tolerant spirit which was becoming his character and position as a minister of Christ. His first efforts were directed towards the extirpation of heretics, including Arians and Noratians, Quartodecimans and Macedonians, who, at that time, abounded in the capital of the East and its subordinate dioceses. Accordingly, in his inaugural discourse, addressing the Emperor Theodosius the Younger, he gave utterance to these violent expressions: "Give me a country purged of all heretics, and in exchange for it, I will give you heaven. Help me to subdue the heretics, and I will help you to conquer the Persians." Nor did his fury against heretics find vent only in words; he proceeded to deeds of persecution, which, by exciting tumults among the people, led to the effusion of blood.

While thus busily engaged in persecuting others, Nestorius raised up, even among the orthodox party in the church, a numerous host of enemies, who were not long in accusing him also of heresy. Having been trained in the strict Antiochian doctrine as to the clear distinction between the divine and human natures of Christ, he and his friend Anastasius, whom he had brought with him from Antioch, could not fail to disapprove of some expressions then current in the church, which evidently proceeded upon confused notions in respect to the two natures of Christ. One expression, in particular, the title Theotokos, or Mother of God, applied to the Virgin Mary, more especially taken in connexion with the excessive veneration of the Virgin, which had begun to prevail, called forth the strongest reprobation on the part of Nestorius. Along with Anastasius, he took occasion, in his public discourses, to state, in the most emphatic manner, his objections to the term Theotokos, and dwelt much upon the doctrine of the union of the two natures of Christ, as laid down by Theodore of Mopsuestia. A controversy now ensued, in which the enemies of Nestorius, not comprehending the danger which he saw to be involved in the use of the word Theotokos, charged him most unjustly with holding the Photinian and Samosatenian views, which asserted that Jesus was born of Mary as a mere man; or, in other words, they accused him of denying the Divinity of Christ. The question was now keenly agitated, both among the clergy and laity, whether Mary was entitled to be called the Mother of God. In this dispute Nestorius took an active part, adhering firmly to the doctrine of the school of Antioch. He was opposed in public even by some of his own clergy, and, accordingly, enraged at the contempt shown to his authority as patriarch, he hesitated not to issue orders that the most refractory should be seized, and forthwith beaten and imprisoned. One of these, Proclus by name, who had at a former period applied in vain for the patriarchate of Constantinople, rendered himself peculiarly conspicuous by the bitter hostility which he evinced to the opinions of Nestorius. This man having, on one occasion, been called to preach in the presence of his patriarch, took occasion, in the course of his sermon, to extol the Virgin Mary as the Mother of God, and charged all who refused to acknowledge her as such, with being believers in a deified man. The sermon was received with loud applause, and Nestorius found it necessary to defend his own doctrine against the misrepresentations of the preacher.

Veneration for Mary had at this time begun to prevail extensively in the church, and in these circumstances, as might have been expected, the tide of public opinion ran strongly against Nestorius, who, to disarm hostility without compromising principle, employed the term as applied to Mary, Mother of Christ, inasmuch as the name Christ belonged to the whole person, uniting the divine and human natures. The adoption of this middle course, however, failed to conciliate the enthusiastic admirers of the Virgin, who were fast rushing towards open and avowed Mariolatry. At Constantinople matters were now assuming a very critical aspect, and a schism of the church seemed to be not far distant. A considerable party, indeed, both of the clergy and monks, refused to recognize Nestorius as their ecclesiastical superior, and even renounced all church fellowship with him. The patriarch, accordingly, convened a synod at Constantinople, which deposed some of the most violent of the clergy as favourers of Manichean doctrines, by denying the reality of Christ's humanity.

In a short time the Nestorian controversy, which had raged so violently in the church and patriarchate of Constantinople, extended far beyond these narrow limits. Cyril, bishop of Alexandria, who had previously exhibited a violent persecuting spirit against Pagans, Jews, and heretics, took an active share in the dispute, contending at first gently, but latterly with the utmost vehemence, against the opinions which Nestorius held, representing them as at variance with the very essence of Christianity. To aid him in assailing the patriarch the more effectually, he prevailed upon Pope Celestine I. to join him in the attack. Soon after the commencement of the controversy at Constantinople, Cyril published two letters addressed to the Egyptian monks, in which he assailed the opinions of Nestorius, without, however, alluding to, or once mentioning his name. The appearance of these writings excited no slight sensation in the East, and gave great offence to Nestorius, against whom they were so plainly levelled. An epistolary altercation now took place between the two patriarchs, which continued for some time with considerable bitterness on both sides. At length, to rouse the Pope against Nestorius, Cyril caused the sermons of that patriarch to be translated and sent to Rome, and at the same time urged his holiness to take summary measures for the vindication of pure doctrine. Celestine, accordingly, summoned a synod to meet at Rome, and with their sanction decided that the clergy excommunicated by Nestorius should be restored to the fellowship of the church; and further, that if within ten days after receiving the sentence pronounced at Rome, Nestorius should not give a written recantation of his errors, he should be forthwith deposed from his office as patriarch, and expelled from the communion of the church. Cyril, glad of the opportunity of humbling his rival, took upon him to execute the sentence of the Roman synod. Summoning, accordingly, a synod of Egyptian bishops at Alexandria, he despatched a letter, A. D. 430, in the name of that synod, to Nestorius, in which, conformably to the sentence pronounced at Rome, he called upon him to recant, and concluded with twelve anathemas against his presumed errors, thus formally setting forward the Egyptian creed in opposition to the Antiochian system, as expressed by Theodore of Mopsuestia.

The controversy now completely altered its aspect, being converted from a personal into a doctrinal dispute. By orders of John, patriarch of Antioch, a refutation of the Egyptian anathemas was published by Theodoret, bishop of Cyrus, a town on the Euphrates; and this refutation, which was written with great severity, called forth an equally violent reply from the pen of Cyril. Nestorius on his part treated the deputies sent from Celestine and Cyril with the utmost contempt, and answered the anathemas of Cyril by sending twelve other anathemas. It was now thought to be absolutely necessary to summon a general council, and, therefore, the Emperor Theodosius II. issued a proclamation to all the metropolitans of his empire to meet in council at Ephesus, about Pentecost in the following year. Cyril and Nestorius arrived at Ephesus at the appointed time, the former authorized temporarily to represent Pope Celestine, and accompanied by a great number of Egyptian bishops ready to act as his devoted tools. The bishop of the city in which the council was assembled, was the friend of Cyril, and such was the extent of influence arrayed against Nestorius, that he found it necessary to solicit from the imperial commissioner, a guard, who surrounded the house in which he resided. A number of the Syrian bishops were prevented from reaching Ephesus in time for the opening of the council, and having waited sixteen days beyond the day appointed by the emperor, Cyril insisted on commencing proceedings, and accordingly, on the 22d June 431, he opened the synod with 200 bishops. Nestorius refused to attend until all the bishops should be assembled, and having been formally invited three several times to appear and answer to the various charges, oral and written, laid against him, his refusal to obey the summons of the synod was construed as an admission, on his own part, of his guilt, and the synod, after many tears as they declared, constrained by the laws of the church, and by the letter of the Roman bishop, Celestine, pronounced sentence in the following terms: "Our Lord Jesus Christ, by Nestorius blasphemed, has ordained by this most holy synod, that the Nestorius above-named should be excluded from the episcopal dignity, and from the whole college of priests." This sentence was no sooner passed, than by orders of Cyril it was publicly proclaimed by heralds through the whole city. It was also formally announced to the emperor.

Meanwhile, John, bishop of Antioch, with about thirty Syrian bishops, arrived at Ephesus a few days after the council headed by Cyril had met and deposed Nestorius, and on learning what had been done, they declared the proceedings of that council null and void, and proceeded to form a new council, which considered itself to be the only regular one. This council in turn deposed Cyril and Memnon bishop of Ephesus, and excommunicated the other members who had taken part in the proceedings of the Cyrillian council, until they should manifest penitence, and condemn the anathemas of Cyril. The sentence against the two bishops was made known through the city, and formally reported to the emperor. In the midst of this conflict of councils, the deputies of the Roman bishop appeared at Ephesus, and according to their instructions gave their formal sanction to all the proceedings of Cyril and his council. The emperor, however, on hearing the report of his commissioner, lost no time in despatching a letter to Ephesus, by the hands of an imperial officer, conveying his royal pleasure, that the disputed question should be carefully considered, not by any party in the assembly, but by the whole council in common, and until this was done, no one of the bishops could be permitted to return home to his diocese, or to visit the court. Cyril and his party seeing the evident leaning of the emperor in favour of Nestorius, resorted to various expedients for the purpose of attracting the influence of the court towards themselves, and at length they succeeded in prevailing upon the feeble and vacillating emperor to confirm the deposition of Nestorius, although he had agreed to withdraw his objection to the word Theotokos, Mother of God. Thus forsaken by the court, which had so long protected him against his numerous and powerful enemies, Nestorius saw himself deserted also by many of the bishops of his party, and though John of Antioch, and a number of the Eastern bishops, stood firm for a time, John and Cyril were ultimately brought to an agreement, and both retained their sees.

The compromise of principle with which John of Antioch was thus chargeable, roused against him a large party in his own diocese, and many of the Syrian bishops withdrew from all fellowship with him. A schism followed in various parts of the Eastern church. The successor of Nestorius in the patriarchate of Constantinople died in A. D. 433; a large party in the city demanded the restoration of Nestorius, threatening, if their wish was refused, to set fire to the patriarchal church, but so strong was the influence exercised by the opponents of the deposed patriarch, that the vacant dignity was conferred upon his early adversary, Proclus. Nestorius was confined in a cloister in the suburbs of Antioch, where he had resided before his election to the patriarchate. Here he continued for four years to enjoy undisturbed repose free from the persecution to which he had so long been subjected. But by the influence of his enemies an imperial edict was procured A. D. 435, condemning him to perpetual banishment in the Greater Oasis in Upper Egypt. In this remote place of exile he wrote several theological works. After a time, however, the district in which he dwelt was laid waste by hordes of Libyan barbarians, known by the name of the Blemmyes, and he himself was carried off; but in a short time he was released and returned to the Thebaid, where, amid the sufferings of his exile, he wrote a history of his controversy, in which he sought to vindicate himself against the reproaches of both friends and foes. Various accounts are given of the circumstances which led to his death, but in one thing all are agreed, that his last years were embittered by many acts of harsh and cruel persecution. The precise time of his death has not been ascertained, but he seems to have died somewhere about A. D. 450.

The death of Nestorius had no effect in suppressing the Nestorian controversy. Other teachers arose who taught the same doctrines, and the sect continued to extend after its separation from the dominant church. It was patronised and encouraged by some of the Persian kings, and the Mohammedan conquests in the seventh century gave an additional impulse to its wider propagation. Under the designation of Chaldean Christians which they assumed, they still exist, particularly in the mountains of Kurdistan and the valley of Oroomiah intermediate between Persia and Turkey. The numbers of the sect are estimated by the American missionaries at about 140,000 souls. They dislike the name of Nestorians, alleging their doctrines to have been far more ancient, having been derived from the teaching of the Apostle James, and that they were first called Nestorians by an enemy, Dioscorus of Alexandria. The people usually call themselves Syrians, and occasionally Nazarenes. The great body of the Nestorian Christians fled in consequence of the persecution to which they were subjected under the Emperor Justinian, and took refuge in the dominions of the king of Persia, where at one time they exerted a great influence. Once and again, however, a time of persecution came, more especially after the Mohammedan conquests, which compelled them to quit their original residence, and take shelter in the mountains of Kurdistan.

According to the general admission of travellers in the East, the religious belief and practices of the Nestorian Christians are more simple and spiritual than those of the other Oriental churches. They reject image worship, auricular confession, the doctrine of purgatory, and many other corrupt doctrines of the Roman and Greek churches. They cherish the highest reverence for the Holy Scriptures, and exalt them far above all tradition. Mr. Perkins, the father of the American mission in their country, goes so far in his admiration of this ancient body of Christians, that he says, "they may with great propriety be denominated the Protestants of Asia."

The ecclesiastical government of the Nestorians is thoroughly episcopal in its constitution. It is thus described by Dr. Wilson in his 'Lands of the Bible': "The Nestorians have nine ecclesiastical orders among their clergy; but two or three of them are at present little more than nominal. They are those of sub-deacon, reader, deacon, priest, archdeacon, bishop, metropolitan, catholicos, and patriarch. All below a bishop are permitted at any time to marry, according to their pleasure. The word Bishop does not occur in the Syriac Testament, Kashisha, elder, being employed where it is used in the English translation; but Episcopa, transferred from the Greek, is the ecclesiastical title in common use. The wish of the people is generally understood and consulted in the appointment of a bishop; but his consecration depends on the patriarch. A candidate for the office, according to a strange custom, must abstain from the use of animal food, except fish, eggs, and the productions of the dairy; and his mother must observe the same abstinence while she nurses him at the breast. The patriarch officially has only spiritual power, but, in point of fact, he exercises a great deal of secular influence among his people." The higher orders of the clergy are bound by the Canons of the church to adhere to celibacy, but the lower orders are allowed to marry. Monasteries and convents are unknown among the Nestorians. They have no relics, such as are common in the Church of Rome, yet they believe the remains of the martyrs and saints to be endowed with supernatural virtues, and they invoke the Virgin Mary and the saints, asking for their prayers to Christ. They have no pictures, nor images in their churches, and the only symbol used among them is a plain Greek cross, which they venerate very highly. The sign of the cross is used in baptism and in prayer; a cross is engraved over the low entrances of their churches, and kissed by those who enter. The priests also carry with them a small silver cross, which is often kissed by the people.

Since the year 1834, an interesting and most efficient mission has been established among the Nestorians by the American Board of Foreign Missions. The remarkable wisdom and prudence which have characterized the proceedings of the mission since its commencement, entitle it to the highest commendation. The following remarks of the Rev. J. Perkins exhibit the missionaries in a very favourable light: "From the commencement of the mission there has been reason to hope that pure religion might be revived in the small Nestorian community without seriously disturbing the existing ecclesiastical constitution. The missionaries have not sought to form a new Christian community, but to bring individuals, both among the ecclesiastics and the common people, to a full and saving knowledge of the truth, hoping that such a change might be brought about by the grace of God as should cause the forsaking of false doctrines, so far as such were held, the laying aside of whatever was superstitious or unscriptural, and the establishing of a pure church upon existing foundations. It seemed at least best to make the experiment, and to leave the question as to the necessity or propriety of forming new churches to be decided by time and providential circumstances. There has been the more reason, and the more encouragement, for pursuing such a course, from the fact that many of the leading ecclesiastics, so far from setting themselves in opposition to the missionaries and to their instructions, as has been done so generally among the Armenians and the Greeks, have been decidedly friendly, and in not a few instances have earnestly co-operated in every effort to elevate and evangelize the people. The four bishops on the plain, Mar Yohannan, Mar Elias, Mar Joseph, and Mar Gabriel, exhibited friendliness, and a disposition to favour the objects of the mission from the first, and the missionaries early made it an object of special attention to instruct and benefit these and other ecclesiastics. The four bishops named were placed in the relation of boarding pupils to the mission, and for several years the three first received daily instruction in a theological or Bible class, forming, with some priests and other promising young men, the first class in the seminary. They were also soon employed as native helpers to the mission, and as early as 1841 Mr. Perkins speaks of some of the ecclesiastics as 'enlightened, and we trust really pious.' 'They not only allow us to preach in their churches, but urge us to do so: and are forward themselves in every good word and work. It is an important fact that through the schools which have been established, almost the entire education of ecclesiastics is now in the hands of the missionaries.'"

The remarkable success which has attended the labours of the American missionaries among this interesting people is deeply gratifying. Schools have been established, Bibles and tracts, both in ancient and modern Syriac, have been extensively circulated, the gospel has been faithfully preached, and the result has been of the most favourable description. The missionaries, however, have met with obstacles as well as with encouragements. Jesuits and other emissaries of the Romish church have laboured long, but with little success, to persuade the Nestorians to submit to the authority of the Pope. Finding that their own exertions, both among the Nestorians and Armenians, were almost fruitless, they strove earnestly to procure the banishment of the American missionaries from the Persian dominions. Their efforts in this direction happily failed, and in 1851 an edict of toleration was promulgated by the Persian government, granting equal protection to all Christian subjects, and permitting them to change their religion or denomination at their pleasure.

The mountain Nestorians have not received from the Turkish government that protection to which they are entitled: and hence they have been exposed to frequent assaults from the predatory Kurdish tribes. A violent storm burst upon them from this quarter in 1843, which proved most disastrous in its results. Thousands of the Nestorians, men, women, and children, were massacred, often with horrible tortures; others were dragged off to a terrible captivity, and others fled. Their villages were utterly destroyed, and what remained of the people in Central Kurdistan were entirely subdued and reduced to a state of deeper poverty and wretchedness than they had known before.

A few years ago, Dr. Grant, an American missionary, who resided among the Nestorians for a considerable time, and had studied their manners and customs with the greatest minuteness and care, published a treatise with the view of proving that this interesting class of people are the descendants of the lost ten tribes of Israel. The argument is conducted with great ingenuity and skill, but its conclusiveness may well be doubted. His theory rests on the Jewish physiognomy of the Nestorians, the prevalence among them of Old Testament names, the peculiarities of their customs, which in several instances partake more of a Jewish than a Christian character. Of these last, he adduces in particular a commemoration for the dead, which is observed once a-year, in the month of October. Offerings of lambs and bread are prepared by each family some days before the time at which the festival is observed; and when prepared they are carried into the churchyard. The Lord's Supper is first dispensed, after which the officiating priest cuts several locks of wool from the fleeces of the lambs, and throws them into a censer, which he hands to a deacon, by whom it is waved backwards and forwards in the presence of the people. While this ceremony is going forward, the priest recites an anthem, and offers prayers for the living and the dead. At the close of the service the lambs and bread are distributed among the people. Another ceremony, which Dr. Grant supposes to be of Jewish origin, is a sacrifice of thank-offering which the Nestorians occasionally observe. Having slain a lamb at the door of the church, they sprinkle the blood upon the lintels, and, as in the case of burnt-offerings under the Law of Moses, the right shoulder and breast, along with the skin, are assigned to the priest. It ought to be noticed that such ceremonies may not have been derived immediately from the Jews, being found also occasionally practised by the Mohammedans of Turkey.

It is remarkable at what an early period the Nestorians rose into influence in the East, and diffused their principles throughout various and even remote countries. In A. D. 498, a Nestorian was raised to the high dignity of archbishop of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, assuming the title of patriarch of the East. During the fifth and two following centuries, Nestorianism spread through Persia, Chaldaea, and Syria, and penetrated even to India, Tartary, and China. A Nestorian church of considerable extent was found by the Portuguese in the sixteenth century on the coast of Malabar, in the south of India. These Christians, who held a tradition that their church was founded by the Apostle Thomas, called themselves by the name of Christians of St. Thomas. (See THOMAS (ST.), CHRISTIANS OF.) The CHALDEAN CATHOLIC CHURCH (which see) originated in a schism which took place towards the middle of the sixteenth century, among the Nestorians, a party having consented to subject themselves to the authority of the See of Rome.

NETHINIM, inferior officers employed in the service of the ancient Jewish tabernacle and temple. They were employed chiefly in cutting wood and drawing water, to be used in the sacrifices. They were not originally of Hebrew descent, but are generally supposed to have been the posterity of the Gibeonites, who, in the time of Joshua, were doomed by God to perform menial offices. In the faithful discharge of these humble duties, they continued till the time of Nehemiah, who mentions that great numbers of them returned from Babylon to rebuild Jerusalem and the temple. Ezra brought 220 of them into Judea. Those who followed Zerubbabel made up 392. This number seems not to have been sufficient for the discharge of the duties required of them, and hence Josephus speaks of a solemnity called Xylophoria, in which the people generally carried wood to the temple, to keep up the fire on the altar of burnt-sacrifices. When the Nethinim were on duty at the temple, they lodged in the tower of Ophiel, or in a street adjacent, that they might be near the east gate of the temple, which was the usual entrance. They were not allowed to lodge within the courts of the temple, because they were not of the tribe of Levi. When their week of ministration was ended, they returned to the cities and villages assigned to them as their places of residence.

NETON. Macrobius, in his Saturnalia, mentions that the Accitani, an Iberian tribe, worshipped, under the name of Neton, a statue of Mars adorned with rays of light.

NETOVTSCHEINS, a sect of Russian Dissenters, who are described by Dr. Pinkerton, in his account of the Greek church in Russia, as very ignorant and much divided in opinion. They go under the general name of Spasova Soglasia, or the Union for Salvation. They believe that Antichrist has come, and has put an end to everything holy in the church.

NETPE, the mother of Typhon, the god of evil among the ancient Egyptians. According to a myth, she was represented as seated on the tree of life, and sprinkling healthful water upon the souls of men.

NEW-BORN, a sect which arose in the United States of North America in the early part of the last century. It was originated by Matthias Bowman, a German emigrant, who embarked for America in 1719, and settled in what is now Berks County, Pennsylvania. During the few years which he passed in his adopted country—he died in 1727—Bowman succeeded in drawing around him a small sect, who called themselves New-Born, pretending to have received the new birth through mediate inspiration, apparitions, dreams, and the like. Any one who had thus been regenerated was alleged to be like God and Christ, and to be incapable of any longer committing sin. They denied the Bible to be necessary as a means of salvation, and scoffed at the holy sacraments. The privilege of impeccability they believed to be the portion of all who truly belonged to Christ. The New Birth they held to be that new stone which none knoweth but he that receiveth it. The sect appears to have survived the death of their founder little more than twenty years.

NEW MOON (FESTIVAL OF THE). From very early times, months being computed by the moon, the first appearance of the new moon was regarded as a festival. Thus in the Law of Moses, the Jews were commanded, in addition to the daily sacrifices, to offer on the new moons, two bullocks, a ram, and seven sheep of a year old, together with a meal-offering and a libation. These constituted the burnt-offering, and a goat the sin-offering. These numerous victims were probably divided between the morning and evening sacrifices. The first appearance of the new moon was announced by the sounding of silver trumpets. The new moon of the seventh month, or Tisri, being the commencement of the civil year, was observed as a festival under the name of the feast of trumpets. The Jewish Rabbis maintain that the commencement and length of each month were determined from time to time by the decision of the Sanhedrim. Several parties were dispatched to elevated places with instructions to watch the first appearance of the moon, and the Sanhedrim appointed a committee of three to receive their depositions. If they returned on the thirtieth day of the month, declaring that they had seen the moon, and if their testimony on this point agreed, then the thirtieth was consecrated and observed as the day of New Moon. If, however, the moon was not seen till the thirty-first day of the month, that day was appointed to be kept. The decision of the Sanhedrim was announced to the people by lighted beacons on the hills in time of peace, and by messengers sent in all directions in time of war. Those, however, who were very far distant from Jerusalem kept both days. The modern Jews observe the feast of the new moon on both the first and second days of the month, during which, though the men are allowed to engage in their ordinary employments, the women are forbidden to do any servile work. The time is spent in feasting, in the recitation of several psalms and other portions of Scripture, and the repetition of some additional prayers. "On the first Saturday evening in the month," as we learn from Mr. Allen in his 'Modern Judaism,' "if the moon is then visible, or on the first evening after, when the sky is bright enough to have a clear view of her, the Jews assemble in the open air, for what is called 'the consecration of the new-moon;' when some grave rabbi pronounces the following benediction, in which he is joined by all the company—'Blessed art thou, O Lord, our God, king of the universe! who with his word created the heavens, and all their host with the breath of his mouth. A decree and appointed time he gave them, that they should not deviate from their charge; they rejoice and are glad when performing the will of their Creator. Their Maker is true and his works are true. He also ordained that the moon should monthly renew her crown of glory: for those who have been tenderly carried from the womb are also hereafter to be renewed like her, to glorify their Creator for the glorious name of his kingdom. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who renewest the months.' Then, addressing the moon, they say three times—'Blessed be thy Former! Blessed be thy Maker! Blessed be thy Possessor! Blessed be thy Creator!' Then they raise themselves up, or jump, three times, and say—'As I attempt to leap towards thee, but cannot touch thee, so may those who attempt to injure me be unable to reach me.' Then they say three times—'May fear and dread fall upon them; by the greatness of thine arm may they be still as a stone. Still as a stone may they be, by the greatness of thine arm; may fear and dread fall on them. David king of Israel liveth and existeth.' Then each says to the company—'Peace be to you.' They mutually answer—'Unto you be peace.'

The practice of calculating the new moon from the time of observing it, has been discontinued since the dispersion of the Jews, except by the CARAITES (which see), who still adhere to the ancient custom. The festival of the new moon seems to have been observed for some time after the introduction of Christianity. Chrysostom has a whole discourse dissuading Christians from observing it. A festival called Neomenia was observed by the ancient Greeks at the beginning of every lunar month in honour of all the gods, but especially of Apollo, or the sun. Among the Phœnicians it was customary at the New Moon to feast in honour of Astarté, and more especially on that occasion they sacrificed children to Moloch. The Chinese consecrate both the new and the full moon to the memory of their ancestors.

NEW YEAR (FESTIVAL OF THE). The observance of the first day of the year as a sacred festival is of very ancient origin. Tisri, the seventh month of the sacred and first of the civil year, is said by the Chaldee Paraphrast to have begun the year long anterior to the existence of the Hebrew nation. The following command is given in the law of Moses, Numb. xxix. 1, 2. "And in the seventh month, on the first day of the month, ye shall have an holy convocation; ye shall do no servile work: it is a day of blowing the trumpets unto you. And ye shall offer a burnt-offering for a sweet savour unto the Lord; one young bullock, one ram, and seven lambs of the first year without blemish." On this festival, which received, and still bears among the Jews the name of the Feast of Trumpets, the people assembled from all parts of Palestine at Jerusalem; sacrifices were offered up; silver trumpets were blown from morning till night; the Levites read passages of the law, and gave instructions to the people. This season was reckoned peculiarly favourable for the commencement of any undertaking. Among the modern Jews, the first and second days of Tisri are still celebrated by a cessation from all unnecessary labour, and the observance of protracted services in the synagogue. It is a Rabbinical notion that the world was created on this day; and that God sits in judgment on mankind on this first day of the year. The special services of the synagogue are thus described by Mr. Allen: "In the morning service, after the lessons from the law and the prophets, they blow a trumpet or cornet, which is required to be made of ram's horn, in memory of the ram which was substituted for Isaac on Mount Moriah. The prayers make frequent allusions to that transaction, which the rabbies affirm to have happened on this day. The blowing of the cornet is preceded by a grace; and as soon as it has been sounded the reader proclaims, 'Happy is the people who know the joyful sound: O Lord! in the light of thy countenance they shall walk.' The shouphar or cornet is sounded many times in the course of this festival. Among other reasons for it, the following is assigned in one of the prayers: 'Thy people are assembled to supplicate thee; they blow and sound the shouphar, as it is said in thy law, to confound the accuser, Satan, that he may not be able to accuse them before thee.'

"Between the morning and afternoon services, on the second day, it is their custom to go to some river, or to the sea side, and shake their garments over the water. By some, this ceremony is represented as a casting away of their sins and an accomplishment of the prophetic declaration: 'Thou wilt cast all their sins into the depths of the sea.' And others say, 'It is customary to go to the river where there are fish, to put us in mind that we are taken away suddenly, as a fish caught in a net; we therefore ought to repent while it is in our power, and not leave that for to-morrow which may as well be done to-day.'"

The old Roman year began in March, and on the first day of that month the festival ANCYLIA (which see), was celebrated, when the Salii or priests of Mars, carried the sacred shield in procession through the city, and the people spent the day in feasting and rejoicing. The Romans counted it lucky to begin any new enterprise, or to enter upon any new office, on New Year's day. The same sacredness was attached to the first day of the year after the change took place in the Roman calendar, which made January the commencing month instead of March; and Pliny tells us, that on the 1st of January, people wished each other health and prosperity, and sent presents to each other. It was accounted a public holiday, and games were celebrated in the Campus Martius. The people gave themselves up to riotous excess and various kinds of heathen superstition. "It was only," remarks Neander, "to oppose a counter influence to the pagan celebration, that Christian assemblies were finally held on the first day of January; and they were designed to protect Christians against the contagious influence of pagan debauchery and superstition. Thus when Augustin had assembled his church, on one of these occasions, he first caused to be sung the words, 'Save us, O Lord our God! and gather us from among the heathen!' Psalm cvi. 47; and hence he took occasion to remind his flock of their duty, especially on this day, to show, that as they had, in truth, been gathered from among the heathen; to exhibit in their life the contrast between the Christian and the heathen temper; to substitute alms for New-Year's gifts, (the Strenæ), edification from scripture for merry songs, and fasts for riotous feasting. This principle was gradually adopted in the practice of the Western church, and three days of penitence and fasting opposed to the pagan celebration of January, until the time being designated, the festival of Christ's circumcision was transferred to this season; when a Jewish rite was opposed to the pagan observances, and its reference to the circumcision of the heart by repentance, to heathen revelry."

The Hindus call the first day of the year Prajapadya, the day of the Lord of creation. It is sacred to Gane-a, the god of wisdom, to whom they sacrifice male kids and wild deer, and celebrate the festival with illuminations and general rejoicings. Among the mountain tribes it is customary to sacrifice a buffalo every New Year's day, in the presence of a multitude assembled to witness the solemn ceremony. The Chinese begin their year about the vernal equinox, and the festival observed on the occasion is one of the most splendid of their religious feasts. All classes, including the emperor, mingle together in free and unrestrained intercourse, and unite in thanksgiving for mercies received, as well as in prayer for a genial season, and an abundant crop. In Japan the day is spent in visiting and feasting. The Tsabians held a grand festival on the day that the sun enters Aries, which was the first day of their year, when the priests and people marched in procession to the temples, where they sacrificed to their planetary gods. Among the ancient Persians prisoners were liberated and offenders forgiven on this day: and, in short, the Persian New Year's day resembled the Sabbatical year of the Jews. A curious Oriental custom peculiar to this day may be mentioned. It is called by the Arabs and Persians the Game of the Beardless River, and consists in a deformed man, whose hair has been shaved and his face ludicrously painted with varie-gated colours, riding along the streets on an ass, and behaving in the most whimsical and extravagant manner, to the great delight of the multitudes that follow him. Thus equipped he proceeds from door to door soliciting small pieces of money. A similar custom is still found in various parts of Scotland under the name of "guizarding."

On the 10th of March, or commencement of the year among the Druids, was performed the famous ceremony of cutting the mistletoe. Beneath the oak where it grew were made preparations for a banquet and sacrifices; and for the first time two white bulls were tied by the horns. Then one of the Druids, clothed in white, mounted the tree, and cut off the mistletoe with a golden sickle, receiving it into a white sagum or cloak hid over his hand. The sacrifices were next commenced, and prayers were offered to God to send a blessing upon his own gift, whilst the plant was supposed to bestow fertility on man and beast, and to be a specific against all sorts of poisons.

On the first day of the year, as Humboldt informs us, the Mexicans carefully adorned their temples and houses, and employed themselves in various religious ceremonies. One, which was at first perhaps peculiar to this season, though subsequently it became of more frequent occurrence, was the offering up to the gods of a human sacrifice. The wretched victim, after having been flayed alive, was carried up to the pyramidal summit of the sacred edifice, which was the scene of these barbarities, and after his heart had been torn out by a priest, in the presence of assembled thousands, his body was consumed to ashes, by being placed on a blazing funeral pile.

The Muyscas, or native inhabitants of New Grenada, celebrate the same occasion with peaceful and unbloody rites. They assemble, as usual, in their temples, and their priests distribute to each worshipper a figure formed of the flour of maize, which is eaten in the full belief that it will secure the individual from danger and adversity. The first lunation of the Muysca year is denominated "the month of the ears of maize."

From the various facts thus adduced, it is plain that the rites connected with New Year's day may be traced back to the remotest ages, that they have been universally celebrated in all ages and nations, and that though of a festive and cheerful, they have been uniformly of an essentially religious character.

NEYELAH, a deity worshipped by the ancient Arabians before the days of Mohammed.

NIBHAZ, a god referred to in 2 Kings xvii. 31, as worshipped by the Avites. The Jewish commentator, Abarbanel, derives the name from the Hebrew word nabach, to bark, and asserts the idol to have been made in the form of a dog. Selden considers this deity to be the same with Tartak, which is mentioned along with it in Scripture. It is more probable, however, that Nibhaz corresponds to the dog-headed Ambi of the ancient Egyptians.

NICENE CREED, a formulary of the faith of the Christian church, drawn up in opposition to the Arian heresy, by the first general council, which was convened at Nice in Bithynia, A. D. 325. In its original form the creed ran thus: "We believe in one God, the Father, almighty, the maker of all things visible and invisible: and in one Lord, Jesus Christ, the Son of God, begotten of the Father, only-begotten (that is), of the substance of the Father, God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God; begotten, not made; of the same substance with the Father; by whom all things were made that are in heaven and that are in earth; who for us men, and for our salvation, descended, and was incarnate, and became man; suffered and rose again the third day, ascended into the heavens; and will come to judge the living and the dead; and in the Holy Spirit. But those who say that there was a time when he was not, and that he was not before he was begotten, and that he was made out of nothing, or affirm that he is of any other substance or essence, or that the Son of God is created, and mutable or changeable, the Catholic church doth pronounce accursed."

The creed, however, which is used in the Romish, Lutheran, and English churches, under the name of the Nicene Creed, is in a more enlarged form, being in reality the creed set forth by the second general council, which was held at Constantinople A. D. 381. In its present form, therefore, the creed may be termed the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed: the addition to the original Nicene Creed having been introduced to meet the heresy of Macedonius in regard to the divinity of the Holy Spirit. The words Filioque, "and from the Son," were not inserted earlier than the fifth century, when they seem to have been introduced by the Spanish churches, and from them they passed to the other churches of the West. The clause Filioque is rejected by the Greek church, and has long been the subject of a bitter controversy between the Eastern and Western churches.

NICOLAITANS, a Christian sect said to have existed in the second century. Irenæus, who mentions it, traces its origin to Nicolas, a deacon spoken of in the Acts of the Apostles; and he supposes the same sect to be referred to in the second chapter of the Book of Revelation. It is doubtful, however, whether John means anything more by the Nicolaitans in the Apocalypse than a class of people who endeavoured to seduce the Christians to participate in the sacrificial feasts of the heathen, and may have been the same with those who are said, Rev. ii. 14, to have held the doctrine of Balaam. The Nicolaitans, who may probably have falsely claimed Nicolas as their founder, appear to have been lax both in principle and practice. They held the Epicurean maxim, that pleasure and the gratification of the bodily appetites formed the true end and happiness of man, and without the slightest scruple they eat of all meats offered to idols. It is impossible to speak with certainty as to the true opinions of the Nicolaitans. Some suppose that there were two sects bearing the name of Nicolaitans, one referred to by the Apostle John, and another founded in the second century by one called Nicolaus. Eusebius says, that the sect of Nicolaitans existed but a short time.

NICOLAS'S (St.) DAY, a festival observed in both the Romish and Greek churches, in honour of Nicolas, a sort of patron saint of mariners. It is celebrated on the 6th of December.

NIDDUL, the lowest degree of excommunication among the ancient Jews. It consisted of a suspension of the offender from the synagogue and society of his brethren for thirty days. If he did not repent in the course of that time, the period of suspension was extended to sixty days; and if he still continued obstinate, it was prolonged to ninety days. If beyond that time he persisted in impenitence, he was subjected to the CHEREM (which see).

NIDHÖGG, the huge mundane snake of the ancient Scandinavian cosmogony. It is represented as gnawing at the root of the ash Yggdrasill, or the mundane tree. In its ethical import, as Mr. Gross alleges, Nidhög, composed of Nid, which is synonymous with the German neid, or envy, and hoggr, to hew, or gnaw, signifying the envious gnawer, involves the idea of all moral evil, typified as the destroyer of the root of the tree of life.

NIFLHEIM, in the old Scandinavian cosmogony, place consisting of nine worlds, reserved for those that died of disease or old age. Hela or Death there exercised her despotic power. In the middle of Niflheim, according to the Edda, lies the spring called Hvergelmir, from which flow twelve rivers.

NIGHT. The Hebrews were always accustomed, even from the earliest times, to consider the night as preceding the day. Hence we read Gen. i. 5, "The evening and the morning were the first day." Before the Babylonish captivity the night was divided into three watches; the first continuing till midnight; the second from midnight till cock-crowing; and the third, which was called the morning watch, continued till the rising of the sun. The Romans divided the night into four watches, a mode of calculating which was in use among the Jews in the time of our Lord. The watches consisted each of three hours, the first extending from six till nine; the second from nine till twelve or midnight; the third from twelve till three, and the fourth from three till six.

NIGHT-HAWK, a species of owl, enumerated among the unclean birds mentioned in Leviticus. It was called Tachmas among the Hebrews. It was reckoned a sacred bird among the ancient Egyptians, and in proof of this statement, we may adduce the testimony of Sir John G. Wilkinson: "The hawk was particularly known as the type of the sun, and worshipped at Heliopolis as the sacred bird, and representative of the deity of the place. It was also peculiarly revered at the island of Philæ, where this sacred bird was kept in a cage and fed with a care worthy the representative of the deity of whom it was the emblem. It was said to be consecrated to Osiris, who was buried at Philæ; and in the sculptures of the temples there the hawk frequently occurs, sometimes seated amidst lotus plants. But this refers to Horus, the son of Osiris, not to that god himself, as the hieroglyphics show, whenever the name occurs over it.

"A hawk with a human head was the emblem of the human soul, the bairn of Horapollon. The goddess Athor was sometimes figured under this form, with the globe and horns of her usual head-dress. Hawks were also represented with the head of a ram. Several species of hawks are natives of Egypt, and it is difficult to decide which was really the sacred bird. But it appears the same kind was chosen as the emblem of all the different gods, the only one introduced besides the sacred hawk being the small sparrow-hawk, or Fulco tenuiculoides, which occurs in certain mysterious subjects connected with the dead in the tombs of the kings. The sacred hawk had a particular mark under the eye, which, by their conventional mode of representing it, is much more strongly expressed in the sculptures than in nature; and I have met with one species in Egypt, which possesses this peculiarity in so remarkable a degree, as to leave no doubt respecting the actual bird called sacred in the country. I have therefore ventured to give it the name of Fulco avocri. Numerous hawk mummies have been found at Thebes and other places. And such was the care taken by the Egyptians to preserve this useful and sacred bird, that even those which died in foreign countries, where their armies happened to be, were embalmed and brought to Egypt to be buried in consecrated tombs."

NIHILISTS, a sect of German mystics in the fourteenth century, who, according to Ruysbroek, held that neither God nor themselves, heaven nor hell, action nor rest, good nor evil, have any real existence. They denied God and the work of Christ, Scripture, sacraments—everything. God was nothing; they were nothing; the universe was nothing. "Some hold doctrines such as these in secret," adds Ruysbroek, "and conform outwardly for fear. Others make them the pretext for every kind of vice and insolent insubordination." The heresy of Nihilianism seems to have existed at an earlier period than the fourteenth century, for we find Peter Lombard charged with it in the twelfth century, because he maintained that the Son of God had not become anything by the assumption of our nature, seeing no change can take place in the divine nature. The principal author of this accusation against Lombard was Walter of St. Victor. But it can scarcely be admitted to be just, proceeding as it does upon the idea that the denial of existence in a certain indivi-durd form is an absolute denial. Sometimes the term Nihilists is used to denote ANNULMENTISTS (which see).

NIKE, the goddess of victory, who had a famous temple on the acropolis of Athens, which is still extant. The word is also found used as a surname of Athena, under which she was worshipped at Megara.

NIKEPHORUS (Gr. bringing victory), a surname of several divinities among the ancient Greeks, such as Aphrodite.

NILOA, an anniversary festival among the ancient Egyptians, in honour of the tutelar deity of the Nile. Heliiodorus alleges it to have been one of the principal festivals of the Egyptians. Sir J. G. Wilkinson thus describes the Niloa: "It took place about the summer solstice, when the river began to rise: and the anxiety with which they looked forward to a plentiful inundation, induced them to celebrate it with more than usual honour. Libanius asserts that these rites were deemed of so much importance by the Egyptians, that unless they were performed at the proper season, and in a becoming manner, by the persons appointed to this duty, they felt persuaded that the Nile would refuse to rise and inundate the land. Their full belief in the efficacy of the ceremony secured its annual performance on a grand scale. Men and women assembled from all parts of the country in the towns of their respective nomes, grand festivities were proclaimed, and all the enjoyments of the table were united with the solemnity of a holy festival. Music, the dance, and appropriate hymns, marked the respect they felt for the deity, and a wooden statue of the river god was carried by the priests through the villages in solemn procession, that all might appear to be honoured by his presence and aid, while invoking the blessings he was about to confer." Even at the present day the rise of the Nile is hailed by all classes with excessive joy.

NILUS, the great river of Egypt, which even in the most ancient times received divine honours from the inhabitants of that country. This deity was more especially worshipped at Nilopolis, where he had a temple. Herodotus mentions the priests of the Nile. Lucian says that its water was a common divinity to all of the Egyptians. From the monuments it appears that even the kings paid divine honours to the Nile. Champollion refers to a painting of the time of the reign of Rameses II., which exhibits this king offering wine to the god of the Nile, who, in the hieroglyphic inscription, is called Hapi Mōon, the life-giving father of all existences. The passage which contains the praise of the god of the Nile represents him at the same time as the heavenly Nile, the primitive water, the great Nilus whom Cicero, in his De Natura Deorum, declares to be the father of the highest deities, even of Ammon. The sacredness which attached to the Nile among the ancient Egyptians is still preserved among the Arabs who have settled in Egypt, and who are accustomed to speak of the river as most holy. Mr. Bruce, in his travels in Abyssinia, mentions that it is called by the Agows, Gzeir, Geesa, or Seir; the first of which terms signifies a god. It is also called Ab, father, and has many other names, all implying the most profound veneration. This idolatrous worship may have led to the question which the prophet Jeremiah asks, "What hast thou to do in Egypt to drink of the waters of Seir?" or the waters profaned by idolatrous rites.

NIMETULAHITES, an order of Mohammedan monks in Turkey, which originated in the 777th year of the Hegira. They assemble once every week to praise God in sacred hymns and songs. Candidates for admission into this order are obliged to pass forty days in a secret chamber, with no more than four ounces of meat a-day, and during the time they are confined in this solitary apartment, they are believed to be contemplating the face of God, and meditating upon heaven, as well as praising the Creator of the universe. At the end of the allotted period they are led forth by the fraternity and engage together in a sacred dance, until they fall down in a state of ecstacy, in which they see visions, and are favoured with extraordinary revelations from heaven.

NINE-DAYS-DEVOTION. See NOVENA.

NINTH-HOUR SERVICE. In the early Christian church this service took place, according to our reckoning, at three o'clock in the afternoon, at which time our Saviour expired upon the cross. At this hour Cornelius was praying when he was visited by an angel; and we are told also, that Peter and John went up into the temple "at the ninth hour, being the hour of prayer," and the usual time of the Jewish evening sacrifice. The custom of celebrating divine service at this hour seems to have been continued in the Christian church. Thus the council of Laodicea expressly mentions the ninth hour of prayer, and orders that the same service should be used as was appointed for evening prayer. And as Chrysostom speaks of three hours of public prayer in the day, he includes, in all probability, the ninth as one of them.

NIOTITES, a party of the MONOPHYTES (which see), founded by Stephanus, surnamed Niobes, an Alexandrian rhetorician or sophist.

NIREUPAN, the word used by the Siamese to denote the NIRWANA (which see) of the Buddhists.

NIRMALAS, one of the divisions of the SIKHS (which see), who profess to dedicate themselves exclusively to a religious life. They lead a life of celibacy, and disregard their personal appearance, often going nearly naked. They do not assemble together in colleges, nor do they observe any particular form of Divine service, but confine their devotion to speculative meditation on the perusal of the writings of Nānak, Kābir, and other unitarian teachers. They are always solitary, supported by their disciples, or wealthy persons who may happen to favour the sect. The Nirmalas are known as able expounders of the Vedanti philosophy, in which Brahmans do not disdain to accept of their instructions. They are not a very numerous body on the whole; but a few are almost always to be found at the principal seats of Hindu wealth, and particularly at Benares.

NIRWANA, extinction, the highest possible felicity in the system of BUDDHISM (which see). It has been frequently disputed whether the expression means anything more than eternal rest, or unbroken sleep, but those who have fully studied the literature of Buddhism, consider it as amounting to absolute annihilation, or the destruction of all elements which constitute existence. There are four paths, an entrance into any of which secures either immediately, or more remotely, the attainment of Nirwana. They are (1.) Souddh, which is divided into twenty-four sections, and after it has been entered there can be only seven more births between that period and the attainment of Nirwana, which may be in any world but the four hells. (2.) Sakradágáni, into which he who enters will receive one more birth. He may enter this path in the world of men, and afterwards be born in déva-lóka; or he may enter it in a déva-lóka, and afterwards be born in the world of men. It is divided into twelve sections. (3.) Anágáni, into which he who enters will not again be born in a káma-lóka; he may, by the apparitional birth, enter into a brahma-lóka, and from that world attain Nirwana. This path is divided into forty-eight sections. (4.) Arya or Aryahat, into which he who enters has overcome or destroyed all evil desire. It is divided into twelve sections.

Those who have entered into any of the paths can discern the thoughts of all in the same, or preceding paths. Each path is divided into two grades: 1. The perception of the path. 2. Its fruition or enjoyment. The mode in which Nirwana, or the destruction of all the elements of existence, may be reached, is thus pointed out by Mr. Spence Hardy, in his 'Eastern Monachism': "The unwise being who has not yet arrived at a state of purity, or who is subject to future birth, overcome by the excess of evil desire, rejoices in the organs of sense, áyatana, and their relative objects, and commends them. The áyatanas therefore become to him like a rapid stream to carry him onward toward the sea of repeated existence; they are not released from old age, decay, death, sorrow, &c. But the being who is purified, perceiving the evils arising from the sensual organs and their relative objects, does not rejoice therein, nor does he commend them, or allow himself to be swallowed up by them. By the destruction of the 108 modes of evil desire he has released himself from birth, as from the jaws of an alligator; he has overcome all attachment to outward objects; he does not regard the unauthorized precepts, nor is he a sceptic; and he knows that there is no ego, no self. By overcoming these four errors, he has released himself from the cleaving to existing objects. By the destruction of the cleaving to existing objects he is released from birth, whether as a brahma, man, or any other being. By the destruction of birth he is released from old age, decay, death, sorrow, &c. All the afflictions connected with the repetition of existence are overcome. Thus all the principles of existence are annihilated, and that annihilation is nirwána."

In the Buddhist system Nirwána is the end or completion of religion; its entire accomplishment. All sentient beings will not attain it. But if any one attain the knowledge that is proper to be required; if he learn the universality of sorrow; if he overcome that which is the cause of sorrow; and if he practise that which is proper to be observed; by him the possession of Nirwána will be secured; and Nirwána, being a non-entity, the being who enters this state must become non-existent.

NISAN, the seventh month of the civil year among the Hebrews, and after the exodus from Egypt the first month of the ecclesiastical year. It was originally called ABIB (which see), but received the name of Nisan in the time of Ezra, after the return from the captivity of Babylon.

NISROCH, an Assyrian deity worshipped by Sennacherib, who appears to have been a pontiff as well as a king, and who was murdered by his own sons while engaged in the temple of Nisroch, in the performance of religious rites. This deity was probably identical with Ashur, the principal deity of Nineveh. There is a curious Rabbinical fancy concerning this Assyrian idol, that it was a plank of Noah's ark. Some think that Jupiter Belus was worshipped in Assyria by the name of Nisroch, and under the figure of an eagle. Stanley, in his History of Oriental Philosophy, alleges that Nisroch, as well as the other Assyrian gods, had a reference to the heavenly bodies.

NITHING, infamous, a most insulting epithet, anciently used in Denmark and throughout the whole of the North of Europe. There was a peculiar way of applying it, however, which greatly aggravated its virulence, and gave the aggrieved party the right to seek redress by an action at law. This was by setting up what was called a Nithing-post or Nithing-stake, which is thus described by Mr. Blackwell in his valuable edition of Mallet's Northern Antiquities: "A mere hazel twig stuck in the ground by a person who at the same time made use of some opprobrious epithet, either against an individual or a community, was quite sufficient to come under the legal definition of a Nithing-post. Several superstitious practices were, however, commonly observed on the occasion which were supposed to impart to the Nithing-post the power of working evil on the party it was directed against, and more especially to make any injuries done to the person erecting it recoil on those by whom they had been perpetrated. A pole with a horse's head, recently cut off, stuck on it, was considered to form a Nithing-post of peculiar efficacy. Thus when Eigil, a celebrated Icelandic skald of the ninth century, was banished from Norway, we are told that he took a stake, fixed a horse's head on it, and as he drove it in the ground said, 'I here set up a Níðling-stake, and turn this my banishment against King Eirek and Queen Ganhilda.' He then turned the horse's head towards the land, saying, 'I turn this my banishment against the protecting deities of this country, in order that they may, all of them, roam wildly about and never find a resting-place until they have driven out King Eirek and Queen Ganhilda.' He then set sail for Iceland, with the firm persuasion that the injuries he had received by his banishment, would by the efficacy of his charmed Níðing-post recoil on the royal couple they had, in his opinion, proceeded from.

"Mention is frequently made in the Sagas and the Icelandic laws of this singular custom. We are told for instance, in the Vatsudala Saga, that Jökul and Thorstein having accepted a challenge from Finbogi and Björg, went to the place of meeting on the day and hour appointed. Their opponents, however, remained quietly at home, deeming that a violent storm, which happened to be raging, would be a sufficient excuse for their non-appearance. Jökul, after waiting for some time on the ground, thought that he would be justified in setting up a Níðing-post against Finbogi, or as would now be said, in posting him for a coward. He accordingly fashioned out a block of wood into the rude figure of a human head, and fixed it on a post in which he cut magical runes. He then killed a mare, opened her breast, and stuck the post in it with the carved head turned towards Finbogi's dwelling."

NITO, an evil spirit recognized by the pagan natives of the Molucca Islands. Every town formerly had its peculiar Nito, who was consulted in every affair of any importance. Twenty or thirty persons assemble for this purpose. They summon the Nito by the sound of a little consecrated drum, whilst some of the company light up several wax tapers, and pronounce several mystical words with the view of conjuring up the demon. One of the company now pretends to speak and act as if he were the demon himself. Besides these public ceremonies, there are others that are private. In some corner of the house they light up wax tapers in honour of the Nito, and set something to eat before him. The master of each family always attaches great value to anything which has been consecrated to their Nito.

NIXI DII, a name applied among the ancient Romans to those deities who assisted women in childbirth. Three statues were erected on the Capitol bearing this name.

NJEMBE, a female association among the natives of Southern Guinea, corresponding to NDA (which see) among the males. The proceedings of this institution are all secret. The women consider it an honour to belong to the order, and put themselves to great expense to be admitted. "During the process of initiation," as we learn from Mr. Wilson, "all the women belonging to the order paint their bodies in the most fantastic colours. The face, arms, breast, and legs, are covered over with red and white spots, sometimes arranged in circles, and at other times in straight lines. They march in regular file from the village to the woods, where all their ceremonies are performed, accompanied by music on a crescent-formed drum. The party spend whole nights in the woods, and sometimes exposed to the heaviest showers of rain. A sort of vestal-fire is used in celebration of these ceremonies, and it is never allowed to go out until they are all over.

"The Njembe make great pretensions, and, as a body, are really feared by the men. They pretend to detect thieves, to find out the secrets of their enemies, and in various ways they are useful to the community in which they live, or are, at least, so regarded by the people. The object of the institution originally, no doubt, was to protect the females from harsh treatment on the part of their husbands; and as their performances are always veiled in mystery, and they have acquired the reputation of performing wonders, the men are, no doubt, very much restrained by the fear and respect which they have for them as a body."

NJORD, a god among the ancient Scandinavians, who reigned over the sea and winds. The Edda exhorts men to worship him with great devotion. He was particularly invoked by seafaring men and fishermen. He dwelt in the heavenly region called Noatún, and by his wife Skadi he became the father of the god Frey, and the goddess Freyja.

NKAZYA, a small shrub, whose root is employed in Northern Guinea in the detection of witchcraft. Half a pint of the decoction of the root is the usual doze, and if it acts freely as a diuretic, the party is considered to be innocent; but if it acts as a narcotic, and produces vertigo or giddiness, it is a sure sign of guilt. "Small sticks," says Mr. Wilson, "are laid down at the distance of eighteen inches or two feet apart, and the suspected person, after he has swallowed the draught, is required to walk over them. If he has no vertigo, he steps over them easily and naturally; but, on the other hand, if his brain is affected, he imagines they rise up before him like great logs, and in his awkward effort to step over them, is very apt to reel and fall to the ground. In some cases this draught is taken by proxy; and if a man is found guilty, he is either put to death or heavily fined and banished from the country."

NOACHIAN DELUGE. See DELUGE (TRADITIONS OF THE).

NOACHIC PRECEPTS, Jewish writers allege that seven precepts were given by God to the sons of Noah. They are as follows: "I. Not to commit idolatry. II. Not to blaspheme the name of God. III. To constitute upright judges for the maintenance of justice and its impartial administration to all persons. IV. Not to commit incest. V. Not to commit murder. VI. Not to rob or steal. VII. Not to eat a member of any living creature. 'Every one that observes these seven commandments,' according to a Jewish writer, 'is entitled to happiness.' But to observe them merely from a sense of their propriety, is deemed by Maimonides insufficient to constitute a pious Gentile, or to confer a title to happiness in the world to come: it is requisite that they be observed because they are divine commands."

NOMINALISTS, a god worshipped among the ancient Goths and Getæ, as presiding over the sea.

NOCTURNS. See ANTELUKAN SERVICE.

NODDIANS, a heretical Mohammedan sect, who, to avoid falling into the error of making God the author of evil, asserted that neither directly nor indirectly, permissively nor authoritatively, had God any connection whatever with evil. This sect denied also the miraculous character of the Koran.

NODOTUS, said to have been a deity among the ancient Romans who presided over knots in the stem of plants producing grain. It has been supposed also to have been a surname of Saturn.

NOETIANS, a Christian sect which arose in the early part of the third century, deriving its name from its founder Noetus, who denied a plurality of persons in the Godhead. He acknowledged no other Person but the Father only. He admitted with the orthodox that there were two natures united in one Person in Christ, but he held that the divine Person which was united with the human nature could be no other than the Person of the Father. If this view were correct, it would be the Father who suffered on the cross. Hence the sect received the name of PATRIPASSIANS.

NOLÆ. See BELLS.

NOMINALISTS (from Lat. nomen, a name), a class of thinkers who made their first appearance in the tenth century, alleging that general ideas, or, as they were usually termed at that time, universals, have no existence in reality, but are mere words or names. An opposing party asserted that universals were real existences, and hence received the appellation of Realists. The controversy which now commenced between these two parties, continued throughout several centuries, and was agitated with the utmost keenness on both sides. The subject of dispute in this case was apparently one of a strictly abstract and philosophical character, but it soon rose into additional interest and importance, in consequence of both parties applying their respective theories to the explanation of religious doctrines. And indeed the origin of the contest has sometimes been traced back to the controversy with Berengarius respecting the Lord's Supper.

The founder of the sect of the Nominalists as a distinct and separate body was Roscelin, in the eleventh century, followed by his eminent disciple Abelard. Through the influence of these two distinguished men, their opinions spread rapidly for a time, but afterwards the knotty point which formed the ground of dispute fell into neglect, until in the fourteenth century Nominalism received fresh spirit and life from Occam the disciple of Scotus. Then the dispute about universals was revived with the fiercest animosity in the schools of Britain, France, and Germany. Nor did this war of philosophical opinion abate in intensity until the Reformation put an end to the quarrels of the schoolmen. All the influence of the Church of Rome was for a long time exerted in favour of the Realists, and against the Nominalists. Accordingly, in 1339, the university of Paris issued an edict condemning and prohibiting the philosophy of Occam, but contrary to all expectation, the opposition of this learned body had the effect of leading a still greater number to adopt Nominalist opinions. Both in France and Germany the contest became so violent, that no longer limiting itself to abstract argument, it had recourse to penal laws and the force of arms. In the fifteenth century, the Nominalists, or Terminists, as they were also called, were held in high authority in the university of Paris, as long as John Gerson and his immediate disciples lived; but after their death Louis XI., the king of France, issued a royal edict prohibiting the doctrine of the Nominalists from being taught, and their books from being read. This edict, however, remained in force only a few years, and in 1481 the sect was restored to its former privileges and honours in the university of Paris. Luther in his time declared it to be the most powerful of all sects, particularly at Paris.

In England, after the revival of letters, Mr. Hobbes adopted the opinion of the Nominalists, and the same course was followed by Bishop Berkeley and Mr. Hume. Dugald Stewart also observes: "It is with the doctrine of the Nominalists that my own opinion coincides;" and afterwards he continues, "It may frequently happen, from the association of ideas, that a general word may recall some one individual to which it is applicable; but this is so far from being necessary to the accuracy of our reasoning, that excepting in some cases in which it may be useful to check us in the abuse of general terms, it always has a tendency, more or less, to mislead us from the truth. As the decision of a judge must necessarily be impartial when he is only acquainted with the relations in which the parties stand to each other, and when their names are supplied by letters of the alphabet, or by the fictitious names of Titus, Caius, and Sempronius; so in every process of reasoning, the conclusion we form is most likely to be logically just, when the attention is confined solely to signs; and when the imagination does not present to it those individual objects which may warp the judgment by casual associations."

The Nominalists have often been charged with holding doctrines which, from their very nature, lead to scepticism. Thus it is argued, that if, as they allege, individuals are the only realities, then it follows, as a natural consequence, that the senses which perceive individual existence must be the only sources of knowledge; and it also follows, that there can be no absolute affirmation concerning things, since all absolute affirmation proceeds on the reality of general or universal notions. In this way it is evident that points of the highest importance depend upon the solution of the question which divided the schoolmen throughout the Middle Ages into the two great parties of Nominalists and Realists. Thus, at the very time when Nominalism was first developed, Roscelin attempted to show that without this system the doctrine of the Trinity and of the incarnation of the Son of God, could not be rightly presented. Considering as he did every universal to be a mere abstraction, and particulars as alone having reality, he argued that if only the essence of God in the Trinity was called one thing, and the Three Persons not three things, the latter could not be considered as anything real. Only the one God would be the real; all besides a mere nominal distinction to which nothing real corresponded; and so, therefore, with the Son, would the Father and the Holy Ghost also have become man. It was, accordingly, necessary to designate the Three Persons as three real beings, the same in respect of will and power. Hence at a council which met at Soissons in 1093, Roscelin's doctrine was condemned as Tritheism, and such was his fear of being treated as a heretic, that he was induced to recant.

NOMINATION, the offering of a clerk to the person who has the right of presentation, that he may present him to the ordinary. The nominator is bound to appoint his clerk within six months after the avoidance.

NOMIUS, a surname of those gods among the ancient heathens who presided over pastures and shepherds, such as Pan, Apollo, and Hermes.

NOMOCANON, a name given by the Canonists to a collection of ecclesiastical laws, along with the civil laws to which they refer. The first Nomocanon was made A. D. 554, by Joannes Antiochenus, patriarch of Constantinople. It was under fifty heads or titles. Photius, patriarch of Constantinople, made another Nomocanon about A. D. 883, arranging it under fourteen titles. In A. D. 1255, Arsenius, a monk of Athos, compiled a new Nomocanon, to which he added notes, showing the conformity of the imperial laws with the patriarchal constitutions. Still another Nomocanon was prepared by Matthæus Blastares, a Basilican monk.

NOMOPHYLAX (Gr. nomos, a law, and phylax, a keeper), an officer of the modern Greek Church, whose office it is to keep the canon laws.

NOMOS, a personification of law among the ancient Greeks, and described as exercising authority over gods and men.

NONA, one of the FATES (which see) among the ancient Romans.

NON-CONFORMISTS, the name originally applied to those persons in England who refused to conform to the Liturgy or Common Prayer-Book in the reign of Charles II. It is now used, however, to denote generally all who decline to conform to the doctrine, worship, and government of the Church of England. The word is now synonymous in England with DISSENTERS (which see).

NON-CONFORMITY (ERA OF), an expression used to denote the 24th of August 1662, when, in consequence of the Act of Uniformity coming into operation, nearly two thousand ministers of the Church of England were thrown into the ranks of the Non-Conformists.

NONES. See NINTH-HOUR SERVICE.

NON-INTRUSIONISTS, a name applied to a party in the Church of Scotland, who held that it was, and had been ever since the Reformation, a fixed principle in the law of the church that no minister shall be introduced into any pastoral charge contrary to the will of the congregation. The attempt to carry out this principle led to the formation in 1843 of the Free Church of Scotland. See SCOTLAND (FREE CHURCH OF).

NONJURORS, an appellation given to those Scottish Episcopalians who, at the Revolution of 1688, adhered to the banished family of the Stuarts, and refused to take the Oath of Allegiance to William and Mary. At the death of Prince Charles Edward Stuart, the last of the Stuart family, in 1788, this body transferred their loyalty from the House of Stuart to that of Hanover, and thus ceased to be Nonjurors. Soon afterwards, in 1792, an act was passed relieving them from the penalties imposed upon them by the various acts of Queen Anne, George I. and George II.

NONNÆ. See NUNS.

NON-RESIDENCE. In the ancient Christian Church several laws existed enforcing upon both the bishops and all the other clergy strict residence, in order to bind them to constant attendance upon their duty. Thus the council of Sardica prohibits a bishop from leaving his church for a longer period than three weeks, unless on some very weighty and urgent occasion. The council of Agde decreed, in reference to the French churches, that a presbyter or deacon, who was absent from his church for three weeks, should be suspended from the communion for three years. Justinian, in his Novels, lays down a rule that no bishop shall be absent from his church above a whole year without the express authority of the emperor.

NOON-DAY SERVICE, one of the customary offices of the early Christian Church. It took place at the sixth hour, which answers to our twelve o'clock or noon. At this service, according to the account which Basil gives of it, they used the 91st Psalm, praying for protection against the noon-day devil, as the Septuagint translates the 5th and 6th verses, "Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night nor for the arrow that flieth by day; nor for the pestilence that walketh in darkness, nor for the sickness, nor the devil that destroyeth at noon-day." This service was held at noon in commemoration of the sacrifice offered upon the cross.

NORNS, the name given in the Edda to the DEITIES (which see) of the ancient Scandinavians.

NORTH AMERICAN INDIANS (RELIGION OF THE). The Indian tribes of North America are the remnants of once populous and powerful nations. Some of them are found in the western part of the State of New York, some in Michigan, but the larger portion of them live in the territory west of the Mississippi river, known as the Indian reservation, a territory lying west of the States of Arkansas and Missouri, between Red River on the south, and Platte River on the north, being about 500 miles from north to south, and about 300 miles in breadth from east to west. The religion of the numerous tribes which inhabit this extensive territory is composed of a combination of spirit-worship and fetish-worship. The spirits are supposed to inhabit the objects which are adopted as fetishes; and even the most sublime objects of external nature, for example, the sun, the moon, and the planets, are not worshipped as material and inanimate objects, but as the abodes of Divinity. Amid the manifest polytheism which such a system of worship involves, there is found in many, if not most, of the rude tribes inhabiting the vast American continent, the sublime conception of one Great Spirit, the Creator of the universe. This Being, however, great and good though he is, they do not regard as in any way connected with the fortunes of men, or the government of the world.

Subordinate to the Great Spirit whom the Indians of the New World worship, are two separate series of minor deities, the one series being good deities under the Sun as their chief, and the other being evil deities under the Moon. But the most prominent characteristic of the worship of these wild tenants of the forests has always been its deprecatory character. It is essentially a religion of fear, the idea being ever present to the mind, that there are numberless malevolent spirits, demons, spectres, and fiends unceasingly employed in increasing the burden of human wretchedness. Hence the use of amulets, charms, and exorcisms to avert the anger of these hostile spirits; and hence also the extraordinary influence which seers and witches, doctors and medicine-men have ever been able to exercise over the mind of the Indian. "But we seldom see the darker traits of his religion," says Mr. Hardwick, "so distinctly, as when brought together in the doctrine of Manitoes, which constitutes, it has been thought, the nearest approximation he has ever made to some originality of conception. The word Manito, or Manedo, itself appears to signify 'a spirit:' hence the foremost member in the series of good divinities, the Great Spirit of the old American, is called in various tribes, Kitchi or Gezha Ma-nito; the name of the evil-minded spirit being Matchi Manito. But, when employed without such epithets, this title is restricted to a minor emanation from the Great Spirit, which revealing itself in dreams to the excited fancy of the youthful Indian, and inviting him to seek its efficacy in some well-known bird or beast, or other object, is selected by him for his guardian deity, his friend in council, and his champion in the hour of peril. He believes, however, that other Manitoes may prove far mightier and more terrible than his own, and consequently he is always full of apprehensions lest the influence granted preternaturally to his neighbour should issue in his own confusion. Add to this the prevalent idea, that Manitoes intrinsically evil are ever exercised in counterworking the beneficent, and that the actual administration of the world, abandoned to these great antagonistic powers, is the result of their interminable conflicts, and we cease to wonder at the moral perturbations which mark the character of the wild man. The fever of intense anxiety is never suffered to die out; until at length he either passes to another world, the simple reproduction of the present, or migrates into viler forms of animal existence, or, as in the case of the most highly favoured, is emancipated altogether from an earthly prison-house, and rescued from the malice of his demoniacal oppressors."

The North American Indians endeavour to propitiate the Great Spirit, by offering solemn sacrifices to him, for which they prepare themselves by vomiting, fasting, and drinking decoctions from certain prescribed plants; and all this in order to expel the evil which is in them, and that they may with a pure conscience attend to the sacred performance. Nor is the object of these sacrifices always the same; they have sacrifices of prayer, and sacrifices of thanksgiving. After a successful war they never fail to offer up a sacrifice to the Great Being as an expression of gratitude for the victory.

A curious example of the superstitions prevalent among the Indians is found in the practice of the initiation of boys, by which they pretend that the boy receives instruction from certain spirits as to his conduct in life, his future destination, and the wonders he is yet to perform. The following account of this strange process is given by the Rev. John Heckewelder in his Historical Account of the Indian Nations: "When a boy is to be thus initiated, he is put under an alternate course of physic and fasting, either taking no food whatever, or swallowing the most powerful and nauseous medicines, and occasionally he is made to drink decoctions of an intoxicating nature, until his mind becomes sufficiently bewildered, so that he sees or fancies that he sees visions, and has extraordinary dreams, for which, of course, he has been prepared before hand. He will fancy himself flying through the air, walking under ground, stepping from one ridge or hill to the other across the valley beneath, fighting and conquering giants and monsters, and defeating whole hosts by his single arm. Then he has interviews with the Mamitto or with spirits, who inform him of what he was before he was born and what he will be after his death. His fate in this life is laid entirely open before him, the spirit tells him what is to be his future employment, whether he will be a valiant warrior, a mighty hunter, a doctor, a conjuror, or a prophet. There are even those who learn or pretend to learn in this way the time and manner of their death.

"When a boy has been thus initiated, a name is given to him analogous to the visions that he has seen, and to the destiny that is supposed to be prepared for him. The boy, imagining all that happened to him while under preturbation, to have been real, sets out in the world with lofty notions of himself, and animated with courage for the most desperate undertakings."

The Indians believe that they were created within the bosom of the earth, where they dwelt for a long time before they came to live on its surface. Some assert that they lived in the bowels of the earth in human shape, while others maintain that they existed in the form of certain animals, such as a rabbit, or a tortoise. Mr. Heckewelder tells us, that they paid great respect to the rattle-snake, whom they called their grandfather, and would on no account destroy him. Different tribes claim relationship with different animals, and accordingly assume their names as distinctive badges, such as the Tortoise tribe, the Turtle tribe, and so forth.

NORTIA, an ancient Etruscan goddess.

NORWAY (CHURCH OF). The first introduction of Christianity into Norway has generally been ascribed to Hacon, a prince of the country, before the middle of the tenth century. This person had received a Christian education at the court of Athelstan, king of England. On returning to his own land, he found his countrymen zealously devoted to the worship of Odin; and having himself embraced Christianity, he was under the necessity of worshipping in secret. At length, having gained over some of his most intimate friends to the side of Christianity, he resolved, as he had become master of the kingdom, to establish Christianity as the religion of the country. Accordingly, he proposed, A. D. 945, before an assembly of the people, that the whole nation should renounce idolatry and worship the only true God and Jesus Christ his Son. He suggested also that the Sabbath should be devoted to religious exercises, and Friday observed as a fast-day. These royal propositions were indignantly rejected both by nobles and people; and the king, to conciliate his enraged subjects, yielded so far as to take part in some of the ancient sacred rites and customs. In particular, at the celebration of the Yule festival, he consented to eat part of the liver of a horse, and to drain all the cups drunk to its honour. In consequence of this sinful participation in manifest idolatry, he was soon after seized with the most painful remorse, and having been mortally wounded in battle, his last hours were embittered by the weight of guilt resting upon his conscience, and he died deeply penitent for the scandal he had brought upon the Christian profession.

The Danish king, Harald, effected the conquest of Norway in 967, and no sooner had he obtained possession of the country, than he sought by force to destroy paganism, and introduce Christianity. The violent measures, however, to which he had recourse for this purpose, were wholly unsuccessful, and led only to a stronger reaction in favour of the religion of Odin. In a short time the way was opened for the more effectual admission of the Christian religion by the elevation to the throne of Olof Tryggvesen, a Norwegian general, who was favourable to Christianity. "This Olof," to quote from Neander, "had travelled extensively in foreign lands; in Russia, Greece, England, and the neighbouring parts of Northern Germany. By intercourse with Christian nations, in his predatory excursions, he had obtained some knowledge of Christianity, and had been led, by various circumstances, to see a divine power in it. In some German port he had become acquainted, among others, with a certain ecclesiastic from Bremen, Thangbrand by name, a soldier priest, whose temper and mode of life were but little suited to the spiritual profession. This person carried about with him a large shield, having on it a figure of Christ on the cross, embossed in gold. The shield attracted Olof's particular notice. He inquired about the meaning of the symbol, which gave the priest an opportunity of telling the story of Christ and Christianity, as well as he knew how. Observing how greatly Olof was taken with the shield, Thangbrand made him a present of it; for which the Norman chieftain richly repaid him in gold and silver. He moreover promised to stand by him, if he should ever need his assistance and protection, in the future. In various dangers, by sea and on the land, which Olof afterwards encountered, he believed that he owed his life and safety to this shield; and his faith in the divine power of the crucified one thus became stronger and stronger. At the Scilly Isles, on the south-west coast of England, he received baptism; upon which he returned to Norway, his country, fully resolved to destroy paganism. In England, he again met with the priest Thangbrand, who had been compelled to leave his country, for having slain in single combat a man of superior rank. Olof took him along to Norway, in the capacity of a court clergyman. No good could be expected to result from his connection with a person of this character. Inclined of his own accord to employ violent measures for the destruction of paganism and the spread of Christianity, he would only be confirmed in this mistaken plan by Thangbrand's influence."

On reaching Norway, and taking possession of the government, he directed his chief efforts towards the introduction of Christianity as the religion of the country. He everywhere destroyed the heathen temples, and invited all classes of the people to submit to baptism. Where kindness failed in gaining converts, he had recourse to cruelty. His plans, however, for the Christianization of his subjects, were cut short in the year 1000 by his death, which took place in a war against the united powers of Denmark and Sweden. Norway now passed into the hands of foreign rulers, who, though favourable to Christianity, took no active measures for planting the Christian church in their newly acquired territory, and the pagan party once more restored the ancient rites. But this state of matters was of short continuance. Olof the Thick, who delivered Norway from her foreign rulers, came into the country in 1017, when already a decided Christian, with bishops and priests whom he had brought with him from England. He resolved to force Christianity upon the people, and accordingly the obstinate and refractory were threatened with confiscation of their goods, and in some cases with death itself. Many professed to yield through fear, and submitted to be baptized, but their conversion being pretended, not real, they continued secretly to practise their pagan ceremonies with as much zeal and earnestness as ever. In the province of Dalen, the idolaters were headed by a powerful man named Gudbrand, who assembled the people and persuaded them that if they would only bring out a colossal statue of their great god Thor, Olof and his whole force would melt away like wax. It was agreed to on both sides, that each party should try the power of its own god. The night preceeding the meeting was spent by Olof in secret prayer. Next day the colossal image of Thor, adorned profusely with gold and silver, was drawn into the public place, where crowds of pagans gathered round the image. The king stationed beside himself Colbein, one of his guard, a man of gigantic stature and great bodily strength. Gudbrand commenced the proceedings by challenging the Christians to produce evidence of the power of their God, and pointing them to the colossal image of the mighty Thor. To this boastful address Olof replied, taunting the pagans with worshipping a blind and deaf god, and calling upon them to lift their eyes to heaven and behold the Christian's God, as he revealed himself in the radiant light. At the utterance of these words, the sun burst forth with the brightest effulgence, and at the same moment Colbein demolished the idol with a single blow of a heavy mallet which he carried in his hand. The monster fell, crumbled into fragments, from which crept a great multitude of mice, snakes, and lizards. The scene produced a powerful effect upon the pagans, many of whom were from that moment convinced of the utter futility of their idols.

The severity, however, with which Olof had conducted his government, prepared the way for the conquest of the country by Canute, king of Denmark and England. The banished Olof returned, and raising an army composed wholly of Christians, made arrangements for a new struggle. He fell mortally wounded in battle on the 29th of July 1033, a day which was universally observed as a festival by the people of the North in honour of Olof, whom they hesitated not to style a Christian martyr. This monarch, whose memory was long held in the highest estimation, had laboured zealously for the spread of Christianity not only in Norway, but also in the islands peopled by Norwegian colonies, such as Iceland, the Orcades, and the Faroe Islands. His short reign was, in fact, wholly devoted to the propagation of the new faith, by means the most revolting to humanity. His general practice was to enter a district at the head of a powerful army, summon a council or Thing, as it was called, and give the people the alternative of fighting with him, or of being baptized. Most of them preferred baptism to the risk of fighting with an enemy so well prepared for the combat, and thus a large number made a nominal profession of Christianity.

Ever since the light of Christianity had dawned on Scandinavia, a general desire prevailed among the people to visit the Holy Land. Several of the Norwegian kings and princes had made a pilgrimage to the Holy Sepulchre, and during the reign of Magnus Barfoed, a chieftain named Skopte equipped a squadron of five vessels, and set sail, accompanied by his three sons, for Palestine, but died at Rome, where he had stopped to perform his devotions. The expedition was continued by his sons, none of whom, however, survived the journey. The fame of this exploit and the marvellous tales of other pilgrims, led Sigurd, king of Norway, to undertake a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. Fired with a love of wild adventure, and an avaricious desire of plunder, the royal pilgrim set out with a fleet of sixty vessels, surmounted with the sacred banner of the cross, and manned with several thousand followers. After wintering in England, where they were hospitably treated by Henry I., the Norwegian crusaders proceeded on their voyage, and after encountering pirates, plundering various places, and barbarously murdering tribes of people who refused to become Christians, they paid the accustomed visit to Jerusalem and the other holy places. Sigurd, on his return home, was solicited by the king of Denmark to join him in an attack upon the inhabitants of Smaland, who, after being nominally converted to Christianity, had relapsed into idolatry, and put to death the Christian missionaries. The king of Norway responded to the invitation, and passing into the Baltic punished the revolted pagans, and returned to his country laden with booty. After a reign of twenty-seven years Sigurd died in 1130.

From this period Norway became for more than a century a prey to barbarous and destructive civil wars. In the midst of these internal commotions

Cardinal Albano, an Englishman by birth, and afterwards known as Pope Adrian IV., arrived in Norway as legate from the Romish see. The chief object of his mission was to render the kingdom ecclesiastically independent of the authority of the archbishop of Lund—an arrangement which was earnestly desired by the Norwegian kings. An archiepiscopal see was accordingly erected at Trondheim, and endowed with authority, not only over Norway, but also over the Norwegian colonies. Rejoicing in their spiritual independence, the people readily consented to pay the accustomed tribute of Peter's pence to Rome, but they strenuously resisted the attempt made by the Pope's legate to insist upon the celibacy of the clergy. "In various other things," says Snorre, "the papal legate reformed the manners and customs of the nations during his stay, so that there never came to this land a stranger who was more honoured and beloved both by princes and people."

The church of Norway had now accepted a metropolitan at the hands of the Pope of Rome, and this acknowledgment of subjection to the Romish see was soon followed by other concessions which seriously compromised the liberties of the country. The ambitious prelate, who now occupied the see of Trondheim, was desirous of adopting every expedient to add to the influence and authority of the primacy. With this view he succeeded in bringing it about that the realm was hereafter to be held as a fief of St. Olof, the superior lord being represented by the archbishops of Trondheim, whose consent was made indispensable to the filling of the vacant throne. On the demise of the reigning king the crown was to be religiously offered to St. Olof, in the cathedral where his relics were deposited, by the bishops, abbots, and twelve chieftains from each diocese, who were to nominate the successor with the advice and consent of their primate. Thus taking advantage of the incessant contentions for the sovereignty by which the country was agitated and disturbed, the Romish primate secured for the see of Trondheim a perpetual control over the future choice of the Norwegian monarchs. The crown was now declared an ecclesiastical fief, and the government almost converted into a hierarchy.

A young adventurer named Sverre seized on the crown of Norway, and his title was ratified by the sword as well as by the general acquiescence of the nation. The primate, however, refused to perform the usual ceremony of coronation, and fearing the royal displeasure, fled to Denmark. Thence he transmitted an appeal to Rome, in consequence of which the Pope launched the thunders of the Vatican against Sverre, threatening him with excommunication unless he instantly desisted from his hostile measures against the primate. The sovereign having been educated for the priesthood, was well skilled both in canon law and ecclesiastical, and he found no difficulty, therefore, in showing both from Scripture and the decrees of councils, that the Pope had no right to interfere in such disputes between kings and their subjects. Anxious for peace, however, Sverre applied for a papal legate to perform the ceremony of his coronation, but was refused. The king was indignant at this proceeding on the part of Rome, and reproaching the Romish ambassador with duplicity, ordered him forthwith to leave his dominions. As a last resource the enraged monarch summoned together the prelates, and caused himself to be crowned by Bishop Nicholas, who had been elected through his influence; but the proceeding was condemned by Pope Alexander III., who excommunicated both the royal and the clerical offender. Deputies were soon after despatched to Rome, who succeeded in obtaining a papal absolution for the king; but on their return they were detained in Denmark, where they suddenly died, having previously pledged the papal bull to raise money for the payment of their expenses. The important document thus found its way into the hands of Sverre, who read it publicly in the cathedral of Trondheim, alleging that the deputies had been poisoned by his enemies.

The whole transaction seemed not a little suspicious; the Norwegian king was charged by the Pope with having forged the bull, and procured the death of the messengers; and on the ground of this accusation the kingdom was laid under an interdict, the churches were ordered to be shut, and the sacraments forbidden to be dispensed. Bishop Nicholas now abandoned the king, whose cause he had so warmly espoused, fled to the primate in Denmark, and there raising a considerable army invaded Norway, but Sverre, aided by a body of troops sent from England by King John, succeeded in defeating the rebels. The king did not long survive this victory, but worn out by the harassing contests to which for a quarter of a century he had been subjected, he was cut off at the age of fifty-one.

It had for a long time been the evident tendency of the government of Norway to assume the form of a sacerdotal and feudal aristocracy. This tendency, however, was arrested to some extent by the first princes of the house of Sverre, who asserted the rights of the monarch against the encroachments of the clergy and the nobles. But it was more difficult to contend with the Romish see, which has often been able to accomplish more by secret machinations than in open warfare. While affecting to renounce the right with which the archbishop of Trondheim had been invested of controlling the choice of the monarch on every vacancy, the papal church induced the crown to confirm the spiritual jurisdiction of the prelates with all the ecclesiastical endowments, even to the exclusion of lay founders from their rights of patronage. The prelates were allowed to coin money, and maintain a regular body-guard of one hundred armed men for the archbishop, and forty for each bishop. One concession was followed by another, and the archbishop of Trondheim, taking advantage of the youth and inexperience of Erik, son of Magnus Hakonson, who ascended the throne at the age of thirteen, extorted from him at his coronation an oath, that he would render the church independent of the secular authority. Having gained this point, the artful primate proceeded to act upon it by publishing an edict imposing new fines for offences against the canons of the church. The king's advisers refused to sanction this bold step taken by the primate; and to vindicate his spiritual authority, he excommunicated the royal counsellors. The king in turn banished the primate, who forthwith set out for Rome to lay his case before the Pope. When on his way home again he died in Sweden, and his successor having acknowledged himself the vassal of Erik, the contest was terminated, and the pretensions of the clergy reduced within more reasonable limits.

In the commencement of the fifteenth century the three kingdoms of Norway, Denmark, and Sweden were united under one sovereign, and this union of Calmar, as it was called, existed nominally at least from 1397 to 1523, during which long period there was an incessant struggle for superiority between the crown and the clergy. So harassing were the repeated encroachments of the Romish hierarchy, that the Reformation was gladly welcomed as likely to weaken the power and abridge the prerogatives of the Popes. Many of the Norwegian youth had studied at Wittemberg and other German universities, where they had imbibed the doctrines and principles of the Reformers, and on their return home they found both rulers and people ready to embrace the reformed faith. But what tended chiefly to facilitate the progress of the Reformation in Norway was the election of Christian III. to the throne by the lay aristocracy of the kingdom. Having himself been educated in the Protestant faith, his accession was violently opposed by the archbishop of Trondheim and the other Romish prelates. The zeal of the monarch, however, was only quickened the more by the opposition of the clergy, and he resolved to introduce the reformed worship as the religion of the state. "A recess was accordingly passed and signed by more than four hundred nobles, with the deputies of the commons, providing, 1. That the temporal and spiritual power of the bishops should be for ever taken away, and the administration of their dioceses confided to learned men of the reformed faith, under the title of superintendents. 2. That the castles, manors, and other lands belonging to the prelates and monasteries, should be annexed to the crown. 3. That their religious houses should be reformed; the regular clergy who might not choose to be secularized, to be allowed to remain in their respective cloisters, upon condition that they should hear the word of God, lead edifying lives, and that their surplus revenues should be devoted to the support of hospitals and other eleemosynary establishments. 4. That the rights of lay patronage should be preserved; the clergy to exact from the peasants only their regular tithe, one-third of which should be appropriated to the support of the curate, one-third to the proprietor of the church, and the remainder to the king, for the use of the university and schools of learning. The king consulted Luther upon the manner of carrying this recess into effect, and by his advice, instead of secularizing the church-property, he reserved a certain portion for the maintenance of the Protestant worship, and the purposes of education and charity; but a large part of the ecclesiastical lands ultimately came into the possession of the nobility, by successive grants from the crown. Thus fell the Romish hierarchy in Denmark and Norway; and its destruction marked the epoch of the complete triumph of the lay aristocracy over the other orders of the state, which they continued to enjoy until the revolution of 1660."

The cause of the Reformation met with little opposition in Norway, but from the reign of Christian III. it continued to hold its ground, and to diffuse itself among all classes of the people with the most gratifying rapidity. The church was strictly Lutheran, and though nominally episcopal, the bishops were vested only with the power of superintendents. Matters went on smoothly without the occurrence of any peculiar event to disturb the ordinary course of things. But towards the end of last century, a remarkable person arose, who has earned for himself the honourable appellation of the Norwegian Reformer. Hans Nielson Hauge, the person to whom we refer, was the son of a peasant, and born near Frederickstadt in the year 1771. From his boyhood he manifested a serious disposition, often singing, while engaged in the labours of the field, portions of the psalms and hymns of the authorized Danish version, which are in current use in the Church of Norway. One day in the year 1795, while he was working in the field, and singing from the Danish psalm book the hymn beginning, "Jesus, thy sweet communion to taste," he felt himself all at once undergo a complete internal change, his heart and soul were lifted up to the Lord, he was without consciousness, and to use his own strong language, he was "beside himself." From this moment he formed the resolution to engage publicly in the Lord's service. He heard as it were a voice saying to him, "Thou shalt make known my name before men. Exhort them that they may be converted, and seek me while I am to be found." He felt that this inward call was from the Lord. Throwing aside therefore the spade and the plough, he entered upon the work of an evangelist; preaching the gospel from one end of Norway to the other. Everywhere he was gladly welcomed and eagerly listened to. Through his eloquent and powerful appeals many were aroused from a state of spiritual torpor, and led with the most earnest anxiety to seek after the way of eternal life.

While Hauge was thus labouring zealously in the cause of Christ, a spirit of opposition arose which exposed him to much annoyance and trouble. Several times he was rudely seized when preaching, and committed to prison, but was always speedily liberated. And in addition to occasional persecution from without, he was also liable to frequent fits of mental depression and discouragement. Still he continued to preach the gospel both in season and out of season. Nor did he limit his labours to preaching; he wrote also numerous treatises on religious subjects, which became exceedingly popular, and were well fitted from the simplicity of their language, and the devotional spirit by which they were pervaded, not only to enlighten the minds, but to affect the hearts of his followers. While thus unwearied in preaching and writing for the good of souls, he earned a subsistence for himself by following the occupation of a merchant or storekeeper in Bergen, and by diligence, prudence, and economy, he realized a tolerable income.

An intelligent writer, who himself travelled in Norway in 1829, gives the following description of Hauge's career as a reformer: "Hauge was not a dissenter from the established Lutheran church of Norway. Neither in his preaching nor his writings did he teach any difference of doctrine. He enforced purer views of Christian morality, while he taught at the same time the doctrines of the church. He called for no change of opinion or of established faith, but for better lives and more Christian practice among both clergy and laity. And he taught only the doctrines of the church, casting out the fables and wicked imaginings of men—lifting up his voice against the coldness, the selfishness, the worldliness, and the scepticism of the clergy—for even into Norway neology had made its way, though it has never had such a hold upon the whole church as in the sister country, Denmark. His followers called themselves Uprækte—unawakened, and esteemed themselves members of the Congregation of Saints. But they never called themselves, nor were esteemed, dissenters; they professed the doctrines of the church—from the sinful slumbers and negligence of which they had come out and separated themselves. They met, it is true, to hear their favourite preacher, and occasionally by themselves for religious purposes in the open air, or in private dwellings, but they did not on that account withdraw themselves from the communion of the church. They were, and are in fact, a kind of Methodists, such as the Methodists were before they constituted themselves a separate body, with separate places of worship. At the same time, it is probable that had circumstances been favourable, they might have become a regular dissenting body. Had the laws and circumstances of Norway been such as those of England and Scotland when Wesley and Erskine laid the foundation of the two leading sects in these countries, the Haugeaners—for by this name they are generally distinguished in Norway—had probably long ago separated from the church. But the law forbids the establishment of conventicles, and though it did not, the Norwegians are too poor to support any dissenting clergy.

"But though the law expressly forbids the dissemination of strange opinions, yet the paternal government of Denmark showed much lenity towards the reformer and his followers. Though much spoken against, yet to those who could see through the mists of prejudice, it was evident he was doing much good—at once awakening the people and arousing the clergy. But enthusiasm is not suited to every mind, and where sound discretion is wanting, none but evil consequences can follow its manifestation. Hauge had stirred up many men, and while he had awakened zeal, he had failed in imparting knowledge enough to direct it. His followers broke out into most ridiculous and sinful excesses, and the blame of all was naturally thrown upon him. In 1804 he visited a meeting of the brethren at Christiansfeldt, and he found there that he could not stop the stone he had set in motion—he could still impart to it new velocity, but he could not restrain its aberrations. The extravagance to which he was there a witness, and the reports which reached him from other quarters, probably contributed more to chasten his own enthusiasm, and to lead him to the adoption of more prudent and less exciting means of reformation, than the legal measures which were speedily instituted against him.

"Among the more extraordinary proceedings of his followers, were the methods they adopted for driving out the devil, the results of which were occasionally wounding, maiming, and death. Such extravagancies cannot appear incredible to those who have heard of the proceedings of the higher classes of Methodists no farther back than five-and-twenty or thirty years. The driving out of the devil was a familiar operation among them. It was the same in manner and kind with the delusion in Norway; it differed only in degree.

"But such outrages could not be permitted: the conservation of the public peace, and of the lives of the people, called upon the government to interfere. Inquiries were instituted, and Hauge was arrested. This event took place in October 1804. The affair was delegated to an especial commission in Christiania. The reformer could not be accused of any direct accession to the outrages of his followers; but the prejudice was strong against him, and he was arraigned upon two charges: first, for holding assemblies for divine worship, without lawful appointment; and, second, for teaching error, and contempt of the established instructors. Nine years had elapsed since he began his career, during which he had suffered much, and undergone much persecution. The matter was now tried and decided, and he was condemned to hard labour in the fortresses for two years, and to pay all the expenses. This sentence was afterwards commuted in the supreme court to a fine of a thousand dollars.

"With this decision ended the public life of Hauge. All persecution ceased, and his mind became calmer; his continual anxiety, his itinerancies, and his preachings ceased. He lived peaceable, pious, and respected by all;—a man of blameless life and unimpeachable integrity. Though he no longer went about preaching, he still kept up a close communication with his followers; and he probably did as much real good during his retirement as during the years of his more active life. He confirmed by advice and example the lessons he had formerly taught; and the great moral influence which his strenuous preaching exercised upon the clergy did not cease even with his death. He lived nearly twenty years after the period of his trial, and died so late as the 24th of March 1824."

The effect of his labours as a Christian reformer is still felt in Norway. His followers, called after his name Haugeaner, are found in every part of the country, and form a body of men held in high esteem for their peaceable dispositions and their pious lives. Remaining still in communion with the church, the influence of their example is extensively felt, and the effect upon the religious character of the people at large is everywhere acknowledged to be of a most beneficial description.

The political connexion which, ever since the union of Calmar, had subsisted between Norway and Denmark, was brought to a close in 1814, Bernadotte, king of Sweden, having received Norway in compensation for the loss of Finland. The Norwegians complained loudly against this compulsory transference; yet it was no small advantage which accrued from this change of political relations, that they regained the free constitution of which Denmark had deprived them. The Norwegians are a noble people. In hospitality, benevolence, and incorruptible integrity they are unrivalled. Their love of country is strong; their simplicity patriarchal. The established religion is the Lutheran; and the form of church government episcopal. Jews are altogether prohibited from settling in Norway. "The church establishment comprises, according to Thaarup, 5 bishops, 49 deans, and about 417 pastors of churches and chapels. The seats of the episcopal sees are Christiania, Christiansand, Bergen, Trondheim, and Norrland or Alstahoug; the latter was erected about the beginning of the present century, and is only remarkable as being the most northerly bishopric in Europe. There are 336 prestegilds or parishes, many of them of large extent, containing from 5,000 to 10,000 inhabitants, and requiring four or five separate churches or chapels. The incomes of the bishops may be reckoned about 4,000 dollars (£850), and of the rural clergy from 800 to 1,600 (£170 to £340). The sources from which they are derived are, a small assessment of grain in lieu of tithes from each farm,—Easter and Christmas offerings,—and dues for marriages, christenings, and funerals, which are pretty high. There are fair-prices as in Scotland, by which payments in grain may be converted into money. In every prestegild there are several farms, besides the glebe, which belong to the living, and are let for a share of the produce, or at a small yearly rent, and a fine at each renewal. One of these is appropriated to the minister's widow, as a kind of life-annuity. The Norwegian clergy are a well-informed body of men, possessing much influence over their flocks, conscientious in the discharge of their duties, and diligent in superintending the interests of education."

Since the separation of Norway from Denmark and its annexation to Sweden, the Norwegian Church has continued to adhere to the constitution of the Danish Lutheran Church as settled by Christian V. in 1683, and also to the Danish ritual as laid down in 1685. But efforts have been put forth from time to time to get some alterations brought about. So recently as 1857 there was a proposal made in the Storting for the establishment of a parish council, consisting of the clergyman of the parish and a certain number of laymen chosen from the communicants or members of the church. Hitherto the whole management of ecclesiastical matters belonged to the government, and in certain cases to the bishop or to the probst. The proposed alteration was only rejected by a small majority; and will, in all probability, yet become the law of the land, thus admitting the lay element into the government of the church. The election of clergymen is vested, in the first instance, in the ecclesiastical minister of state, who, with the advice of the bishop, selects three candidates, from whom the king appoints one to the vacant parish. A bishop is elected by the probsts in the vacant bishopric, and the choice made must receive the royal sanction. The clergy consist of three orders, bishops, probsts, and priests, differing from each other not in rank, but in official duty. The priest is required to preach, to administer the sacraments, to dispense confirmation, and to preside at the board which in every parish manages the poor-fund. The probst, who is also a priest or clergyman of a parish, is bound, in addition to the discharge of his ordinary clerical duties, to make an annual visitation and inspection of the different parishes within his circuit, to examine the children in the different schools, and also the candidates for confirmation, to inspect the church records, and all the ecclesiastical affairs of the parish. Of all these things the probst must render a regular report every year to the bishop. The bishops, of whom there are five in Norway, are required to visit their bishoprics with the utmost regularity, but from the large number of parishes under the superintendence of each bishop, he can only visit the whole in the course of three years. At the visitation of the bishop all the children attending school assemble in church to be examined along with the candidates for confirmation, and those young people who have been confirmed since the last visitation.

The ceremony of confirmation is performed in the Norwegian church by the minister of the parish, once or twice a-year. The ordination of a clergyman belongs exclusively to the bishop, but it is not considered as communicating any special gifts or graces. The induction of the priest or clergyman is performed by the probst. Students of theology, after attending a university for a certain time, are allowed to preach, although they may not have completed their studies. The church of Norway combines with the holy ordinance of the Lord's Supper the practice of absolution. The power to absolve is not considered to belong to the clergyman as an individual, but to be vested in the church in whose name the forgiveness of sins is pronounced. Absolution then, according to this view, is not a power given to the clergy, but to the church or body of believers which is represented by the clergy. Before the act of absolution a sermon is preached, the object of which is to prevent any other than true penitents from applying for absolution. The rite itself is thus performed. The penitents kneel before the altar, and the clergyman laying his hands on their heads, utters these words, "I promise you the precious forgiveness of all your sins, in the name of God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost." Having received the absolution, the penitents retire to their seats, and a hymn is sung, at the close of which the clergyman chants the words of the institution of the Holy Supper, the congregation again kneeling before the altar, and now the elements are distributed.

The inner life of the Church of Norway has been not a little affected by the founding of the university at Christiania in 1811, and the separation of the country from Denmark in 1814. Before these two noted events, the clergy were uniformly educated at the university of Copenhagen, where German rationalism prevailed to a melancholy extent. Dunes were frequently appointed to the pastoral charge of parishes, to the great annoyance of the people, who were most unwilling to receive their ministrations. But from the time that the Norwegian students of theology had the privilege of attending their own national university, a new life seemed to be infused into them, and from that era may be dated the dawn of a true spiritual light in the church of Norway. Two excellent men, Hersleb and Stenersen, disciples of the celebrated Danish theologian Grundtvig, exercised a very favourable influence over the theological students. Hauge also, both by his sermons and his printed treatises, had done much to revive true religion among the people; and the Haugeans being allowed perfect freedom of worship, have spread themselves over a great part of the country, and are recognized, wherever they are found, as a quiet, inoffensive, pious people.

It is an important feature in the Norwegian church at the present time, that a large number of both the clergy and laity are disciples of the Danish theologian Grundtvig, and hence receive the name of Grundtvigians. Not that they are dissenters from the Lutheran church, but they entertain peculiar opinions on several points of doctrine, somewhat analogous to those of the High Churchmen in the Church of England. They hold, for example, that the act of ordination conveys peculiar gifts and graces, and hence maintain very strong views as to the sacredness of the clergy as distinguished from the laity. They hold high opinions as to the value of tradition, and attach a very great importance to the Apostles' Creed, which they regard as inspired. In regard to many portions of Scripture, they are doubtful as to their inspiration, but they have no doubt as to the inspiration of the Creed, and that it contains enough for our salvation. Accordingly, they are accustomed to address to the people such words as these, "Believe in the words in which you are baptized; if you do, your soul is saved." They consider the Bible a useful, and even a necessary book for the clergy; but a dangerous book for laymen. They hold a very singular opinion as to the importance of "the living words," and maintain that the word preached has quite a different effect from the word read. They even go so far as to declare that faith cannot possibly come by reading, and must come by hearing, referring in proof of their statement to Rom. x. 14. Even in the schools which happen to be in charge of Grundtvigians, we find this principle carried into operation, everything whatever being taught by the living voice of a schoolmaster, and not by a written book. Grundtvig, the founder of this class of theologians, is still alive, residing at Copenhagen, and officiating as preacher in an hospital for old women. He is the head of a large body of disciples, not only in Norway, but to a still greater extent in Denmark. Many of the most learned clergymen in both countries belong to this school, though not all of them carrying their opinions so far as the old poet and enthusiast Grundtvig himself. The veteran theologian, now upwards of seventy years of age, is still in the full vigour of his intellectual powers, and edits with great freshness and energy a weekly paper, in which he advocates his peculiar opinions with the most remarkable success. Grundtvig, along with the excellent Bishop Munster of Copenhagen, has done great service to the cause of truth by his able assaults upon the Rationalism of Germany.

NOTARICON, one of the three principal branches of the literal CABBALA (which see). It is a term borrowed from the Romans, among whom the notarii, notaries, or short-hand writers, were accustomed to use single letters to signify whole words. Notaricon, among the Cabalistic Jews, is twofold: sometimes one word is formed from the initial or final letters of two or more words; and sometimes the letters of one word are taken as the initials of so many other words, and the words so collected are deemed faithful expositions of some of the meanings of a particular text. Thus in Deut. xxx. 12, Moses asks, "Who shall go up for us to heaven?" The initial letters of the original words form the Hebrew word for circumcision, and the final letters compose the word Jehovah. Hence it is inferred that God gave circumcision as the way to heaven.

NOTARY, the term used in the ancient Christian church to denote the scribe or secretary of a deliberative assembly, or the clerk of a court. It was particularly his duty to record the protocols of synods, and the doings of councils. He was also required to write the memoirs of such as suffered martyrdom. The Notary frequently acted the part of a modern secretary of legation, and was often employed by bishops and patriarchs in exercising supervision over remote parts of their dioceses. Notaries were sometimes engaged to write down the discourses of some of the most eloquent and famous preachers. In this way many of the sermons of St. Chrysostom were preserved. The term Notary was used in the ninth century to denote special officers among the PAULICIANS (which see), who seem to have been employed in transcribing those original documents which served as sources of knowledge to the sect. "It was a principle," Neander tells us, "with the Paulicians, that all might be enabled, under the immediate illumination of the Divine Spirit, to draw knowledge from the pure fountain of Christ's own doctrine; and the interpretation of Scripture was probably one of the duties of these Notaries or writers."

NOTUS. See AUSTER.

NOVATIANS, a Christian sect which arose in the third century, deriving its name from Novatian, a presbyter in the church at Rome, who held strong views on the subject of church discipline. This man, who had acquired celebrity as a theological writer, maintained that such as had fallen into the more heinous sins, and especially those who had denied Christ during the Decian persecution, ought never to be admitted again into the fellowship of the church. The prevailing opinion, however, which was shared by Cornelius, a man of great influence, was in favour of a more lenient course. Accordingly, in A. D. 250, when it was proposed to elect Cornelius bishop of Rome, it was strenuously opposed by Novatian. Cornelius, however, was chosen, and Novatian withdrew from communion with him. In the following year a council was held at Rome, when Novatian was excommunicated along with all who adhered to him. This led to a schism, and through the active influence of Novatus, a presbyter of Carthage, who had fled to Rome during the heat of this controversy, Novatian was compelled by his party to accept the office of bishop in opposition to Cornelius.

A controversy was now carried on with great keenness, and both parties, as was usual in such cases of dispute, sought to secure on their side the verdict of the great metropolitan churches at Alexandria, Antioch, and Carthage, and both sent delegates to these communities. The Novatian schism was founded on two points, the first relating to the lawfulness or unlawfulness of readmitting heinous transgressors, even though professedly penitent, to church fellowship; and the second relating to the question, What constitutes the idea and essence of a true church? On the first point the Novatians held, that the church has no right to grant absolution to any one who by mortal sin has trifled away the pardon obtained for him by Christ, and appropriated to him by baptism. With regard to the second point, the Novatians maintained that one of the essential marks of a true church being purity and holiness, every church which tolerated in its bosom, or readmitted within its communion heinous transgressors, had, by that very act, forfeited the name and the privileges of a true Christian church. Hence the Novatians, regarding themselves as the only pure church, called themselves Catharists or Cathari, pure. In accordance with their peculiar views they insisted on baptizing anew those Christians who joined their communion. The milder view of church discipline obtained the ascendancy, and the Novatians, though they continued to flourish for a long time in different parts of Christendom, disappeared in the sixth century.

NOVENA, a term used in the Church of Rome to denote nine days spent in devotional exercises on any special occasion.

NOVENDIALE (Lat. novem, nine, and dies, a day), a festival lasting for nine days, celebrated among the ancient Romans, when stones fell from heaven. It was first instituted by Tullus Hostilius. The word was also applied to the sacrifice which was offered among the Romans at the close of the nine days devoted to mourning and the solemnities connected with the dead. The heathen practice now referred to, with the exception of the sacrifices, seems to have been continued long after the introduction of Christianity. Augustine speaks of some in his time who observed a novendiale in relation to their dead, which he thinks ought to be forbidden as being merely a heathen custom.

NOVENSILES DEI, nine gods alleged to have belonged to the ancient Etruscans, and to have been allowed by Jupiter to hurl his thunder. The name seems to have been afterwards employed among the Romans to denote those gods who were introduced at Rome from any place which had been conquered.

NOVICE, one who has entered a religious house, but not yet taken the vow.

NOVITIATE, the time spent in a monastery or nunnery by way of trial before taking the vow.

NOVITIOLI, a name applied by Tertullian to CATECHUMENS (which see), because they were just entering upon that state which made them candidates for eternal life.

NOVOJENTZI, a sect of dissenters from the RUSSO-GREEK CHURCH (which see), who are strongly in favour of marriage in opposition to those who prefer a life of celibacy.

NOX. See NYX.

NUDIPEDALIA (Lat. nudus, bare, and pes, pedis, a foot), a procession and ceremonies observed at Rome in case of drought, in which the worshippers walked with bare feet in token of mourning and humiliation before the gods. This practice was followed at Rome in the worship of Cybele, and seems also to have been adopted in the worship of Isis.

NULLATENENSES (Lat. nullatenus, nowhere), an epithet applied to bishops, according to some ecclesiastical writers, who were ordained over no particular charge, but with a general authority to preach the gospel whenever they had it in their power. Such bishops were very rare in the primitive church.

NUMERIA, a goddess among the ancient Romans who was wont to be invoked by women in childbirth.

NUN, a female secluded from the world in a nunnery under a vow of perpetual chastity. The age at which novices may make their profession differs in different countries, but the rule laid down by the council of Trent only requires that the party should be of the age of sixteen, and that no females should take the veil without previous examination by the bishop. The following description of the ceremonial of a novice taking the vows is from the pen of an eye-witness of the scene as it took place in Rome: "By particular favour we had been furnished with billets for the best seats, and, after waiting about half an hour, two footmen in rich liveries made way for the young countess, who entered the crowded church in full dress, her dark hair blazing with diamonds. Supported by her mother she advanced to the altar. The officiating priest was the Cardinal Vicario, a fine-looking old man; the discourse from the pulpit was pronounced by a Dominican monk, who addressed her as the affianced spouse of Christ,—a saint on earth, one who had renounced the vanities of the world for a foretaste of the joys of heaven.

"The sermon ended, the lovely victim herself, kneeling before the altar at the feet of the Cardinal, solemnly abjured that world whose pleasures and affections she seemed so well calculated to enjoy, and pronounced those vows which severed her from them for ever.

"As her voice, in soft recitative, chaunted these fatal words, I believe there was scarcely an eye in the whole of that vast church unmoistened by tears.

"The diamonds that sparkled in her dark hair were taken off, and her long and beautiful tresses fell luxuriantly down her shoulders.

"The grate that was to entomb her was opened. The abbess and her black train of nuns appeared. Their choral voices chaunted a strain of welcome. It said, or seemed to say—'Sister spirit, come away!'

She renounced her name and title, adopted a new appellation, received the solemn benediction of the Cardinal, and the last embraces of her weeping friends, and passed into that bourne from whence she was never to return.

"A pannel behind the high altar now opened, and she appeared at the grate again. Here she was despoiled of her ornaments and her splendid attire, her beautiful hair was mercilessly severed from her head by the fatal shears of the sisters, and they hastened to invest her with the sober robes of the nun—the white coif and the novice veil.

"Throughout the whole ceremony she showed great calmness and firmness; and it was not till all was over that her eyes were moistened with tears of natural emotion. She afterwards appeared at the little postern-gate of the convent, to receive the sympathy, and praise, and congratulations of all her friends and acquaintances, nay, even of strangers, all of whom are expected to pay their compliments to the new spouse of heaven."

The description now given refers to the first profession of a nun on the taking of the white veil, a step which forms the commencement of the noviciate or year of trial, and is not irrevocable. But the profession properly so called, or the taking of the black veil, is the conclusion of the noviciate, and the commencement of the regular life of the professed nun. When once this ceremony has been gone through, the step, both in the eye of the Romish church and in the eye of the civil law in Roman Catholic countries, is beyond recall. The individual who has taken the black veil is a recluse for life, and can only be released from her vow by death. The ceremony which thus seals the nun's doom for life is attended, of course, with peculiar solemnity and interest. We give a graphic account of it from the pen of the Rev. Hobart Seymour as contained in his 'Pilgrimage to Rome': "There was mass celebrated on the occasion for a small congregation; the three priests were robed in cloth of gold; their vestments were singularly rich, there being nothing visible but gold. Beyond this, there was nothing remarkable but the age of the officiating priest. His two assistants were men of about thirty-five years of age, while he himself was not more than twenty-five. He was a fine young man, and seemed deeply impressed with the awful mysteries in which he was engaged. If the destined nun had been the dear and cherished idol of his heart of hearts from his first love till this moment, he could not have shown deeper or more devotional feelings; and I could not but feel prepossessed by his manner; though I thought it strange, that one so young in years should have been selected on so public an occasion for the chaplaincy of a nunnery.

"The mass ended: the priests retired; the cardinal arrived. The moment he was announced as at the doors of the chapel, the novice, who was about to assume the black veil, appeared as by a miracle over the altar. To understand this it is necessary to observe, that the picture over the altar was removed, and there appeared a grating behind it; it proved an opening to an inner chapel within the interior of the monastery. This, I confess, did startle me a little, it showed that these sacred pictures are sometimes secret doors, the very last things that should be desired in a nunnery; it suggested strange thoughts. At this grating, however, there knelt a living novice, a young female of about eighteen; she was dressed as a novice; the white veil was thrown back; her face was open to view; she held a lighted candle in one hand; she had a black crucifix with a white figure on her other arm; her eyes were fixed immovably on this crucifix. And as she knelt in that elevated place above the altar, visible to every eye, a living nun in all the reality of flesh and blood, in the fulness of youth, instead of the mere pictured representation usually presented there—as she then knelt with her veil, her candle, her crucifix, and all the perspective of an inner chapel behind her, with its groined roof, and its adorned and crimson hangings in the distance—as she there knelt to take the great and final step, which nothing but death could ever retrace, she became the object of universal sympathy, and the centre on which every eye was turned.

“The cardinal entered—passed to the altar—made his private devotions, and, taking no more notice of the novice kneeling over the altar, than if she were the mere picture usually there, he seated himself, while his attendants stripped him of his cardinal’s robe of scarlet, as is usual, and proceeded in the presence of the congregation to robe him in his episcopal vestments. He soon appeared with the mitre upon his brow, his shepherd’s crook in his hand, and his whole person enveloped in silver tissue set off by trimmings and fringes of gold. He sat with his back to the altar.

“After the Cardinal had thus completed his toilet in the presence of the congregation, the confessor of the monastery approached him—kissed his hand—took a chair, and seating himself, addressed the novice on the step she was about to take. He told her it was meritorious—that by it she was about to be wedded to her most loved and loving husband whom she had chosen, even to Jesus Christ—that in taking this step she was preserving her virgin state, making herself like the angels of heaven—and that when she died she would be worthy of Paradise. The whole address seemed that of a kindly-natured man, very much like the amiable, warm-hearted father of a family; but going throughout on the assumption that the interior of a nunnery was the only spot in our creation where female innocence and purity could be preserved! He was apparently a man of quiet mind, and full of good nature and good humour. He seemed under forty years of age, and considering he was younger than myself, and withal an unmarried man, I thought him rather too young to be the confessor of a nunnery. St. Paul recommends us to ‘provide things honest in the sight of all men.’

“After this address, the Cardinal knelt and prayed. The novice rose from her knees and disappeared. The choir executed some fine music and singing. The Cardinal chanted some petitions. The choir chanted some responses. The Cardinal then again knelt and offered a long prayer.

“As he was uttering the concluding words of his prayer, there mingled with his voice the tones of distant music. It came from the depths of the monastery, where the sisterhood commenced some chant that at first was softened and sweetened by distance, and then slowly grew loud and more loud as the nuns moved through the interior chapel. From the position where I stood, I could see all the upper but not the lower part of this chapel. I was able also to see the crucifix and other decorations over its altar, but not being able to see the lower part of the chapel I could not look on the nuns, but was obliged to content myself by listening to their voices as they sung some litany, and slowly approached us. The effect of this was very pleasing, perhaps the more so from the voices being the voices of the unseen and unknown, over whose story there hangs and will hang a veil of mystery for ever. They approached the back of the altar of the chapel where we were assembled. Immediately the novice appeared again over the altar, her white veil or shawl flung back and drooping on her shoulders, her left arm supporting a crucifix, her right hand grasping a lighted candle. She knelt as before, as still and motionless as if she were no more than the picture, whose place she occupied. Beside her stood two nuns, one on each side, concealed or rather intended to be concealed from view. They wore the black veil. She then chanted a few words. The bishop rose, and he and the novice then chanted some questions and answers which I could not understand. She then disappeared, and again appeared at a side-door, where the Cardinal approached, spoke to her, touched her, sprinkled holy water and returned to his place. The priests and officials crowded around the Cardinal and novice, so that it was impossible to see, and all was uttered in a tone so low that it was impossible to hear. The whole time did not exceed two or three minutes, when she again presented herself on her knees at the grating over the altar, no longer a novice in the white veil, but a nun in the black veil—a recluse and prisoner for life!

“After kneeling for a moment she uttered a few words in a low tone, so that I could not catch their import. The Cardinal immediately rose and chanted certain short orisons or petitions, which were responded to by the nuns. He chanted in the outer and they in the inner chapel. This was succeeded by some music; during the continuance of which, the Cardinal knelt before the altar, and the nun above it. At its conclusion the Cardinal rose and read an address or exhortation, and immediately the scene was changed. The two nuns, who had concealed themselves till now, presented themselves suddenly, standing one on each side of the kneeling nun. It was one of those scenes that lay hold of the imagination, and it had a striking effect. The two nuns, veiled so closely that their own mothers, if present, could not have recognised them, placed a crown of gold upon the head of their new and kneeling companion. She, though wearing the black veil, had it thrown back, or rather so arranged as to leave her face open to view, falling from her head gracefully upon her shoulders. Over this they placed the crown. It was composed of sprigs and wreaths of gold; it was light and elegant. They spoke not a word, but they placed the crown on her head with considerable care, sparing neither time nor trouble to make it sit well and becomingly. It was done, as these two nuns stood veiled, silent and motionless—as the new recluse remained kneeling, holding a candle in one hand, having a crucifix resting on the other, her black veil parted so as to reveal her face, her crown of gold upon her head—as these three figures appeared at the grating, elevated above the altar so that every eye could see them, and as the fatal reality pressed on the mind that from that moment they were hopelessly immured for life, they presented a scene that will be remembered for ever by all who witnessed it.

"The service continued for a few moments longer. The Cardinal sprinkled some holy water towards the nun, offered a prayer and pronounced the benediction. The two nuns withdrew their new sister into the recesses of the monastery, and the congregation dispersed."

Nuns have been found in connection with other religions besides Romanism. In the commencement of Buddhism there was an order of female recluses. The first Buddhist female admitted to profession was the foster-mother of Gotama Budha. It is probable, however, in the opinion of Mr. Hardy, that this part of the Buddhist system was at length discontinued. There are at present no female recluses in Ceylon. The priestesses or nuns in Burmah are called Thilashen; they are far less numerous than the priests. They shave their heads, and wear a garment of a particular form, generally of a white colour. They live in humble dwellings close to the monasteries, and may quit their profession whenever they please. The nuns in Siam are less numerous than in Burmah. The nuns in Aracan are said to be equal in number to the priests, have similar dresses, and are subjected to the same rules of discipline. In China the nuns have their heads entirely shaven, and their principal garment is a loose flowing robe. The Japanese nuns are called Bikuni (which see). They wear no particular dress, but shave their heads, and cover them with caps or hoods of black silk. They commonly have a shepherd's rod or crook in their hands.

Nuns are found in some of the ancient religions.

Among the followers of Pythagoras, there was an order of females, the charge of whom was committed to his daughter. The Druids admitted females into their sacred order. (See DRUIDSSES.) The priestesses of the Saxon goddess Frigga, who were usually kings' daughters, devoted themselves to perpetual virginity.

At an early period in the history of the Christian church, virginity came to be unduly exalted, and from the writings of some of the fathers, it would appear that there were virgins who made an open profession of virginity before monasteries were erected for their reception, which was only in the fourth century. We find "canonical virgins," and "virgins of the church," recognized by Tertullian and Cyprian. The ecclesiastical virgins were commonly enrolled in the canon or matricula of the church, and they were distinguished from monastic virgins after monasteries came to be erected, by living privately in the houses of their parents, while the others lived in communities and upon their own labour. Hence it is evident that the nonne or nuns of the first ages were not confined to a cloister as in after times. At first they do not appear to have been bound by any special vow, but in the fourth and fifth centuries the censures of the church were passed with great severity against such professed virgins as afterwards married. No attempt, however, was made to deny the validity of such marriages, the nun being simply excommunicated and subjected to penance, with the view of being restored to the communion of the church. The imperial laws forbade a virgin to be consecrated before the mature age of forty, and even if she married after her consecration at that age, the marriage was considered as valid.

The consecration of a virgin in the ancient Christian church was performed by the bishop publicly in the church, by putting upon her the accustomed dress of sacred virgins. This seems to have consisted partly of a veil of a peculiar description, different from the common veil.

Optatus mentions a golden fillet or mitre as having been worn upon the head. It is also referred to by Eusebius under the name of a coronet. Various customs have since been introduced in connection with nuns in the Romish church, which were unknown in the case of virgins in the ancient Christian church, such as the tonsure, and the ceremony of a ring and a bracelet at their consecration. The persons of holy virgins were anciently accounted sacred; and severe laws were made against any that should presume to offer violence to them; banishment and proscription and death were the ordinary punishments of such offenders. Constantine maintained the sacred virgins and widows at the public expense; and his mother Helena counted it an honour to wait upon them at her own table. The church assigned them also a share of the ecclesiastical revenues, and set apart a particular place for them in the house of God.

NUNC DIMITTIS (Lat. Now lettest thou depart), a name given to the song of Simeon from the first words of it in Latin, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace according to thy word, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." It appears to have been used in public worship, in very ancient times, as it is found in the Apostolical Constitutions. It is appointed to be used in the Rubric of the Church of England after the second lesson at evening-song.

NUNCIO, an ambassador from the Pope to some Roman Catholic prince or state. Sometimes he is deputed to appear as the Pope's representative at a congress or diplomatic assembly. In France he appears simply as an ambassador, but in other Romish countries he has a jurisdiction and may appoint judges. See LEGATE.

NUNDINA, an ancient Roman goddess, who took her name from the ninth day after children were born.

NUNDINÆ, public fairs or markets held among the ancient Romans every ninth day. At first they were reckoned among the FERIÆ (which see), but subsequently they were ranked by law among the Dies Fusti, for the convenience of country people, that they might be enabled both to vend their wares in the public market, and to have their disputes settled by the Prætor.

NUNNERY, a building appropriated to female recluses. Pachomius was the first who, in the beginning of the fourth century, founded cloisters of nuns in Egypt, on the same footing as the confraternities of monks, which he founded at the same period. Before the death of this reputed originator of the monastic system, no fewer than 27,000 females in Egypt alone had adopted the monastic life. The first nunnery was established on the island of Tabenna in the Nile, about A. D. 340. Such institutions abound in Roman Catholic countries, and peculiar sacredness is considered as attaching to the inmates. See NUN.

NUPTIAL DEITIES, those gods among the ancient heathen nations which presided over marriage ceremonies. These included some of the most eminent as well as of the inferior divinities. Jupiter, Juno, Venus, Diana, were reckoned so indispensable to the celebration of all marriages, that none could be solemnized without them. Besides these, several inferior gods and goddesses were worshipped on such occasions. Jugatinus joined the bride and bridegroom together in the yoke of matrimony; Domiducus conducted the bride to the house of the bridegroom; Viriplaca reconciled husbands to their wives; Manturna was invoked that the wife might never leave her husband, but abide with him on all occasions, whether in prosperity or adversity.

NUPTIALIS, a surname of the goddess Juno as presiding over marriage solemnities.

NUPTIAL RITES. See MARRIAGE.

NU-VA, an ancient goddess among the Chinese, worshipped before the time of Confucius. She presided over the war of the natural elements, stilling the violence of storms, and establishing the authority of law. She caused the world to spring from the primitive chaos, and out of elemental confusion brought natural order.

NYAYA (THE), a system of philosophy among the Hindus, which, as its name imports, is essentially a system of Reasoning, though it is divided into two parts, the first treating of Physics, and the second of Metaphysics. The physical portion claims Kanada as its author, and teaches the doctrine of atoms or units of matter, conceived to be without extent. The metaphysical portion, which is of a strictly dialectic character, is alleged to have been written by Gotama Budha. The text is a collection of aphorisms or sûtras, divided into five books, containing an acute discussion of the principles which constitute proof; all that relates to the objects of proof; and what may be called the organization of proofs. Thus in this Hindu system of reasoning, we find a classification of the principal objects of philosophical investigation, and an exposition of the methods and processes of investigation, embracing the two terms of human knowledge, the objective and the subjective, or the objects of cognition, and the laws of the cognitive subject.

NYCTELIA (Gr. nyx, night), a name sometimes applied to the DIONYSIA (which see), as being celebrated during the night.

NYMPHÆ, a large class of inferior female divinities among the ancient Greeks and Romans. They were the daughters of Zeus, and inhabited grottos, mountains, groves, rivers, and streams, over which they were believed to preside. These deities received names in accordance with the department of nature which they represented. Thus the nymphs of the ocean were called Oceanides, those of the trees Dryades, and so forth. The Nymphs were generally worshipped by the sacrifice of goats, lambs, milk, and oil.

NYMPHÆUM. See CANTHARUS.

NYMPHAGOGUS, the attendant of the bridegroom among the Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans. It was his duty to accompany the parties to the marriage; to act as sponsor for them in their vows; to assist in the marriage ceremonies; to accompany the parties to the house of the bridegroom; and to preside over and direct the festivities of the occasion. See MARRIAGE.

NYSÆUS, a surname of DIONYSUS (which see).

NYX, the goddess of night among the ancient Greeks, and termed Nox among the ancient Romans. She had her residence in Hades, was the daughter of Chaos, and the sister of Erebus

OAK-WORSHIP. The oak has in all ages been looked upon as the most important of the trees of the forest. Groves of oak-trees were even in early times reckoned peculiarly appropriate places for the celebration of religious worship, and as we learn from Ezek. vi. 13, they were likewise the scene of idolatrous practices. Among the ancient Greeks, the oak, as the noblest of trees, was sacred to Zeus, and among the Romans to Jupiter. Oak-worship, however, was one of the most remarkable peculiarities of the religion of the northern nations. The inhabitants of the holy city of Kiew in Russia offered their sacrifices under a sacred oak, in their annual voyages to the Black Sea in the month of June. The oak was considered by the Hessians as the symbol and the abode of the gods. Winifred, the apostle of the Germans, cut down an enormous oak which was sacred to Thor, and such was the horror which the sacrilegious deed excited, that judgments were expected to fall from heaven upon the head of the impious missionary. "The gods of the ancient Prussians," says Mr. Gross, "showed a decided predilection both for the oak and the linden. The ground upon which they stood was holy ground, and called Romowe. Under their ample shade the principal gods of the Prussians were worshipped. The most celebrated oak was at Romowe, in the country of the Natanges. Its trunk was of an extraordinary size, and its branches so dense and diffusive, that neither rain nor snow could penetrate through them. It is affirmed that its foliage enjoyed an amaranthine green, and that it afforded amulets to both man and beast, under the firm belief of the former, at least, that thus employed, it would prove a sure preventive against every species of evil. The Romans, too, were great admirers of this way of worship, and therefore had their Luci in most parts of the city." "As Jupiter," to quote from the same intelligent writer, "gave oracles by means of the oak, so the oaken crown was deemed a fit ornament to deck the majestic brow of the god, contemplated as Poliens, the king of the city. The origin of the oaken crown, as a symbol of Jupiter, is attributed by Plutarch to the admirable qualities of the oak. 'It is the oak,' says he, 'which, among the wild trees, bears the finest fruit, and which, among those that are cultivated, is the strongest. Its fruit has been used as food, and the honey-dew of its leaves drunk as mead. This sweet secretion of the oak was personified under the name of a nymph, denominated Melissa. Meat, too, is indirectly furnished, in supplying nourishment to ruminant and other quadrupeds suitable for diet, and in yielding birdlime, with which the feathered tribes are secured. The esculent properties of the fruit of some trees; as, the quercus esculus, and the many useful qualities of their timber, may well entitle them to the rank of trees of life, and to the distinction and veneration of suppliers of the first food for the simple wants of man. Hence, on account of its valuable frugiferous productions, recognized as the mast, the beech is generically known as the fagus, a term which is derived from phagein, to eat. There was a period in the history of mankind, when the fruit of the oak, the neatly incased acorn, constituted the chief means of subsistence; and the Chaonian oaks of the Pelasgic age, have been justly immortalized on account of their alimentary virtues. It was then, according to Greek authors, that the noble oak was cherished and celebrated as the mother and nurse of man. For these reasons, Jupiter, the munificent source of so great a blessing, was adored as the benignant foster-father of the Pelasgic race, and denominated Phegonäus. In the blissful and hallowed oak-tree, according to the puerile notions of those illiterate people, dwelt the food dispensing god. The ominous rustling of its leaves, the mysterious notes of the feathered songsters among its branches, announced the presence of the divinity to his astonished and admiring votaries, and gave hints and encouragement to those whose interest or curiosity prompted them to consult the oracle. For this reason odoriferous fumes of incense were offered to the oracling god, under the Dodonæan oak: a species of devotion most zealously observed by the Druids in the oak-groves and forests of the ancient Gauls and Britons."

The Druids esteemed the oak the most sacred object in nature, and they believed the mistletoe also which grew upon it to partake of its sacred character. Hence originated the famous ceremony of cutting the mistletoe, which took place at the commencement of the year. The Supreme Being, whom they termed Hæsus or Mighty, was worshipped under the form of an oak. (See DRUIDS).

OANNES. See DAGON.

OATHS, formal appeals to the Divine Being to attest the truth of what we affirm, or the fulfilment of what we promise. The forms of oaths, like other religious ceremonies, have been different in different ages of the world, consisting, however, generally of some bodily action and a prescribed form of words.

The most ancient mode of making oath was by lifting up the hand to heaven. Thus Abraham says to the king of Sodom, Gen. xiv. 22, "I have lift up my hand unto the Lord the Most High God, the possessor of heaven and earth." At an early period we find another form of swearing practised. Thus Eliezer, the servant of Abraham, when taking an oath of fidelity, put his hand under his master's thigh. Sometimes an oath was accompanied with an imprecation, but at other times God was called to witness, or the statement was made, "as surely as God liveth."

At an early period of their history the Jews held an oath in great veneration, but in later times the prophets charge them frequently with the crime of perjury. After the Babylonish captivity regard for an oath revived among them, but it speedily gave way to a mere use of forms, without attaching to them the meaning which the forms were intended convey. In the days of our Lord, the Scribes introduced a distinction, for which there is no warrant in the Word of God, alleging that oaths are to be considered, some of a serious and some of a lighter description. In the view of a Scribe, an oath became serious, solemn and sacred by the direct use of the name of God or Jehovah; but however frequently, needlessly and irreverently a man might swear even in common conversation, it was regarded as a matter of little or no importance, provided he could succeed in avoiding the use of the name of the Divine Being. By thus substituting for the holy word of the living God a vain tradition of the elders, the Scribes destroyed among the Jewish people all reverence for an oath, and rendered the custom of profane swearing fearfully prevalent among all classes of society.

In this state of matters Jesus holds forth the Divine commandment as not only prohibiting the use of the name of God in support of false statements, but all irreverent, profane and needless oaths of every description whatever. Matth. v. 34, 35, 36, "But I say unto you, swear not at all: neither by heaven; for it is God's throne: nor by the earth; for it is his footstool: neither by Jerusalem; for it is the city of the great King: neither shalt thou swear by thy head; because thou canst not make one hair white or black." These words have sometimes been regarded as absolutely prohibiting the use of oaths even on the most solemn occasions or in courts of law. And on the ground of this single passage, some sects, both in ancient and modern times, have denied the lawfulness of an oath, and have regarded it as sinful to swear upon any occasion. But it is quite plain from the illustrations which our Lord here uses, that he is referring to profane swearing in ordinary conversation, and not to oaths for solemn and important purposes. Besides, He Himself lent the force of His example in favour of the lawfulness of oaths in courts of law. Thus, when the High Priest put Him upon oath, using the solemn form, "I adjure thee by the living God that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ the Son of God;" though He had hitherto remained silent, He now acknowledges the power of the appeal, and instantly replies, "Thou hast said." There are many examples of oaths both in the Old and in the New Testament, and more especially the prophet Jeremiah, iv. 2, lays down the inward animating principles by which we ought to be regulated in taking an oath on solemn and important occasions. "And thou shalt swear, the Lord liveth, in truth, in judgment, and in righteousness; and the nations shall bless themselves in Him, and in Him shalt they glory."

Our Lord must not therefore be understood in using the apparently general command, "Swear not at all," as declaring it to be sinful on all occasions to resort to an oath, but He is obviously pointing out to the Jews that the Third Commandment, which had hitherto been limited by the Scribes to false swearing by the name Jehovah, extended to all profane, needless, irreverent appeals to God, whether directly or indirectly. This command, as if He had said, reaches not only to the judicial crime of perjury, of which even human laws can take cognizance, but to the sin of profane swearing of which human laws take no cognizance at all. Ye say, "Thou shalt not forswear thyself, but shalt perform unto the Lord thine oaths." But I say, Swear not at all, even by those oaths which are so current among you, and which, because the name of God is not directly included in them, you regard as comparatively innocent. Such a plea cannot be for a moment sustained. If you swear at all, whether you mention the name of God or not, you can only be understood as appealing for the truth of your statement to the great Searcher of Hearts, who alone can attest the truth and sincerity of what you affirm.

"Swear not at all," then, says Jehovah-Jesus, if you would not profane the name of the Most High; neither by heaven, for though you may think you are avoiding the use of the name of God, you are swearing by the throne of God, and, therefore, if your appeal has any meaning whatever, it is addressed to Him that sitteth upon the throne; neither by the earth, for though you may think it has no relation to the name of God, it is Jehovah's footstool, and as an oath can only be an appeal to an intelligent being, you are swearing by Him whose footstool the earth is; neither by Jerusalem, for far from such an oath being unconnected with God, that is the city of the Great King, and the place which He hath chosen to put his name there: neither shalt thou swear by thy head, for so especially does Jehovah claim it as His own that He numbers the very hairs, and so little is the power which thou hast over it, that thou canst not make one hair white or black. In short, the doctrine which Jesus teaches by the use of those various illustrations, drawn from the customary forms of swearing among the Jews, is so extensively applicable, that it is impossible for any man to discover, in all God's wide creation, a single object on which he can found an oath, that will not be in reality, and in the eye of God's holy law, an appeal to the Creator Himself. If we swear at all, then, we can swear by no other than the living God, for He alone can attest the sincerity of our hearts, and He alone, therefore, can be appealed to, as the witness to the truth of that which we are seeking to confirm by an oath. The distinction of the Scribes, between the more serious and lighter oaths, is thus shown to be utterly unfounded. All oaths are serious, all are an appeal to God, and to use them on any other than the most solemn and important occasions, is to incur the guilt of one of the most daring, unprovoked, and heinous transgressions of the law of God.

We find early mention among the ancient Greek writers, of oaths being taken on important public occasions, such as alliances and treaties, and in such cases peculiar sanctity was attached to the oath. Perjury was viewed as a crime which was visited with aggravated punishment after death in the infernal regions, as well as with heavy calamities in the present world. Oaths, in many instances, were accompanied with sacrifices and libations, the hands of the party swearing being laid upon the victim or the altar. As each separate province of Greece had its peculiar gods, the inhabitants were accustomed to swear by these in preference to other deities. Men swore by their favourite gods, and women by their favourite goddesses. Among the ancient Romans all magistrates were obliged, within five days from the date of their appointment to office, to swear an oath of fidelity to the laws. Soldiers also were bound to take the military oath. In the case of treaties with foreign nations, the oath was ratified by striking the sacrificial victim with a flint-stone, and calling upon Jupiter to strike down the Roman people if they should violate their oath.

OB, a word used among the ancient Jews to denote a species of necromancy, the true nature of which has given rise to much dispute among the learned. The word signifies, in the Hebrew language, a bottle, a cask, or very deep vessel, and such a vessel being used in necromancy, the term came to be applied to the art of evoking the dead. Psellus, in describing this art, says, that it was performed by throwing a piece of gold into the vessel, and pouring water upon it. Certain sacrifices were then offered, and invocations to the demons, when suddenly a sort of grumbling or groaning noise was heard in the bottom of the vessel, and the demon made his appearance in a visible shape, uttering his words with a low voice. The witch of Endor is called literally, in 1 Sam. xxviii. 7, the mistress of ob, or the mistress of the bottle. See CONSULTER WITH FAMILIAR SPIRITS.

OBEDIENCE (HOLY), that perfect, unqualified, unshrinking obedience to the will of a superior and confessor, which is reckoned a most meritorious act on the part of a votary of the Church of Rome. It is inculcated as a solemn obligation arising out of the high position which the priest occupies as at once the exponent and the representative of the will of Heaven.

OBERKIRCHENRATH (Ger. Superior Ecclesiastical Council), the highest ecclesiastical tribunal of the Evangelical Church in Prussia. It was founded by the king in 1850, with the view of giving to the church more independence.

OBI, a secret species of witchcraft practised by the Negroes in the West Indies.

OBIT, a funeral celebration or office for the dead.

OBLATÆ, a term used in the Romish church to denote bread made without leaven, and not consecrated, yet blessed upon the altar. It was anciently placed upon the breasts of the dead.

OBLATI, lay brothers in monasteries who offered their services to the church.

OBLATION. See OFFERING.

OBLATIONARIUM, the name given in the Ordo Romanus to the side-table in ancient churches, on which were placed the offerings of the people, out of which were taken the bread and wine to be used as elements in the Lord's Supper.

OBLATIONS. At the administration of the Lord's Supper in the primitive Christian churches, the communicants were required to bring presents called oblations, from which the sacramental elements were taken. The bread and wine were wrapped in a white linen cloth, the wine being contained in a vessel called amula. After the deacon had said, "Let us pray," the communicants advanced towards the altar, carrying their gifts or oblations, and presented them to a deacon, who delivered them to the bishop, by whom they were either laid upon the altar, or on a separate table. The custom of offering oblations was discontinued during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. In very early times, that is in the first and second centuries, the Christian Church had no revenues except the oblations or voluntary contributions of the people, which were divided among the bishop, the presbyters, the deacons, and the poor of the church. These voluntary oblations were received in place of tithes; but as the number of Christians increased, a fixed maintenance became necessary for the clergy, but still oblations continued to be made by the people through zeal for the cause of Christ and the maintenance of his gospel.

OBLIGATIONS (THE TEN). See DASA-SIL.

OBSEQUIES. See FUNERAL RITES.

OCCAMITES. See NOMINALISTS.

OCEANIDES, nymphs or inferior female divinities, who were considered by the ancient Greeks and Romans as presiding over the ocean. They were regarded as the daughters of Oceanus.

OCEANUS, the god of the river Oceanus, which the ancient Greeks supposed to surround the whole earth. According to Homer he was a mighty god inferior only to Zeus. Hesiod describes him as the son of Uranus and Ge.

OCTAVE, the eighth day after any of the principal festivals. It was anciently observed with much devotion, including the whole period also from the festival to the octave.

OCTOBER-HORSE (THE), a horse anciently sacrificed in the month of October to Mars in the Campus Martius at Rome. The blood which dropped from the tail of this animal when sacrificed was carefully preserved by the vestal virgins in the temple of Vesta, for the purpose of being burnt at the festival of the PALILIA (which see), in order to produce a public purification by fire and smoke.

OCTOECHOS, a service-book used in the Greek Church. It consists of two volumes folio, and contains the particular hymns and services for every day of the week, some portion of the daily service being appropriated to some saint or festival, besides those marked in the calendar. Thus Sunday is dedicated to the resurrection; Monday to the angels; Tuesday to St. John the Baptist; Wednesday to the Virgin and the cross; Thursday to the apostles; Friday to the Saviour's passion; and Saturday to the saints and martyrs. The prayers being intoned in the Greek Church, the Octoechos enjoins which of the eight tones ordinarily in use is to be employed on different occasions and for different services.

ODIN, the supreme god among the Teutonic nations. The legends of the North confound this deity with a celebrated chieftain who had migrated to Scandinavia, from a country on the shores of the Caspian Sea, where he ruled over a district, the principal city of which was called Asgard. If we may credit the Heimskringla or Chronicles of the Kings of Norway, the historical Odin invaded Scandinavia about B. C. 40. But the mythological being who went by the name of Odin appears to have undergone considerable modification in course of time. From the Supreme God who rules over all, he came to be restricted to one particular department, being regarded as the god of war, to whom warriors made a vow when they went out to battle, that they would send him so many souls. These souls were Odin's right, and he conveyed them to Valhalla, his own special abode, where he rewarded all such as died sword in hand. This terrible deity was at the same time, according to the Icelandic mythology, the father and creator of man. Traces of the worship of Odin are found at this day in the name given by the northern nations to the fourth day of the week, which was consecrated to Odin or Woden, under the name of Wodensday or Wednesday.

The Danes seem to have paid the highest honours to Odin. The wife of this god, who received the name of Frigga, was the principal goddess among the ancient Scandinavians, who accompanied her husband to the field of battle, and shared with him the souls of the slain. A festival in honour of Odin was celebrated at the beginning of the spring to welcome in that genial season of the year. It seems to have been customary among the northern nations not only to sacrifice animals, but human beings also, to Odin, as the god of war, who, it was believed, could only be propitiated by the shedding of blood. "The appointed time for these sacrifices," says Mallet, in his 'Northern Antiquities,' "was always determined by another superstitious opinion which made the northern nations regard the number three as sacred and particularly dear to the gods. Thus in every ninth month they renewed this bloody ceremony, which was to last nine days, and every day they offered up nine living victims, whether men or animals. But the most solemn sacrifices were those which were offered at Upsal in Sweden every ninth year. Then the king and all the citizens of any distinction were obliged to appear in person, and to bring offerings, which were placed in the great temple. Those who could not come themselves sent their presents by others, or paid the value in money to those whose business it was to receive the offerings. Strangers flocked there in crowds from all parts; and none were excluded except those whose honour had suffered some stain, and especially such as had been accused of cowardice. Then they chose among the captives in time of war, and among the slaves in time of peace, nine persons to be sacrificed. The choice was partly regulated by the opinion of the bystanders, and partly by lot. But they did not always sacrifice such mean persons. In great calamities, in a pressing famine for example, if the people thought they had some pretext to impute the cause of it to their king, they even sacrificed him without hesitation, as the highest price with which they could purchase the Divine favour. In this manner the first king of Vernaland was burnt in honour of Odin to put an end to a great dearth; as we read in the history of Norway. The kings, in their turn, did not spare the blood of their subjects; and many of them even shed that of their children. Earl Hakon of Norway offered his son in sacrifice, to obtain of Odin the victory over the Jomsburg pirates. Aun, king of Sweden, devoted to Odin the blood of his nine sons, to prevail on that god to prolong his life. The ancient history of the north abounds in similar examples. These abominable sacrifices were accompanied with various ceremonies. When the victim was chosen, they conducted him towards the altar where the sacred fire was kept burning night and day; it was surrounded with all sorts of iron and brazen vessels. Among them one was distinguished from the rest by its superior size; in this they received the blood of the victims. When they offered up animals, they speedily killed them at the foot of the altar; then they opened their entrails to draw auguries from them, as among the Romans; afterwards they dressed the flesh to be served up in a feast prepared for the assembly. Even horse-flesh was not rejected, and the chiefs often eat of it as well as the people. But when they were disposed to sacrifice men, those whom they pitched upon were laid upon a great stone, where they were instantly either strangled or knocked on the head. The bodies were afterwards burnt, or suspended in a sacred grove near the temple. Part of the blood was sprinkled upon the people, part of it upon the sacred grove; with the same they also bedewed the images of the gods, the altars, the benches and walls of the temple, both within and without." See SCANDINAVIANS (RELIGION OF THE ANCIENT).

ECONOMISTS, the name given to the members of a secret association which existed in France in the latter part of the eighteenth century. Its object is understood to have been to subvert Christianity by disseminating among the people the writings of Voltaire, Rousseau, and other infidels. Selecting passages from these authors, they circulated them throughout the kingdom by hawkers at a very cheap rate, thus undermining the religious principles of the peasantry. The most active members of this infidel society were D'Alembert, Turgot, Condorcet, Diderot, and La Harpe.

ECONOMUS, a special officer appointed in the middle of the fifth century, to conduct the administration of church property under the superintendence of the bishop, and with provision that the bishop should not appoint his own Economus, who was to be chosen to his office by the whole presbytery. This law, which originated with the council of Chalcedon, was afterwards confirmed by the Emperor Justinian, and was repeated by subsequent councils. The Economus rose in the middle ages to great influence, and became in a good degree independent of the bishop. The Economi were quite distinct from the stewards of cloisters and other similar establishments. They were always chosen from among the clergy.

ECUMENICAL BISHOP, a title first assumed by John the Faster, patriarch of Constantinople, in the end of the sixth century. The assumption of so lofty a title by the Constantinopolitan patriarchs was strongly remonstrated against by their rival bishops of Rome, particularly by Gregory the Great, who maintained the title to be profane, antichristian, and infernal. In A. D. 606, however, the Roman pontiff Boniface III. obtained this very title from Phocas, the Greek Emperor; and from that period down to the present day, the Pope of Rome claims to be Ecumenical or Universal Bishop, having authority over the whole church of Christ upon the earth. All other churches except the Roman Catholic Church repudiate such a claim as alike unfounded, antichristian, and blasphemous.

ECUMENICAL COUNCILS. See COUNCILS (GENERAL or ECUMENICAL).

ECUMENICAL DIVINES, a title given by the Greek Church to St. Basil the Great, St. Gregory the Divine, and St. John Chrysostom. A festival in honour of these three Holy Ecumenical Divines, as they are termed, is held on the 30th of January every year.

ENISTERIA, libations of wine poured out to Hercules by the youth of Athens on reaching the age of manhood.

ENOATIS, a surname of Artemis, under which she was worshipped at Enoe in Argolis.

ENOMANCY (Gr. oinos, wine, and manteia, divination), a species of divination practised by the ancient Greeks, in which they drew conjectures from the colour, motion, and other circumstances connected with the wine used in libations to the gods.

ETOSYRUS, the name of a divinity worshipped by the ancient Scythians, and identified with Apollo by Herodotus.

EFARRI, an indulgence-box, a sort of charm purchased from the Japanese priests by the pilgrims who go to ISJE (which see).

OFFERINGS, a term often used as synonymous with sacrifices, but properly speaking, they cannot be considered as wholly identical. Thus every sacrifice is an oblation or offering, but every offering is not a sacrifice. Tithes, first-fruits, and every thing consecrated to God, must be regarded as offerings, but none of them as sacrifices. A sacrifice involves in its very nature the shedding of blood, but this is not necessarily the case with an offering, which may be simply of an eucharistical character, without having relation to an atonement. See SACRIFICES.

OFFERTORY, the verses of Scripture in the Common Prayer Book of the Church of England, which are found near the beginning of the Communion Service, and are appointed to be read while the alms and offerings of the people are in course of being collected.

OFFICES, the forms of prayer used in Romish and Episcopal churches. Before the Reformation the offices of the church consisted in missals, breviaries, psalteries, graduals, and pontificals.

OFFICIAL, a term used in the Church of England to denote the person to whom cognizance of causes is committed by those who have an ecclesiastical jurisdiction. These officers were introduced in the course of the twelfth century to check the arbitrary proceedings of the archdeacons. But in a short time the officials themselves were complained of, as being instruments in the hand of the bishops for making heavier exactions from the people than had ever been made by the archdeacons; so that Peter of Blois, in the close of the twelfth century, called them by no better name than bishops' blood-suckers.

OFFICIUM DIVINUM (Lat. a Divine office), an expression which came to be used in the ninth century to denote a religious ceremony; and as public rites had at that period become very numerous, various treatises in explanation of them began to be published for the instruction of the common people. Accordingly treatises, De Divinis Officiis, on Divine Offices, appeared from the pens of some able writers of the time, particularly Amalarius, John Scotus, Walafrid Strabo, and others.

OGOA, a name applied to Zeus by the Carians at Mysala, in whose temple a sea-wave was occasionally seen. The Athenians alleged the same thing in regard to their own citadel.

OIL (ANOINTING). See ANOINTING OIL.

OIL (HOLY). See CHRISM.

OLIVE-TREE (TIE), a very common tree in the countries around the Mediterranean Sea. It is termed by botanists the Olea Europea. From the abundance of olive-trees in all parts of Palestine, we find very frequent references to this tree in the Sacred Scriptures. There appear to have been figures of olive-trees in the Jewish temple, to which there is an allusion in Zech. iv. 3; and the door-posts as well as the images of the cherubin were made of olive-wood. Olive-branches were carried by the Jews at the feast of tabernacles. The dove which was sent forth from the ark by Noah returned with an olive-branch in its mouth, thus announcing to the patriarch that the war of elements had ceased, and that the waters of the deluge had abated. Hence the olive became the symbol of peace. In the ancient heathen mythology, Minerva, the goddess of war, of victory, and of peace, was represented as bearing in her hands a branch of the olive-tree. In order to appease the Eumenides or Furies who inhabited the infernal regions, it was necessary before invoking them to lay upon the ground, three times, nine branches of an olive-tree. If this tree occurs rarely in ancient myths, it served at least as an emblem of peace, not only among the Romans, but among the Carthaginians, among the barbarous inhabitants of the Alps in the time of Hannibal, and even in the Antilles in the time of Christopher Columbus.

OLIVETANS (THE), a Romish order of religious, sometimes called the Congregation of St. Mary of the Mount of Olives. It was founded as a congregation of Benedictines, in a wilderness near Siena, by John Tolomei, in commemoration of the recovery of his sight. The order was confirmed by Pope John XXII. in A. D. 1319.

OLYMPIC GAMES, the greatest of the national festivals of the ancient Greeks, which received its name either from the town of Olympia in Elis, where it was celebrated, or from Jupiter Olympius, to whom it was dedicated. The learned differ in opinion as to the precise period when this festival was first instituted, but mythic history ascribes its origin to Heracles, and refers the date of its introduction into Greece to B. C. 1200. After a time the Olympic games seem to have fallen into neglect, but they were revived, as we learn from Pausanias, by Iphitus king of Elis, with the assistance of Lycurgus the Spartan lawgiver. Once more they came to be discontinued, but for the last time were revived by Coræbus, B. C. 776. From this time, the interval of four years between each celebration of the festival, a period which was termed an Olympiad, came to be accounted a chronological era.

The festival, which lasted five days, began and ended with a sacrifice to Olympian Jove. The interval was filled up with gymnastic exercises, horse and chariot races, recitations of poetry, displays of eloquence, and exhibitions of the fine arts. The gymnastic exercises consisted in running, leaping, wrestling, boxing, and throwing the discus or quoit. The following account of the contests in this celebrated festival is given by Mr. Gross: "The candidates, having undergone an examination, and proved to the satisfaction of the judges that they were free-men, that they were Grecians by birth, and that they were clear from all infamous immoral stains, were led to the statue of Jupiter within the senate-house. This image, says Pausanias, was better calculated than any other to strike terror into wicked men, for he was represented with thunder in both hands; and, as if that were not a sufficient intimation of the wrath of the deity against those who should forswear themselves, at his feet there was a plate of brass containing terrible denunciations against the perjured. Before this statue the candidates, their relations, and instructors, swore on the bleeding limbs of the victims, that they were duly qualified to engage, solemnly vowing not to employ any unfair means, but to observe all the laws relating to the Olympic games. After this they returned to the stadium, and took their stations by lot, when the herald demanded—'Can any one reproach these athletes, with having been in bonds, or with leading an irregular life?' A profound silence generally followed this interrogatory, and the combatants became exalted in the estimation of the assembly, not only by this universal testimony of their moral character, but by the consideration that they were the free unsullied champions of the respective States to which they belonged; not engaged in any vulgar struggle for interested or ordinary objects, but incited to competition by a noble love of fame, and a desire to uphold the renown of their native cities in the presence of assembled Greece. Such being the qualities required before they could enter the lists, their friends, filled with anxiety, gathered round them, stimulating their exertions, or affording them advice, until the moment arrived when the trumpet sounded. At this signal the runners started off amid the cries and clamour of the excited multitude, whose vociferations did not cease until the herald procured silence by his trumpet, and proclaimed the name and abode of the winner.

"On the last day of the festival, the conquerors, being summoned by proclamation to the tribunal within the sacred grove, received the honour of public coronation, a ceremony preceded by pompous sacrifices. Encircled with the olive wreath, gathered from the sacred tree behind the temple of Jupiter, the victors, dressed in rich habits, bearing palm-branches in their hands and almost intoxicated with joy, proceeded in grand procession to the theatre, marching to the sound of flutes, and surrounded by an immense multitude who made the air ring with their acclamations. The winners in the horse and chariot-races formed a part of the pomp, their stately coursers bedecked with flowers, seeming, as they paced proudly along, to be conscious participants of the triumph. When they reached the theatre, the choruses saluted them with the ancient hymn, composed by the poet Archilochus, to exalt the glory of the victors, the surrounding multitude joining their voices to those of the musicians. This being concluded, the trumpet sounded, the herald proclaimed the name and country of the victor, as well as the nature of his prize, the acclamations of the people within and without the building were redoubled, and flowers and garlands were showered from all sides upon the happy conqueror, who at this moment was thought to have attained the loftiest pinnacle of human glory and felicity.' Though the only guerdon that the victor received was an olive-crown, yet this trifling mark of distinction powerfully stimulated the acquisition of virtue, while it facilitated the cultivation of the mind, and, to souls animated by a noble ambition, it possessed an incomparably higher value, and was coveted with far more intensity, than the most unbounded treasures."

The statues of the conquerors in the Olympic games were erected at Olympia, in the sacred grove of Jupiter. The celebrity of the festival drew together people from all parts of Greece, as well as from the neighbouring islands and continents, and the Olympiad served as a common bond of alliance and point of reunion to the whole Hellenic race. These games were celebrated for nearly a thousand years from their first institution. Under the Roman emperors they were conducted with great splendour, and high privileges conferred upon the victors. They were finally abolished in A. D. 394, in the sixteenth year of the reign of Theodosius.

OLYMPIC GODS. See CELESTIAL DEITIES.

OLYMPIUS, a surname of Zeus, and also of Hercules, as well as of all the OLYMPIC or CELESTIAL DEITIES (which see).

OLYMPUS, a mountain in Thessaly, which was accounted in ancient times the holy mountain of Greece, and distinguished pre-eminently as the choice abode of the gods. Zeus held his august court upon its summit, and it was the residence during the day of the principal divinities of Greece. Olympus is 6,000 feet in height, and Homer describes it as towering above the clouds, and crowned with snow. Hephaestus is said to have built a palace upon its summit, which was the residence of Zeus and the rest of the Olympic gods.

OM. See AUM.

OMADIUS, a surname of Dionysus, as the flesh-eater, human sacrifices being offered to this deity in the islands of Chios and Tenedos.

OMBIASSES, priests and soothsayers among the inhabitants of Madagascar, who compound charms which they sell to the people. See MADAGASCAR (RELIGION OF).

OMBRIUS, a surname of Zeus, as the rain-giver, under which title he was worshipped on Mount Hymettus in Attica.

OMBWIRI, a class of good and gentle spirits, who are believed by the natives of Southern Guinea to take part in the government of the world. Almost every man has his own Ombwiri as a tutelary and guardian spirit, for which he provides a small house near his own. "All the harm that is escaped in this world," as Mr. Wilson informs us, "and all the good secured, are ascribed to the kindly offices of this guardian spirit. Ombwiri is also regarded as the author of every thing in the world which is marvellous or mysterious. Any remarkable feature in the physical aspect of the country, any notable phenomenon in the heavens, or extraordinary events in the affairs of men, are ascribed to Ombwiri. His favourite places of abode are the summits of high mountains, deep caverns, large rocks, and the base of very large forest trees. And while the people attach no malignity to his character, they carefully guard against all unnecessary familiarity in their intercourse with him, and never pass a place where he is supposed to dwell except in silence. He is the only one of all the spirits recognized by the people that has no priesthood, his intercourse with men being direct and immediate."

OMEN, a word used by the ancient Greeks and Romans to denote a supposed sign or indication of a future event. See AUSPICES.

OMER (FESTIVAL OF THE THIRTY-THIRD OF). The sixteenth of the month Nisan was the day among the ancient Jews for offering an omer or sheaf, the first-fruits of the barley harvest. That, and the succeeding forty-nine days, are called "days of the omer;" of which the first thirty-two days are considered as a season of sadness. The thirty-third of the omer, or the eighteenth of the month Ijar, is celebrated as a kind of festival, the occasion of which is believed to have been a great mortality that raged among the disciples of Rabbi Akiba, and ceased as on this day.

O-ME-TO, a perfect Budha among the Chinese, and perhaps the most revered of all the objects worshipped in the Fo-ist temples. He is supposed like the previous Budhas to have passed through a succession of new births into the loftiest sphere of the invisible regions. The TSING-T'U (which see), or paradise of O-me-to, is a scene of unrivalled beauty and magnificence, in the midst of which sits enthroned the great Budha O-me-to, a peacock and a lion forming the supporters of his throne. According to a Chinese legend, he swore, that if any being in all the ten worlds, should, after repeating his name, fail to attain life in his kingdom, he would cease to be a god. Accordingly, among the Chinese Fo-ists there is a prevailing belief, that the amount of merit which they acquire depends on the frequency with which they repeat the name O-me-to-fuh, and that when any one has repeated it three hundred thousand times, he may begin to hope for a personal vision of the god. The influence of such notions upon the Fo-ists in China is thus described by Mr. Simpson Culbertson, an American missionary, in a recent account which he has published of the Religious Notions and Popular Superstitions in North China: "In the temples, the priests sometimes allow themselves to be shut up for months together, doing nothing but repeating over and over, day and night, the name of Buddha. In a temple at T'ien-t'ai, fifty miles south of Ningpo, there have been as many as ten or twelve priests thus voluntarily imprisoned at the same time. During the day they all keep up a constant repetition of the name O-mi-tò-fúh, and at night, they keep it up by taking turns, some continuing their monotonous song while the others sleep. They never leave their cell for any purpose until the appointed period is fulfilled. No wonder they all have a vacant idiotic look, as though but a slight glimmering of intellect remained to them!"

"It is not the priests only who thus devote themselves to laying up, as they suppose, treasure in heaven. Some among the people also, are very diligent in the work. See that old man. His head is hoary with age. A flowing white beard rests upon his bosom. With tottering steps, and leaning upon his staff, he enters the small room used as a chapel, by one who preaches of Jesus and the resurrection. Perhaps there may be something in this religion that will help to give peace of conscience, and hope of happiness after death. He listens with deep attention during the sermon, but his fingers are all the while busy counting the beads he holds in his hand, and his lips continually pronounce, in a low whisper, the name O-mi-tò-fúh. And now the service is closed, and the congregation is dismissed. But the old man is not yet satisfied, and he approaches the missionary to ask for further information. He addresses him—'Your doctrine, sir, is most excellent—O-mi-tò-fúh. I am anxious to learn more about it—O-mi-tò-fúh. How must I worship Jesus? O mi-tò-fúh.'

II.

"Ah! my venerable elder brother, if you would worship Jesus aright, you must forsake every sin, and must not worship any other god, for all others are false gods.'

"Yes, I know I must forsake sin—O-mi-tò-fúh. This I have done long ago—O-mi-tò-fúh. I do not sin now—O-mi-tò-fúh. I am now too old to sin—O-mi-tò-fúh. I am old, and must soon die—O-mi-tò-fúh. I wish to be a disciple of Jesus—O-mi-tò-fúh, and to-morrow I must go to my home far away in the country—O-mi-tò-fúh. What must I do?—O-mi-tò-fúh.'

"Explanations are given, and now the old man must depart. But suddenly he drops upon his knees and bows his head to the earth. Being restrained, he rises and takes his leave, expressing his gratitude. 'Many thanks to you, sir, for your kind instruction—O-mi-tò-fúh, O-mi-tò-fúh. May we meet again—O-mi-tò-fúh.'

"This is no fiction, but an actual occurrence. There are many such old men in China, and old women too, seeking for some means of securing happiness after death. Not unfrequently we may meet these old people, conscious that their end is at hand, walking in the street, and as we pass we hear them muttering—O-mi-tò-fúh. Alas! how many of them have gone down to the grave with the name O-mi-tò-fúh on their lips!"

OMISH CHURCH (THE), a society of Mennonites in the United States, who derived their name of Anish or Omish from Jacob Amen, a native of Amenthal in Switzerland, and a rigid Mennonite preacher of the seventeenth century. In many parts of Germany and Switzerland, where they still exist in considerable numbers, they are known by the name of Hooker Mennonites, on account of their wearing hooks on their clothes; another party being, for similar reasons, called Button Mennonites. The Omish Church in North America rigidly adheres to the Confession of Faith which was adopted at Dort in Holland in A. D. 1632 by a General Assembly of ministers of the religious denominations who were at that time, and in that place, called Mennonites. They hold the fundamental Protestant principle, that the Scriptures are the only rule of faith and obedience. They have regular ministers and deacons, who, however, are not allowed to receive fixed salaries; and in their religious assemblies every one has the privilege of exhorting and of expounding the Word of God. Adult baptism alone is practised, and the ordinance is administered by pouring water upon the head. Oaths, even in a court of justice, are regarded as unlawful, and war in all its forms is considered to be alike unchristian and unjust. Charity is with them a religious duty, and none of their members is permitted to become a burden upon the public funds. See MENNONITES.

OMNIPOTENT. See ALMIGHTY.

OMNIPRESENT, an attribute of the Divine Being, which denotes that he is present in every place.

His infinity involves the very idea of his ubiquity, not as being identical with the universe as the Pantheist would teach, but filling the universe with his presence, though quite distinct from it. This doctrine, while it is plainly declared in many passages of Scripture, is very fully developed in Ps. cxxxix.

OMNISCIENT, that attribute of God, in virtue of which he knows all things—past, present, and future. This, like his omnipresence, is incommunicable to any creature, and the two attributes, indeed, are inseparably connected. If God be everywhere, he cannot fail to see and to know everything absolutely as it is in itself, as well as in all the circumstances belonging to it.

OMOPHAGIA, a custom which was anciently followed at the celebration of the DIONYSIA (which see), in the island of Chios, the Bacchæ being obliged to eat the raw pieces of flesh of the victim which were distributed among them. From this act Dionysus received the name of OMADUS (which see).

OMOMUS, an herb which Plutarch says the ancient Persians used to pound in a mortar while they invoked Ahriman, the evil principle. Then they mixed the blood of a wolf recently killed with the herb omomus, and carrying out the mixture, they threw it into a place where the rays of the sun never came.

OMOPHORIUM, a bishop's vestment in the Greek Church, answering to the Pallium of the Romish Church. It is worn on the shoulders. Originally it was fabricated of sheep's wool, and is designed to be an emblem of the lost sheep in the gospels, which the good shepherd found and brought home rejoicing; while the four crosses worked on it indicate the Saviour's sufferings and the duty of the bishop to follow in his Master's steps.

OMPHALOPSYCHI. See HESYCHASTS.

ONCA, a surname of Athena, under which she was worshipped at Once in Beotia.

ONCEUS, a surname of Apollo, from Onceium in Arcadia, where he had a temple.

ONEIROCRITICA (Gr. oneiros, a dream, and krino, to discern), the art of interpreting dreams, which, among the ancient Egyptians, was the duty of the holy scribes or Hierogrammateis.

ONEIROMANCY (Gr. oneiros, a dream, and mantia, divination). In eastern countries, from very early times, much importance was attached to dreams, and the greatest anxiety was often manifested to ascertain their true meaning and interpretation. We have a remarkable instance of this in the case of Pharaoh, king of Egypt, as well as of his butler and baker. The Egyptian monarch is represented as consulting two different classes of persons as to the interpretation of his dream, the Charetumim, or magicians, and the Hakamin, or wise men. The former are, in all probability, to be identified with the Hierogrammateis, or holy scribes, who are mentioned as a distinct order of the Egyptian priesthood by Josephus, and several other authors. It is not unlikely that both Joseph and Moses were raised to this order, for Joseph asks his brethren, "Wot ye not that such a man as I can certainly divine?" and Moses is described as "learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians." The account of Nebuchadnezzar's dreams, as given in the book of Daniel, affords an additional illustration of dreams as a mode of Divine communication. In Deut. xiii. 1—3, we find the Israelites prohibited from giving heed to dreams, or the interpretation of them, wherever their evident tendency was to promote idolatry. In those cases, however, where the prophets of the Lord were consulted, or the priests enquired of the Lord by the use of the ephod, attention to dreams was allowed by the Divine Lawgiver. It was because the Lord would not answer Saul by dreams nor by prophets before the battle of Gilboa, that he had recourse to a woman with a familiar spirit.

Oneiromancy seems to have been held in high estimation among the Greeks in the Homeric age, for dreams were said to be from Zeus. Not only the Greeks and Romans, however, but all nations, both ancient and modern, have been found to make pretensions to skill in the interpretation of dreams. Nor has the light of Christianity and the advancement of civilization altogether abolished such superstitious practices. On the contrary, while the priests of modern heathendom are generally sorcerers, who practise oneiromancy, as well as other modes of divination, there are not wanting persons, even in professedly Christian countries, who deceive the credulous, by pretending to interpret dreams, and to unfold the impenetrable secrets of the future.

ONEIROS, the personification of dreams among the ancient Greeks. Hesiod calls them children of night, and Ovid children of sleep, while Homer assigns them a residence on the dark shores of the western ocean.

ONION-WORSHIP. Pliny affirms that the allium sativum and the allium cepa were both ranked by the Egyptians among gods, in taking an oath. Juvenal mocks them for the veneration in which they held these vegetable deities. Sir J. G. Wilkinson, however, declares that "there is no direct evidence from the monuments of their having been sacred; and they were admitted as common offerings on every altar. Onions and other vegetables were not forbidden to the generality of the people to whom they were a principal article of food; for whatever religious feeling prohibited their use on certain occasions, this was confined to the initiated, who were required to keep themselves more especially pure for the service of the gods."

ONKELOS (TARGUM OF). See TARGUMS.

ONUPHIS, one of the sacred bulls of the ancient Egyptians. It was of a black colour, had shaggy, recurved hair; and is supposed to have been the emblem of the retroceding sun.

ONYAMBE, a wicked spirit much dreaded by the natives of Southern Guinea. The people seldom speak of him, and always manifest uneasiness when his name is mentioned in their presence. They do not seem to regard this spirit as having much influence over the affairs of men.

ONYCHOMANCY, a species of divination anciently practised by examining the nails of a boy. For this purpose they were covered with oil and soot, and turned to the sun. The images represented by the reflection of the light upon the nails gave the answer required.

OOSCOPIA (Gr. oon, an egg, and scopeo, to observe), a method of divination by the examination of eggs.

OPALIA, a festival celebrated by the ancient Romans, in honour of Ops, the wife of Saturn, on the 19th of December, being the third day of the Saturnalia. The vows made on this occasion were offered in a sitting posture, the devotee touching the ground, because Ops represented the earth.

OPHIOMANCY (Gr. ophis, a serpent, and mantia, divination), a species of divination practised in ancient times by means of serpents.

OPHITES, a Gnostic sect which arose in the second century, and which, in opposing Judaism, inclined towards Paganism. To the Demiurge the Ophitic system gave the name of Ialdabaoth, making him a limited being, and opposed to the higher order of the universe with which he conflicts, striving to render himself an independent sovereign. All the while he is unconsciously working out the plans of Sophia or Wisdom, and bringing about his own destruction. The doctrines maintained by this sect in regard to the origin and destination of man are thus described by Neander: "The empire of Ialdabaoth is the starry world. The stars are the representatives and organs of the cosmical principle, which seeks to hold man's spirit in bondage and servitude, and to environ it with all manner of delusions. Ialdabaoth and the six angels begotten by him, are the spirits of the seven planets, the Sun, the Moon, Mars, Venus, Jupiter, Mercury, and Saturn. It is the endeavour of Ialdabaoth to assert himself as self-subsistent Lord and Creator, to keep his six angels from deserting their subjection, and, lest they should look up and observe the higher world of light, to fix their attention upon some object in another quarter. To this end, he calls upon the six angels to create man, after their own common image, as the crowning seal of their independent creative power. Man is created; and being in their own image, is a huge corporeal mass, but without a soul. He creeps on the earth, and has not power to lift himself erect. They therefore bring the helpless creature to their Father, that he may animate it with a soul. Ialdabaoth breathed into it a living spirit, and thus unperceived by himself, the spiritual seed passed from his own being into the nature of man, whereby he was deprived himself of this higher principle of life. Thus had the Sophia ordained it. In man (i. e. those men who had received some portion of this spiritual seed) was concentrated the light, the soul, the reason of the whole creation. Ialdabaoth is now seized with amazement and wrath, when he beholds a being created by himself, and within the bounds of his own kingdom, rising both above himself and his kingdom. He strives therefore to prevent man from becoming conscious of his higher nature, and of that higher order of world to which he is now become related—to keep him in a state of blind unconsciousness, and thus of slavish submission. It was the jealousy of the contracted Ialdabaoth which issued that command to the first man; but the mundane soul employed the serpent as an instrument to defeat the purpose of Ialdabaoth, by tempting the first man to disobedience. According to another view, the serpent was itself a symbol or disguised appearance of the mundane soul;—and in the strict sense, it is that part of the sect only that adopted this view, which rightly received the name of Ophites, for they actually worshipped the serpent as a holy symbol;—to which they may have been led by an analogous idea in the Egyptian religion, the serpent in the latter being looked upon as a symbol of Kneph, who resembled the Sophia of the Ophites. At all events, it was through the mundane soul, directly or indirectly, that the eyes of the first man were opened. The fall of man,—and this presents a characteristic feature of the Ophitic system, though even in this respect it was perhaps not altogether independent of the prior Valentinian theory,—the fall of man was the transition point from a state of unconscious limitation to one of conscious freedom. Man now became wise, and renounced his allegiance to Ialdabaoth. The latter, angry at this disobedience, thrusts him from the upper region of the air, where until now he had dwelt in an ethereal body, down to the dark earth, and banished him into a dark body. Man finds himself now placed in a situation, where, on the one hand, the seven planetary spirits seek to hold him under their thrall, and to suppress the higher consciousness in his soul; while, on the other hand, the wicked and purely material spirits try to tempt him into sin and idolatry, which would expose him to the vengeance of the severe Ialdabaoth. Yet 'Wisdom' never ceases to impart new strength to man's kindred nature, by fresh supplies of the higher spiritual influence; and from Seth, whom the Gnostics generally regarded as a representative of the contemplative natures, she is able to preserve through every age, a race peculiarly her own, in which the seeds of the spiritual nature are saved from destruction."

The Ophites, in common with the Basilideans and the Valentinians, maintained that the heavenly Christ first became united with Jesus at his baptism, and forsook him again at his passion, and in proof of this, they pointed to the fact that Jesus wrought no miracle either before his baptism or after his resurrection. They held that Ialdabaoth brought about the crucifixion of Christ. After his resurrection

Jesus remained eighteen months on the earth, during which time he received from the Sophia a clearer knowledge of the higher truth, which he imparted to a few of his disciples. He was then raised to heaven by the celestial Christ, and sits at the right hand of Ialdabaoth, unobserved by him, but gradually receiving to himself every spiritual being that has been emancipated and purified by the redemption. In proportion as this process of attraction goes on, Ialdabaoth is deprived of his higher virtues. Thus through Jesus spiritual life flows back to the mundane soul, its original source.

The doctrines of the Ophites were far from being favourable to purity of morals. Origen indeed goes so far as to exclude them from the Christian church, and declares that they admitted none to their assemblies who did not curse Christ. The same author names as the founder of this sect, a certain Euerates, who may have lived before the birth of Christ. The Ophites, who were called in Latin Serpentarii, received from the Asiatics the name of Nahassians or Naassians. Irenæus, Theodoret, Epiphanius, and Augustine, regard them as Christian heretics. Origen gives a minute account of the Diagram of the Ophites, which appears to have been a sort of tablet on which they depicted their doctrines in all sorts of figures, with words annexed. As their name imports, the Ophites seem to have been serpent-worshippers, keeping a living serpent, which on the occasion of celebrating the Lord's Supper, they let out upon the dish to crawl over and around the bread. The officiating priest now broke the bread and distributed it among the communicants. When each had partaken of the sacramental bread, and kissed the serpent, it was afterwards confined. At the close of this ceremony, which the Ophites termed their perfect sacrifice, a hymn of praise was sung to the Supreme God, whom the serpent in paradise had made known to men. These rites, which were probably symbolic, were limited to a few only of the Christian Ophites.

OPS, a goddess worshipped by the ancient Romans as presiding over agriculture and giving fruitfulness to the earth. She was regarded as the wife of Saturn, and her votaries were wont, while adoring her, to touch the ground. Her worship was connected with that of her husband Saturn, and a festival, named OPALIA (which see), was celebrated in honour of her.

OPTIMATES, a name given by Augustine to the presbyters or elders of the ancient Christian Church.

OPTION, a term used in England to denote the choice which an archbishop has of any one dignity or benefice, in the gift of every bishop consecrated or confirmed by him, which he may confer on his own chaplain, or any other person, at his pleasure.

OPUS OPERATUM (Lat. a work wrought), an expression used to denote a doctrine held by the Church of Rome, that effectual grace is necessarily connected with, and inseparable from, the outward administration of the sacraments. This doctrine involves, of course, BAPTISMAL REGENERATION (which see), and also destroys all distinction between worthy and unworthy communicants in the case of the Lord's Supper. The Council of Trent, however, explicitly declares this to be a doctrine of the Church of Rome. "Whoever," the decree runs, "shall affirm that grace is not conferred by these sacraments of the new law, by their own power (ex opere operato); but that faith in the divine promise is all that is necessary to obtain grace: let him be accursed." This tenet originated with the schoolmen, particularly with Thomas Aquinas, who taught that, in consequence of the death of Christ, the sacraments instituted in the New Testament have obtained an instrumental or efficient virtue which those of the Old Testament did not possess. The distinction at length came to be established, that the sacraments of the Old Testament had produced effects ex opere operantis, from the power of the administrator, those of the New Testament ex opere operato, from the administration itself. In opposition to the doctrine laid down by Thomas Aquinas, which received the sanction of the Church of Rome, Duns Scotus denied that the effective power of grace was contained in the sacraments themselves. The forerunners of the Reformation, for instance Wessel and Wyellife, combated still more decidedly the doctrine of Aquinas. The Reformers taught plainly that the sacraments have no efficacy in themselves, nor do they derive any efficacy from the administrator, but derive all their efficacy from the working of the Spirit of Christ in the true believer who receives them. The Protestant churches, accordingly, unite in denying the doctrine of the opus operatum held by the Romish Church.

OQUAMIRIS, sacrifices offered by the Mingrelians in the Caucasus, which partake partly of a Jewish, partly of a Pagan character: "Their principal sacrifice," as we learn from Picart, "is that at which the priest, after he has pronounced some particular prayers over the ox, or such other animal as is appointed and set apart for that solemn purpose, sings the victim in five several places to the skin with a lighted taper; then leads it in procession round the devotee for whose particular service it is to be slaughtered, and at last, having sacrificed it, orders it to be drest, and brought to table. The whole family thereupon stand all round about it, each of them with a wax-taper in his hand. He for whom the sacrifice is peculiarly intended, kneels down before the table, having a candle or wax-taper in his hand, whilst the priest reads some prayers that are suitable to the solemn occasion. When he has done, not only he who kneels, but his relations, friends, and acquaintance throw frankincense into the fire, which is placed near the victim. The priest then cuts off a piece of the victim, waves it over the head of him at whose request it is offered up, and gives it him to eat; after which the whole company drawing near to him, wave their wax-tapers over his head in like manner, and throw them afterwards into the same fire, where they had but just before cast their frankincense. Every person that is present at this solemn act of devotion has the liberty to eat as much as he thinks proper; but is enjoined to carry no part of it away; the remainder belongs to the sacrificator. They have another Oquamiri, which is celebrated in honour of their dead. There is nothing, however, very particular or remarkable in it but the ceremony of sacrificing some bloody victims, upon which they pour oil and wine mingled together. They make their oblations of wine likewise to the saints after divers forms; a particular detail whereof would be tedious and insipid, and of little or no importance. I shall only observe, therefore, that besides the wine, they offer up a pig, and a cock to St. Michael, and that the Oquamiri, which is devoted to the service of St. George, when their vintage is ripe, consists in consecrating a barrel of wine to him, which contains about twenty flaggons; though it must not be broached till after Whitsuntide, on the festival of St. Peter: at which time the master of each family carries a small quantity of it to St. George's church, where he pays his devotions to the saint; after which he returns home and takes all his family with him into the cellar. There they range themselves in order round the barrel, the head whereof is plentifully furnished with bread and cheese and a parcel of chibbols, or little onions, by the master of the house, who, before any thing is touched, repeats a prayer. At last, he either kills a hog, or a kid, and sprinkles part of the blood all round the vessel. The ceremony concludes with eating and drinking."

ORACLE, the Holy of Holies, or the most holy place in the temple of Solomon, which occupied the third part of the enclosure of the temple towards the west. It was ten cubits square. None but the high-priest was permitted to enter it, and that only once a-year, on the great day of atonement. See TEMPLE.

ORACLES, dark answers supposed to be given by demons in ancient times to those who consulted them. Cicero calls them the language of the gods. The term oracle was also used to denote the place where these revelations were made. Herodotus attributes the origin of oracles to the Egyptians. "The two oracles," says he, "of Egyptian Thebes and of Dodona, have entire resemblance to each other. The art of divination, as now practised in our temples, is thus derived from Egypt; at least the Egyptians were the first who introduced the sacred festivals, processions, and supplications, and from them the Greeks were instructed." The principal oracles in Egypt were those of the Theban Jupiter, of Hercules, Apollo, Minerva, Diana, Mars, and above all, of Latona, in the city of Buto, which the Egyptians held in the highest veneration; but the mode of divining was different in each of them, and the power of giving oracular answers was confined to certain deities. According to Herodotus, the first oracle in Greece was founded at Dodona, by a priestess of the Theban Jupiter, who had been carried off by Phœnician pirates, and sold into that country.

The responses of oracles were given in several different ways. At Delphi, the priestess of Apollo delivered her answers in hexameter verse, while at Dodona they were uttered from beneath the shade of a venerable oak. In several places the oracles were given by letters sealed up, and in not a few by lot. The lots were a kind of dice, on which were engraven certain characters or words, whose explanations were to be sought on tables made for the purpose. In some temples the person consulting the oracle threw the dice himself; in others they were dropped from a box; but in either case the use of the dice was preceded by sacrifices and other customary ceremonies. The belief in oracles rapidly pervaded every province, and came to exert a degree of influence which was fitted to control every department, both secular and sacred. "The oracles," says Politz, in his 'Weltgeschichte,' or World-History, "which exercised so important an influence in Greece, especially during the first periods of civilization, not unfrequently guided public opinion and the spirit of national enterprise, with distinguished wisdom. Pre-eminent among the rest, the oracle at Delphi enjoyed a world-wide renown; and there it was that the wealth and the treasures of more than one continent, were concentrated. Its responses revealed many a tyrant, and foretold his fate. Many an unhappy being was saved through its means, or directed by its counsel. It encouraged useful institutions, and communicated the discoveries in art or science under the sanction of a divine authority. And lastly, by its doctrines and example it caused the moral law to be kept holy, and civil rights to be respected."

The most famous oracles of ancient Greece were those which belonged to Apollo and to Zeus, while other deities, such as Demeter, Hermes, and Pluto, and even heroes, for example Amphiarus and Trophonius, gave forth their oracles to the credulous inquirers who flocked to learn the dark secrets of the future. And the answers, instead of being clear and satisfactory, were uniformly couched in such ambiguous terms, that they were capable of quite opposite and contradictory interpretations. Gibbon the historian charges the ancient oracles with intentional fraud, and states, with evident delight, that Constantine the Great doomed them to silence. Several writers, however, have alleged that the credit of oracles was destroyed at a much earlier period than the reign of Constantine. Lucan, in his 'Pharsalia,' which was written in the time of Nero, scarcely thirty years after the crucifixion of our Lord, laments it as one of the greatest calamities of that age, that the Delphian oracle had become silent. Lucian also declares, that when he was at Delphi, the oracle gave forth no reply. And the important statement is made by Porphyry, in a passage cited by Eusebius, that "since Jesus began to be worshipped, no man had received any public help or benefit from the gods."

The oracles of heathen antiquity were limited to Greece, never having been adopted by the Romans, who had many other means of discovering the will of the gods, such as the Sibylline books, augury, omens, and such like. The only Italian oracles, indeed, were those of Faunus and of Fortuna. The ancient Scandinavians had also their oracles, like those of Greece, and held in equal veneration. It was generally believed in all the northern nations, that the male and female divinities, or more generally, that the Three Destinies gave forth these oracles. The people sometimes persuaded themselves that the statues of their gods gave responses by a gesture, or a slight inclination of the head.

ORAL LAW. The Jews believe that two laws were delivered to Moses on Mount Sinai, the one committed to writing in the text of the Pentateuch, and the other handed down by oral tradition from generation to generation. The latter is the Oral Law, and consists of an explanation of the text or Written Law. From the time of Moses to the days of the Rabbi Judah, no part of the Oral Law had been committed to writing for public use. In every generation the president of the Sanhedrim, or the prophet of his age, wrote notes for his own private use, of the traditions which he had learned from his teachers. These were collected, arranged, and methodized by Rabbi Judah the Holy, thus forming the MISHNA (which see), a book regarded by the Jews with the highest veneration.

ORARION, a vestment worn by a deacon in the Greek Church, which, though precisely resembling the Romish stole in form, is less like it in appearance, because, instead of being worn in the fashion of a scarf, it is thrown only over the left shoulder.

ORARIUM. See STOLE.

ORATORIES. See PROSECHÆ.

ORATORIO, a sacred drama set to church music. The most noted of these pieces are Handel's Messiah and Haydn's Creation. The name Oratorio is believed to have arisen from the circumstance that sacred musical dramas originated with the congregation of the Oratory, and having been adopted by all the societies of the same foundation, speedily rose into great popularity. At first the Oratorio seems to have been little more than a simple cantata, but in a short time it assumed a dramatic form somewhat resembling the Mystery of the Middle Ages, and is now highly esteemed among the lovers of sacred music, both in Britain and on the Continent. See MUSIC (SACRED).

ORATORY (Lat. orare, to pray), a name anciently given to places of public worship in general as being houses of prayer. The name was in later times given to smaller or domestic chapels. Oratory is used among the Romanists to denote a closet or little apartment near a bed-chamber, furnished with a little altar, crucifix, and other furniture suited in their view to a place for private devotion.

ORATORY (FATHERS OF THE), a Romish order of religious founded in Italy by Philip Neri, and publicly approved by Gregory XIII. in 1577. The congregation derived its name from the chapel or oratory which Neri built for himself at Florence, and occupied for many years. To this order belonged Baronius, Raynald, and Laderchi, the distinguished authors of the Annals of the Church.

ORATORY OF THE HOLY JESUS (FATHERS OF THE), a Romish order of religious instituted in 1613 by Peter de Berulle, a man of talents and learning, who afterwards rose to the rank of a cardinal. The fathers of this French order have not, like the fathers of the Italian order, distinguished themselves by their researches in ecclesiastical history, but have devoted themselves to all branches of learning, both secular and sacred. They are not monks, but belong to the secular clergy, nor do they chant any canonical hours. They are called fathers of the oratory, because they have no churches in which the sacraments are administered, but only chapels or oratories in which they read prayers and preach.

ORBONA, a goddess among the ancient Romans worshipped at Rome, more especially by parents who had been deprived of their children, or were afraid of losing them in dangerous illness.

ORCUS. See HADES, HELL.

ORDEAL, an appeal to the judgment of God, which was often resorted to by the Saxons and Normans in criminal cases, where, in consequence of the insufficiency of the evidence, it was difficult to ascertain whether the accused was innocent or guilty. In such cases of uncertainty recourse was had to various modes of trial or ordeal. Thus the accused was not infrequently required to swear upon a copy of the New Testament, and on the relics of the holy martyrs, or on their tombs, that he was innocent of the crime imputed to him. He was also obliged to find eleven persons of good reputation who should upon oath attest his innocence. These twelve oaths were required,—eleven and his own,—to acquit a person of the wound of a noble which drew blood, or laid bare the bone, or broke a limb. Sometimes, however, thirty compurgators, as they were called, appeared on each side. Another mode of ordeal frequently resorted to in the Norman courts of this kingdom has been already described under the article BATTLE (TRIAL BY).

The most ancient form of ordeal, and the soonest laid aside, was probably the trial by the cross, which Charlemagne charged his sons to use whenever disputes should arise among them. It is thus described by Dr. Mackay, in his 'Memoirs of Extraordinary Popular Delusions:' "When a person accused of any crime had declared his innocence upon oath, and appealed to the cross for its judgment in his favour, he was brought into the church, before the altar. The priests previously prepared two sticks exactly like one another, upon one of which was carved a figure of the cross. They were both wrapped up with great care and many ceremonies, in a quantity of fine wool, and laid upon the altar, or on the relics of the saints. A solemn prayer was then offered up to God, that he would be pleased to discover, by the judgment of his holy cross, whether the accused person were innocent or guilty. A priest then approached the altar, and took up one of the sticks, and the assistants unswathed it reverently. If it was marked with the cross, the accused person was innocent; if unmarked, he was guilty. It would be unjust to assert, that the judgments thus delivered were, in all cases, erroneous; and it would be absurd to believe that they were left altogether to chance. Many true judgments were doubtless given, and, in all probability, most conscientiously; for we cannot but believe that the priests endeavoured beforehand to convince themselves by secret inquiry and a strict examination of the circumstances, whether the appellant were innocent or guilty, and that they took up the crossed or uncrossed stick accordingly. Although, to all other observers, the sticks, as enfolded in the wool, might appear exactly similar, those who enwrapped them could, without any difficulty, distinguish the one from the other." This species of ordeal was abolished by the Emperor Louis the Devout, about A.D. 820. The trial by CORNED (which see), or the morsel of execration, has been already noticed.

The other kinds of ordeal are thus sketched by Mr. Thomson in his 'Illustrations of the History of Great Britain': "The fire-ordeal was extremely ancient, since to 'handle hot iron, and walk over fire,' as a proof of innocence, is mentioned in the Antigone of Sophocles. It was ordained for free men, and consisted in taking up in the hand, unhurt, a piece of red-hot iron, weighing from one to three pounds; or else by walking unhurt and barefoot, over nine red-hot ploughshares, laid at unequal distances; in which manner Queen Emma, the mother of Edward the Confessor, cleared herself from suspicion of familiarity with Alwyn, Bishop of Winchester. The ordeal of cold water, was for eorls, and was sometimes performed by throwing the accused person into a river or pond; when, if he floated therein without any action of swimming, it was received as an evidence of his guilt, but if he sunk, he was acquitted. The trial of hot water, was plunging the bare hand or arm up to the elbow in boiling water, and taking out therefrom a stone weighing from one to three pounds, carrying it the space of nine of the accused person's feet. The iron ordeal was similar to this last, as well as to that of fire; since the hot iron was to be carried the same distance, and in both cases the hand was immediately to be bound up and sealed, and, after remaining so for three days, if the flesh did not appear foul, the accused person was not considered guilty. The performance of these trials was attended with considerable ceremony; and Athelstan ordered that those appealing to them should go three nights before to the priest who was to conduct it, and live only on bread and salt, water and herbs. He was to be present at all the masses during the interval, and on the morning of the day of trial was to make his offerings and receive the sacrament; swearing, that 'in the Lord with full folewright, he was innocent both in word and deed, of that charge of which he had been accused.' The dread of magical artifices, which was so prevalent with the Anglo-Saxons, was probably the reason why most of their corporal trials were performed fasting, and by sun rise; but ordeals were prohibited both on fasts and festivals. The fire was lighted within the church, into which no person was to enter excepting the priest and accused person, until the space were measured out, and the water were boiling furiously, in a vessel of iron, copper, lead, or clay. When all was prepared, two men were to enter of each side, and to agree that the water was boiling furiously; after which an equal number of persons was called in from both parts, not exceeding twelve, all fasting, who were placed along the church with the ordeal between them. The priest then sprinkled them with holy water, of which they were also to taste, kiss the Gospels, and be signed with the cross. During these rites, the fire was not to be mended any more; and if the ordeal were by iron, it remained on the coals until the last collect was finished, when it was removed to the staples which were to sustain it. The extent of the trial appears to have been decided by the accusation since the ordeal was sometimes called anfeald, or single, when the stone or iron was probably only three pounds in weight, and when the defendant dipped only his hand and wrist in the water; but in other cases the ordeal was entitled threefold, when the whole arm was plunged into the cauldron, and the iron was to be of three pounds weight. Whilst the accused was taking out the stone or bearing the iron, nothing was to be uttered but a prayer to the Deity to discover the truth; after which, it was to be left for three days undecided. The ordeal might be compounded for, and it has been supposed that there were many means even for performing it unhurt; as collusion with the priest, the length of ceremony and distance of the few spectators, and preparations for hardening the skin, aided by the short distance which the suspected person had to bear the iron.

"In all these cases, if the accused party escaped unhurt, he was of course adjudged innocent; but if it happened otherwise, he was condemned as guilty. A thief found criminal by the ordeal, was to be put to death, unless his relations would pay his legal valuation, the amount of the goods, and give security for his good behaviour. As these trials were originally invented to preserve innocence from false accusation, under the notion that heaven would always, miraculously, interpose to protect the guiltless, they were called 'the judgment of God;' and the word ordeal itself, is derived from a Celtic origin, signifying judgment. It was also entitled the 'common purgation,' to distinguish it from the canonical one, which was by oath; but both in England and in Sweden, the clergy presided at the trial, and it was also performed upon sacred ground. The canon law at a very early period, however, declared the ordeal to be against that divine command, 'Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God;' but in King John's time, there were grants to the bishops and clergy to use the judgment by fire, water, and iron; and it was not until about 1218, that it was abolished under Henry III."

In modern heathen nations we find the ordeal not unfrequently in use. Thus, among the Hindus, the fire-ordeal is known and practised, as appears from the following brief extract from Forbes's 'Oriental Memoirs': "When a man, accused of a capital crime, chooses to undergo the ordeal trial, he is closely confined for several days; his right hand and arm are covered with thick wax-cloth, tied up and sealed, in the presence of proper officers, to prevent deceit. In the English districts the covering was always sealed with the Company's arms, and the prisoner placed under an European guard. At the time fixed for the ordeal, a cauldron of oil is placed over a fire; when it boils, a piece of money is dropped into the vessel; the prisoner's arm is unsealed and washed in the presence of his judges and accusers. During this part of the ceremony the attendant Brahmins supplicate the Deity. On receiving their benediction, the accused plunges his hand into the boiling fluid, and takes out the coin. The arm is afterwards again sealed up until the time appointed for a re-examination. The seal is then broken: if no blemish appears, the prisoner is declared innocent; if the contrary, he suffers the punishment due to his crime."

Among the natives of Northern Guinea a species of ordeal is in use for the detection of witchcraft. It goes by the name of the red-water ordeal, the red water employed for this purpose being a decoction made from the inner bark of a large forest tree of the mimosa family. The mode in which this ordeal is practised is thus described by Mr. Wilson: "A good deal of ceremony is used in connection with the administration of the ordeal. The people who assemble to see it administered form themselves into a circle, and the pots containing the liquid are placed in the centre of the inclosed space. The accused then comes forward, having the scantiest apparel, but with a cord of palm-leaves bound round his waist, and seats himself in the centre of the circle. After his accusation is announced, he makes a formal acknowledgment of all the evil deeds of his past life, then invokes the name of God three times, and imprecates his wrath in case he is guilty of the particular crime laid to his charge. He then steps forward and drinks freely of the 'red-water.' If it nauseates and causes him to vomit freely, he suffers no serious injury, and is at once pronounced innocent. If, on the other hand, it causes vertigo and he loses his self-control, it is regarded as evidence of guilt, and then all sorts of indignities and cruelties are practised upon him. A general howl of indignation rises from the surrounding spectators. Children and others are encouraged to hoot at him, pelt him with stones, spit upon him, and in many instances he is seized by the heels and dragged through the bushes and over rocky places until his body is shamefully lacerated and life becomes extinct. Even his own kindred are required to take part in these cruel indignities, and no outward manifestation of grief is allowed in behalf of a man who has been guilty of so odious a crime.

"On the other hand, if he escapes without injury, his character is thoroughly purified, and he stands on a better footing in society than he did before he submitted to the ordeal. After a few days, he is decked out in his best robes; and, accompanied by a large train of friends, he enjoys a sort of triumphal procession over the town where he lives, receives the congratulations of his friends, and the community in general; and not unfrequently, presents are sent to him by friends from neighbouring villages. After all this is over, he assembles the principal men of the town, and arraigns his accusers before them, who, in their turn, must submit to the same ordeal, or pay a large fine to the man whom they attempted to injure." A similar process is followed in Southern Guinea for the detection of witchcraft. At the Gabun the root used is called NKAZYA (which see).

The natives on the Grain Coast have another species of ordeal, called the "hot oil ordeal," which is used to detect petty thefts, and in cases where women are suspected of infidelity to their husbands. The suspected person is required to plunge the hand into a pot of boiling oil. If it is withdrawn without pain, he is innocent. If he suffers pain, he is guilty, and fined or punished as the case may require.

The ordeal seems not to have been altogether unknown among the ancient Greeks and Romans. Thus in the Antigone of Sophocles, in a passage to which we have already alluded, the poet speaks of persons "offering, in proof of innocence, to grasp the burning steel, to walk through fire, and take their solemn oath, they knew not of the deed." Pliny also, speaking of a feast which the ancient Romans celebrated annually in honour of the sun, observes that the priests, who were to be of the family of the Hirpians, danced on this occasion barefoot on burning coals without burning themselves; which is evidently an allusion to the fiery ordeal. It was from the Northern nations, however, particularly the ancient Danes, that the ordeal was most probably derived by the Anglo-Saxons and Normans. It was sanctioned indeed by public law in most of the countries in the ninth century, and gradually gave way before more enlightened principles of legislation.

ORDER, a term used at one time to denote the rules of a monastic institution, but afterwards employed to signify the several monasteries living under the same rule.

ORDERS, one of the seven sacraments of the Church of Rome. It refers to the consecration of the different orders of office-bearers in the church. Of these in the Roman hierarchy there are seven,—porters or door-keepers, readers, exorcists, acolytes, subdeacons, deacons, and priests. To these some add an eighth, the order of bishops; others, however, consider it not as a distinct order, but as a higher degree of the priesthood. The original mode of ORDINATION (which see) followed by the apostles appears to have been simple, ministers and deacons having been ordained by prayer and the imposition of hands. In process of time various additional ceremonies came to be introduced. In the Church of Rome the plan was adopted of delivering to a priest the sacred vessels—the paten and the chalice—and accompanying this action with certain words which authorize him to celebrate mass, and offer sacrifice to God. In the ordination of a priest, the matter is the vessels which are delivered to him, and the form is the pronouncing of these words, "Take thou authority to offer up sacrifices to God, and to celebrate masses both for the dead and for the living, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."

ORDERS (MONASTIC). See MONACHISM.

ORDIBARII, a party of CATHARISTS (which see), in the seventh and following centuries, who taught that a Trinity first began to exist at the birth of Christ. The man Jesus became Son of God by his reception of the Word communicated to him, and he was the son of Mary, not in a corporeal but in a spiritual sense, being born of her in a spiritual manner, by the communication of the Word; and when, by the preaching of Jesus, others were attracted, the Holy Ghost began to exist. The most important of the peculiar doctrines maintained by this sect are thus noticed by Neander: "According to their doctrine, repentance must have respect not only to all single sins, but first of all to that common sin of the souls that fell from God, which preceded their existence in time. This is the consciousness of the apostasy from God, of the inward estrangement from him, and pain on account of this inner aversion to God, as constituting the only foundation of true penitence. As the Gnostics supposed that, by virtue of the new birth, every soul is reunited to its corresponding male half, the higher spirit of the pleroma, so the Catharist party of which we are speaking supposed, in this case, a restoration of the relation between the soul and its corresponding spirit, from which it had been separated by the apostasy.

From this spirit they distinguished the Paraclete, promised by Christ, the Consolator, into fellowship with whom one should enter by the spiritual baptism, which they called, therefore, the consolamentum. They held that there were many such higher spirits, ministering to the vigour of the higher life. But from all these they distinguished the Holy Spirit, pre-eminently so to be called, as being exalted above all others, and whom they designated as the Spiritus principalis, the principal Spirit. They held to a threefold judgment; first, the expulsion of the apostate souls from heaven; second, that which began with the appearance of Christ; third and last, when Christ shall raise his redeemed to that higher condition which is designed for them. This they regarded as the final consummation, when the souls shall be reunited with the spirits and with the higher organs they had left behind them in heaven. This was their resurrection." The whole system of the Ordibarii indicates their connection with a Jewish theology, and in farther confirmation of this view of their doctrines, it may be stated, that they attached a peculiar value to the apocryphal book called the Ascension of Isaiah, where in fact the germs of many of their opinions are to be found.

ORDINAL, the book which contains the forms observed in the Church of England for the ordination and consecration of bishops, priests, and deacons. It was prepared in the time of Edward the Sixth, and confirmed at the same time by the authority of Parliament.

ORDINANCES (HOLY), institutions of Divine authority to be observed by the Christian church in all ages. Those rites and ceremonies which are not sanctioned by the Word of God, being of merely human appointment, are not entitled to the name of Holy Ordinances.

ORDINANCES (THE THIRTEEN). See TELESDIUTANGA.

ORDINARY, a term used in England to denote a person who has ecclesiastical jurisdiction, of course and of common right; in opposition to persons who are extraordinarily appointed. Ordinary was a title anciently given to archdeacons.

ORDINATION, the act of setting apart to the holy office of the ministry. The method of ordination or appointment to the office of a religious teacher in the Christian church, was derived not from any of the Levitical institutions, but rather from the ordinances of the synagogue as they were constituted after the Babylonish captivity. According to Selden and Vitringa, the presidents and readers of the synagogue were at first set apart to their office by the solemn imposition of hands. At an after period, other ceremonies came to be added, such as anointing with oil, investiture with the sacred garments, and the delivery of the sacred vessels into the hands of the person ordained; the last-mentioned rite being evidently an imitation of the filling of the hands referred to in Exod. xxix. 24, Lev. xxi. 10, Num. iii.

3, as having been practised in the consecration of the Jewish priests and high-priests.

The first instance on record of the ordination of office-bearers in the Christian Church, is that of the seven deacons at Jerusalem in Acts vi. 1—7. Though the office to which these men were appointed had reference to the secular and financial arrangements of the church, it is worthy of notice, that even to this office they were set apart by prayer and the imposition of hands. Various other passages of the New Testament give an account of the ordination of Christian teachers and office-bearers. Among these may be mentioned Acts xiii. 1—4; xiv. 23; 1 Tim. iv. 14; v. 22; 2 Tim. i. 6, in all of which three particulars are laid down as included in the ceremony of ordination—fasting, prayer, and the laying on of hands.

It has been the invariable practice in every age of the church to observe some solemn ceremonies in setting apart any man to the sacred functions of the ministry; and in the most ancient liturgies, both of the Eastern and the Western churches, are found certain special forms of ordination. Nor has the observance of the rites of ordination been confined to one section of the Christian church; but it has extended to all denominations of Christians, and even to schismatics and heretics. And while the ministry of the word has always been deemed a peculiarly sacred office, and ordination to the ministry a solemn transaction, every precaution was used in the ancient church to prevent unworthy persons from intruding themselves rashly into the ministerial office. Certain qualifications, accordingly, were regarded as indispensable in the candidate for ordination. Thus it was necessary that any one who wished to take upon himself the sacred functions should be of a certain specified age. The rules by which the canonical age for ordination were regulated in the early Christian Church, were, no doubt, derived from the Jewish economy; the age of twenty-five required for the Levites being adopted for deacons, and that of thirty years required for priests being adopted for presbyters and bishops. In the Apostolical Constitutions we find fifty years prescribed as the age for a bishop, but no long time seems to have elapsed when it was reduced to thirty. Nay, even cases occurred in which individuals, probably of eminent qualifications, were raised to the episcopal dignity at an earlier age than even thirty. Justin alleges the lowest age for a bishop to be thirty-five years. The Roman bishops, Siricius and Zosimus, required thirty years for a deacon, thirty-five for a presbyter, and forty-five for a bishop. The Council of Trent fixed the age for a deacon at twenty-three, and that for a priest at twenty-five. Children were sometimes appointed to the office of reader, but by the laws of Justinian none were to be appointed to that office under twelve years of age. The age for subdeacons, acolyths, and other inferior officers, varied, ranging at different times from fifteen to twenty-five.

Every candidate for ordination was required to undergo a strict examination in regard more especially to his faith, but also to his morals and his worldly condition. The conduct of the examination was intrusted chiefly to the bishops, but it was held in public, and the people were allowed to take a part in it, while their approval of the candidate was equally requisite with that of the bishop. That the people might have full opportunity of making inquiry into the character and qualifications of the candidates their names were published. By a law of Justinian each candidate was required to give a written statement of his religious opinions in his own hand-writing, and to take a solemn oath against simony. It was decreed also, by a council in the beginning of the ninth century, that every candidate should go through a course of preparation or probation previous to his being ordained.

It was a rule in the early church that no person should be ordained to the higher offices without passing beforehand through the inferior degrees. This arrangement was productive of much advantage, as it secured, on the part of every aspirant to the ministerial office, the possession of considerable professional experience, and a familiar acquaintance with the whole system of ecclesiastical discipline and polity. As a general rule, which, however, admitted of some exceptions, no individual was ordained to a ministry at large, but to the exercise of the pastoral functions in some specified church or locality. Non-residence was also expressly discontenanced, every pastor being expected to remain within his allotted district. The clerical tonsure was not made requisite for the ordained ministry until about the end of the fifth or beginning of the sixth century. In the fourth, and throughout the greater part of the fifth century, it is mentioned in terms of disapprobation as unbecoming spiritual persons.

From the canons of councils, and the testimony of many ecclesiastical writers. Episcopalians conclude that the power of administering the rite of ordination was vested in the bishop alone, the presbyter being only allowed to assist the bishop in the ordination of a fellow-presbyter. Ordination was always required to be performed publicly in the presence of the congregation, and during the first four centuries there does not appear to have been any stated seasons appointed for the performance of the rite. Afterwards, however, ordinations took place on the Lord's day, and usually in connection with the celebration of the Lord's Supper, the candidate kneeling before the table.

It was customary in early times for those who were preparing for ordination to observe a season of fasting and prayer. The service itself consisted simply of prayer and the imposition of hands, the latter practice being considered by many as differing from the common imposition of hands at baptism, confirmation, and absolution. No mention occurs previous to the ninth century, of the practice of anointing the candidate for holy orders. The Greek Church has never used it. It is not mentioned in the fourth council of Carthage; where the rites of ordination are described; nor was it the practice in the time of Pope Nicholas I., who died in A. D. 867. The custom of delivering the sacred vessels, ornaments, and vestments appears not to have been fully introduced until the seventh century, though some trace of it is to be found at an earlier date. The badges and insignia differed according to the nature of the office to which the individual was ordained. Thus at the ordination of a bishop, a Bible was laid upon his head, or put into his hands, in order to remind him that it was his duty habitually to search the Word of God; a ring was put upon his finger in token of his espousals to the church, and a staff was put into his hand as an emblem of his office as a shepherd to whose care the flock was committed. The presbyter, in the act of ordination, received the sacramental cup and plate. On the deacon, when set apart to his office, the bishop solemnly laid his right hand, and presented him with a copy of the Gospels. The sub-deacon received an empty paten and cup, with a ewer and napkin; the reader received a copy of the Scriptures; the acolyth, a candlestick with a taper, and the doorkeeper the keys of the church. The custom was also introduced of signing the party ordained with the sign of the cross, and at the close of the solemn service he received the kiss of charity from the ordaining minister.

It has been already noticed that in the early church, ordination was not given unless to a special charge, and with few exceptions this continued to be the rule until the age of Charlemagne, when laws required to be enacted against the clerici accipuli, in consequence of the great number of clergy who were not regularly settled in parochial cures. Many of these were the domestic chaplains of noblemen or private gentlemen, while others were clergymen who had received vague or general ordination, a practice which had been introduced in the seventh century. At length, however, in A. D. 877, the bishops resolved to abandon the practice of vague ordinations, and to adhere strictly to the practice of the ancient church. Yet so difficult is it to root out an abuse when once it has crept into the church, that at the end of the tenth century, the practice of vague ordination continued extensively to prevail.

Ordination is practised in all modern churches, though their views of the rite seem to differ considerably. In the Church of Rome the delivery of the vessels, according to the Ordinal, is the essential ordaining act. This, indeed, is expressly declared by the Council of Florence, in A. D. 1439, which says, "The matter or visible sign of the order of priesthood is the delivery of the chalice with wine in it, and of a paten with bread upon it, into the hands of the person to be ordained." The form of words with which this ordaining act is accompanied, runs thus, "Receive thou power to offer sacrifice to God, and to celebrate masses both for the living and for the dead. In the name of the Lord." The delivery of the vessels, as a part of the ordination service, has never been in use in the Greek Church, but is exclusively confined to the Latin Church.

In the Church of England no person can be ordained who has not what is called a title for orders, that is, "some certain place where he might use his function." He must have secured the presentation to a curacy, or a chaplaincy, or he must be the fellow of a college, or a "master of arts of five years standing, that liveth of his own charge in either of the universities," before he can be ordained. The most general title for orders is a curacy. "And if any bishop shall admit any person into the ministry that hath none of these titles as aforesaid, then he shall keep and maintain him with all things necessary, till he do prefer him to some ecclesiastical living." The bishops have absolute power to refuse ordination to any party whom they may consider ineligible. The usual course is as follows:—The candidate writes to the bishop of the diocese in which the curacy offered to him as a title is situated, and requests to be ordained. He obtains a personal interview with the bishop, and passes through a viva voce examination as to his theological opinions and attainments. If approved, he is permitted to send in his papers—that is, the registers of his age and baptism, testimonials from his college, a certificate of character attested by three beneficed clergymen, and another document called Si quis, which is a paper signed by the clergyman and church-wardens of the parish in which the candidate resides, and which certifies that his name has been publicly called in the parish church, and that no objections have been raised against his being admitted into the ministry. He is now allowed to proceed, with the other candidates, to the examination, which is conducted by the bishop's examining chaplain, and is sustained, in some dioceses, during the whole of three or four days. It is strictly theological and ecclesiastical. The approved candidates take the Oath of Supremacy, sign a 'Declaration' that they will conform to the Liturgy, and, moreover, subscribe the thirty-nine articles.

"The ordination service, as arranged in the Book of Common Prayer, is performed in the cathedral of the diocese, or in some church or chapel, in the presence of the congregation. The candidates are there formally introduced to the bishop by the archdeacon, or his deputy, in these words:—Reverend Father in God—I present unto you these persons present to be admitted deacons.' Towards the close of the service, the bishop, laying his hands severally upon their heads, says—'Take thou authority to execute the office of a deacon in the Church of God committed unto thee, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.' And then, placing the New Testament in the hand of each, he adds—'Take thou authority to read the Gospel in the Church of God, and to preach the same, if thou be thereto licensed by the bishop himself.' The Ordination Service in the case of a priest differs in some measure from the service which admits to the order of deacon. Several of the presbyters present, as well as the bishop, lay their hands simultaneously on the head of every candidate, and the bishop says—'Receive the Holy Ghost for the office and work of a Priest in the Church of God, now committed unto thee by the imposition of our hands. Whose sins thou dost forgive they are forgiven; and whose sins thou dost retain they are retained; and be thou a faithful dispenser of the Word of God, and of his holy Sacraments: In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.' And then, delivering to each one a Bible, he adds—'Take thou authority to preach the Word of God, and to minister the holy Sacraments in the congregation where thou shalt be lawfully appointed thereunto.' When once ordained a presbyter, he is competent to take any duty, and to hold any kind of preferment short of a bishopric, within the pale of the Church of England." A person must be twenty-three years of age before he can be ordained deacon; and twenty-four before he can be ordained priest, and thus be permitted to administer the Lord's Supper. The times of ordination in the Church of England are the four Sundays immediately following the Ember weeks; being the second Sunday in Lent, Trinity Sunday, and the Sundays following the first Wednesday after the 14th of September, and the 13th of December. These are the stated times, but ordination may take place at any time which the bishop may appoint.

In countries where Lutheranism has a regular establishment, only the general superintendent, or at least a superintendent, performs the rite of ordination; yet the Lutheran church allows this power also to all other clergymen. The manner in which the Lutherans ordain their ministers is as follows: "When a student of divinity has finished his course of theological studies, he applies to the consistory of his native district for admission to a theological examination; which is never refused him, except for very important reasons. Such theological examinations are held by every consistory once, or if necessary twice, every year; and in each one of them seldom fewer than ten students are examined in the originals both of the Old and New Testament, in Divinity, in Christian Morals, in Ecclesiastical History, in Composition, and Catechising Children; and, in some countries, also in Philosophy, and the Ecclesiastical Law. The examination in the theoretical sciences is conducted in the Latin language. Those who have acquired a sufficient knowledge of the different theological sciences, obtain a claim for an ecclesiastical preferment. When a candidate is presented to a living, he is again examined, to ascertain if he has continued his theological studies since he has been received into the number of candidates for the ministry; (in many cases, however, an exception is made to this rule;) and if a second time he prove worthy of the ministry, he is solemnly ordained by the general superintendent of the country or district, assisted by at least two other clergymen, in the church of which he becomes the minister; and at the same time he is introduced to his future congregation. Whoever has been thus ordained, may ascend to the highest ecclesiastical dignity, without undergoing any other ordination."

Episcopalians deny the right of presbyters to ordain, alleging that such a right belongs exclusively to bishops. But, in opposition to episcopal ordination, Presbyterians are accustomed to urge that Timothy is expressly declared in 1 Tim. iv. 14, to have been ordained by the laying on of the hands of the presbytery; and further, that in Scripture language bishops and presbyters are identical. Besides, from ecclesiastical history we learn, that in the church of Alexandria presbyters ordained even their own bishops for more than two hundred years in the earliest ages of Christianity. In Presbyterian churches, accordingly, the power of ordination rests in the presbytery, and the service consists simply of prayer and the imposition of hands. It has been supposed by some, that the laying on of hands in ordination had exclusive reference to the communication of extraordinary gifts, and therefore ought now to be dispensed with, such gifts having ceased. Under the influence of such views, the Church of Scotland, at an early period of its history, discarded this symbolic rite, and hence in the First Book of Discipline we find this passage, "Albeit the apostles used the imposition of hands, yet seeing the miracle is ceased, the using the ceremony we judge not to be necessary." Such an idea, however, prevailed only for a time, and the imposition of hands came to be regarded as an essential part of the rite of ordination. Among the Wesleyan Methodists ordination is vested in the General Conference, and the ceremony consists of a solemn service with imposition of hands. The Congregationalists consider ordination to be simply a matter of order, completing and solemnizing the entrance of the minister on his pastoral engagements; hence, in this denomination of Christians, the church officers, whether pastors or deacons, are dedicated to the duties of their office with special prayer and by solemn designation, to which most of the churches add the imposition of hands by those already in office. In the view of the Congregationalists the pastoral tie is considered as resting, in subordination to the Great Head of the Church, on the call of the church members, and ordination is simply the formal recognition of the tie thus formed. This view of the matter is diametrically opposed to the doctrine of the Romish church, which regards orders as a holy sacrament, conveying an INDELIBLE CHARACTER (which see), flowing down by regular succession from the apostles.

ORIGENISTS, the followers of Origen, one of the most celebrated of the Christian fathers. He was a native of Alexandria in Egypt, having been born there in A. D. 185. From his father Leonides, who was a devoted Christian, he received a liberal and thoroughly Christian education, and having early become a subject of divine grace, he manifested so warm an attachment to sacred things, that his pious parent was wont to thank God who had given him such a son, and would often, when the boy was asleep, uncover his breast, kissing it as a temple where the Holy Spirit designed to prepare his dwelling. In studying the Word of God, Origen insensibly imbibed, probably from constitutional temperament, a preference for the allegorical over the natural method of interpretation. At first, indeed, this tendency was checked rather than encouraged, but through the influence of the Alexandrian school, and more especially of Clemens, one of its earliest teachers, he became an allegorist of an extreme character. And besides, his opinions were considerably modified by his attendance on the lectures of Ammonius Saccas, the teacher of Plotinus, who founded the school of the Neo-Platonists. From this date commenced the great change in the theological tendency of Origen's mind. He now set himself to examine all human systems, and only to hold that fast as the truth which he found after severe and impartial examination. To arrive at a more intimate acquaintance with the sacred writings, he studied the Hebrew language after he had reached the age of manhood.

The talents and attainments of Origen as a theologian led to his appointment to the office of a catechist at Alexandria. His opportunities of usefulness were thus much extended. Multitudes resorted to him for religious instruction, and directing his attention chiefly to the more advanced catechumens, he gave public lectures on the various systems of the ancient philosophers, pointing out the utter inadequacy of human learning and speculation to satisfy the religious wants of man, thus leading his hearers gradually to the inspired writings as the only source of all true knowledge of divine things. One great object, both of his oral lectures and his published works, was to counteract the influence of the Gnostics, who had succeeded in perverting the views of many Christians. But in exposing the errors of others, Origen himself incurred the charge of heresy. Combining the doctrines of the Platonic system with those of Christianity, he ran, in some of his writings at least, into wild and unbridled speculation. The consequence was, that Demetrius, the bishop of Alexandria, prohibited him from exercising the office of a public teacher, and drove him to the resolution of quitting his native city, and taking refuge with his friends at Cæsarea in Palestine. The persecutions of Demetrius, however, followed him even there. A numerous synod of Egyptians having been summoned, Origen was declared as a heretic, and excluded from the communion of the church. A doctrinal controversy now commenced between two opposite parties. The churches in Palestine, Arabia, Phœnicia, and Achaia espoused the cause of Origen; the Church of Rome declared against him.

During the residence of Origen in Palestine, he was ordained as a presbyter at Cæsarea, and besides his clerical duties, he employed himself in training a number of young men to occupy the important position of church-teachers. Here also he wrote several of his literary productions, and maintained an active correspondence with the most distinguished theologians in Cappadocia, Palestine, and Arabia. In the course of the persecution of the Christians by Maximin the Thracian, Origen was compelled frequently to change his place of residence, and for two years he was concealed in the house of Juliana, a Christian virgin, employing himself in the emendation and improvement of the text of the Alexandrian version of the Old Testament. Availing himself of the leisure which his retirement afforded, he succeeded in completing his great work, the HEXAPLA (which see). Under the reign of the Emperor Gordian, in A. D. 238, he returned once more to Cæsarea, and resumed his earlier labours. Throughout the rest of his life he continued with indefatigable ardour to prosecute his literary and theological pursuits. In the Decian persecution he was thrown into prison, and subjected to torture, but he was not ashamed to confess his Lord. At length, worn out by his labours and sufferings, he died about A. D. 254, in the seventieth year of his age.

The opinions of Origen were maintained with zeal after his death by many of his disciples. In Egypt there now existed two opposite parties of Origenists and Anti-Origenists. In the fourth century they appear again, chiefly among the Egyptian monks, under the names of Anthropomorphites and Origenists. One of the most eminent of the followers of Origen was Gregory Thaumaturgus or the Wonder-worker, who was chiefly instrumental in spreading Origenist opinions in the fourth century, and through his zealous labours Christianity became widely diffused in Pontus. The writings of Origen, however, formed the chief source of the extraordinary influence which this distinguished man exercised over some of the most eminent church-teachers of the East, among whom may be mentioned Eusebius of Cæsarea, Gregory of Nazianzen, Basil of Cæsarea, and Gregory of Nyssa. Origen, indeed, bore the same relation to the theological development of the Eastern church, that the great Augustin bore to the Western.

The chief characteristic of the Origenistic school was a strong desire to extract from the Sacred Writings a mystical meaning, and thus they too often fell into the error of losing sight altogether of their historical sense, and even rejecting it as untrue. But the principal heresies with which they were chargeable were derived from the work of Origen 'On Principles,' a work which was pervaded throughout by doctrines drawn from the writings of the Greek philosophers, especially those of Plato. Some have even accused this speculative writer of having given origin to the Arian heresy. His views of the Trinity, it must be admitted, were such as were likely to afford too much ground for such a charge. He seems to have distinguished the substance of the Father from that of the Son, to have affirmed the inferiority of the Holy Spirit to the Son, and even to have regarded both the Son and the Spirit as creatures. He held the pre-existence of human souls, that is, their existence before the Mosaic creation, if not from eternity; and that in their pre-existent state they were clothed in ethereal bodies suited to their peculiar nature and condition. He taught that souls were doomed to inhabit mortal bodies in this world as a punishment for faults committed in their pre-existent state. He maintained that the human soul of Christ was created before the beginning of the world, and united to the Divine Word in a state of pristine glory. He alleged, also, that at the resurrection mankind shall lay aside the gross material bodies with which they are clothed in this world, and shall be again clothed with refined ethereal bodies. Origen appears to have been a Restorationist, believing that after certain periods of time the lost souls in hell shall be released from their torments and restored to a new state of probation; and that the earth, after the great conflagration, shall become habitable again, and be the abode of men and of other animals. This process of alternate renovation and destruction he supposed would last throughout eternal ages.

Towards the close of the fourth century a strong party gradually arose which violently opposed the doctrines of Origen. At the head of this party stood Epiphanius of Palestine, who, in his works, openly declared Origen to be a heretic, and demanded of the leaders of the Alexandrian school in Palestine to support his views. This called forth Rufinus, who, to spread the fame of Origen in the West, and at the same time to vindicate him from the charge of heresy, published a translation of Origen's work 'On Principles,' into the Latin language, altering such passages as had been objected to, and rendering them as far as possible agreeable to the orthodox opinions. In A. D. 399 Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, who had at one time been an admirer of Origen, passed a sentence of condemnation upon his memory, and was sanctioned in his decision by the Roman Church. The monks who favoured Origen he loaded with abuse, but they found a kind protector in Chrysostom, bishop of Constantinople.

In the sixth century a party of monks in the East venerated the name of Origen in consequence of the relation which his opinions seemed to bear to the doctrines of the Monophysites. This Origenistic party, however, met with violent opposition from a class of Anti-Origenists, who prevailed upon the Emperor Justinian to authorize the assembling of a synod in A. D. 541, which formally condemned Origen and his doctrines, in fifteen canons. This condemnation was renewed in the fifth general council, which met at Constantinople in A. D. 553, and the circumstance that such a decree was passed in an œcumenical council had great influence in bringing about the more general practice in later times, of treating Origen as a heretic.

ORIGINAL ANTIBURGHERS, the name usually given to a small body of Christians which seceded in 1806 from the General Associate (Antiburgher) Synod in Scotland. The occasion of this secession was what is generally known by the name of the Old and New Light Controversy, which chiefly turned upon the question as to the power of the civil magistrate in matters of religion. On this subject the early Seceders strongly adhered to what is commonly termed the Establishment principle. In course of time, however, a change began to manifest itself in the opinions of a portion of the Secession body, who were disposed to doubt the expediency and Scriptural authority of National Establishments of religion. The subject came at length to be openly agitated in the General Associate Synod in 1793, and from that date New-Light or Anti-Establishment principles made rapid progress in the body. The alarming extent, however, of the change which had taken place in the views of the Antiburgher section of the Secession on the subject of civil establishments of religion, did not become fully apparent until a new Secession Testimony, under the name of "The Narrative and Testimony," was laid before the synod at its meeting in 1793. This document differed in several important particulars from the Original Testimony, but chiefly on the question as to the power of the civil magistrate in matters of religion. Year after year the subject was keenly discussed, and it was not until 1804 that the "Narrative and Testimony" was adopted by the General Synod. A small number of members, however, headed by Dr. Thomas McCrie, protested against the New Testimony as embodying, in their view, important deviations from the original principles of the First Seceders. When at length the Narrative and Testimony came to be enacted as a term of communion, Dr. McCrie, and the brethren who adhered to his sentiments, felt that it was difficult for them conscientiously to remain in communion with the synod. They were most reluctant to separate from their brethren, and, accordingly, they retained their position in connection with the body for two years after the New Testimony had been adopted by the synod.

At length the four brethren, Messrs. Bruce, Aitken, Hog, and M'Crie, finding that they could no longer content themselves with mere unavailing protests against the doings of the synod, solemnly separated from the body, and constituted themselves into a presbytery, under the designation of the Constitutional Associate Presbytery. But though they had thus taken this important step, they did not consider it prudent to make a public announcement of their meeting until they had full time to publish the reasons for the course they had adopted. But as they did not affect secrecy in the matter, intelligence of the movement reached the General Associate Synod, then sitting in Glasgow, which accordingly, without the formalities of a legal trial, deposed and excommunicated Dr. M'Crie.

The points of difference between the Original Secession Testimony, and the "Narrative and Testimony" which led to the secession of the four Protesters, and the formation of the Constitutional Associate Presbytery, cannot be better stated than in the following extract from the explanatory Address which Dr. M'Crie delivered at the time to his own congregation: "The New Testimony expressly asserts that the power competent to worldly kingdoms is to be viewed as 'respecting only the secular interests of society,' the secular interests of society only, in distinction from their religious interests. It is easy to see that this principle not only tends to exclude nations and their rulers from all interference with religion, from employing their power for promoting a religious reformation and advancing the kingdom of Christ, but also virtually condemns what the rulers of this land did in former times of reformation, which the original Testimony did bear witness to as a work of God. Accordingly, this reformation is viewed all along through the new papers as a mere ecclesiastical reformation; and the laws made by a reforming Parliament, &c., in as far as they recognised, ratified, and established the reformed religion, are either omitted, glossed over or explained away. In the account of the First Reformation, the abolition of the laws in favour of Popery is mentioned, but a total and designed silence is observed respecting all the laws made in favour of the Protestant Confession and Discipline, by which the nation, in its most public capacity, stated itself on the side of Christ's cause, and even the famous deed of civil constitution, settled on a reformed footing in 1592, is buried and forgotten. The same thing is observable in the account of the Second Reformation. On one occasion it is said that the king 'gave his consent to such acts as were thought necessary, for securing the civil and religious right of the nation;' without saying whether this were right or wrong. But all the other laws of the reforming Parliaments during that period, which were specified and approved in the former papers of the Secession, and even the settlement of the civil constitution in 1649, which has formerly been considered as the crowning part of Scotland's Reformation and liberties, is passed over without mention or testimony. Even that wicked act of the Scottish Parliament after the Restoration of Charles II., by which all the laws establishing and ratifying the Presbyterian religion and covenants were rescinded, is passed over in its proper place in the acknowledgment of sins, and when it is mentioned, is condemned with a reserve; nor was this done inadvertently, for if the Presbyterian religion ought not to have been established by law, it is not easy to condemn a Parliament for rescinding that Establishment.

"Another point which has been in controversy, is the national obligation of the religious covenants entered into in this land. The doctrine of the new Testimony is, that 'religious covenanting is entirely an ecclesiastical duty;' that persons enter into it 'as members of the Church, and not as members of the State;' that 'those invested with civil power have no other concern with it than as Church members;' and accordingly it restricts the obligation of the covenants of this land to persons of all ranks only in their spiritual character, and as Church members. But it cannot admit of a doubt, that the National and Solemn League and Covenant were national oaths, in the most proper sense of the word; that they were intended as such by those who framed them, and that they were entered into in this view by the three kingdoms; the civil rulers entering into them, enacting them, and setting them forward in their public capacity, as well as the ecclesiastical. And the uniform opinion of Presbyterians, from the time that they were taken, has been, that they are binding in a national as well as an ecclesiastical point of view. I shall only produce the testimony of one respectable writer (Principal Forrester): 'The binding force (says he) of these engagements appears in the subjects they affect, as, first, Our Church in her Representatives, and in their most public capacity, the General Assemblies in both nations; second, The State Representatives and Parliaments. Thus, all assurances are given that either civil or ecclesiastical laws can afford; and the public faith of Church and State is plighted with inviolable ties; so that they must stand while we have a Church or State in Scotland; both as men and as Christians, as members of the Church and State, under either a religious or civil consideration, we stand hereby inviolably engaged; and not only Representatives, but also the Incorporation (or body) of Church and State, are under the same.' On this broad ground have Presbyterians stated the obligation of the Covenants of this land. And why should they not? Why should we seek to narrow their obligation? Are we afraid that these lands should be too closely bound to the Lord? If religious covenanting be a moral duty, if oaths and vows are founded in the light of nature as well as in the Word of God, why should not men be capable of entering into them, and of being bound by them in every character in which they are placed under the moral government of God, as men and as Christians, as members of the Church and of the State, whenever there is a call to enter into such covenants as have a respect to all these characters, as was the case in the covenants of our ancestors, which Seceders have witnessed for and formally renewed? In the former Testimony witness was expressly borne to the national obligation of these Covenants. In speaking of the National Covenant, it says, 'By this solemn oath and covenant this kingdom made a national surrender of themselves unto the Lord.' It declares that the Solemn League and Covenant was entered into, and binding upon the three kingdoms—that both of them are binding upon the church and lands, and the church and nations; the deed of civil constitution is said to have been settled in consequence of the most solemn covenant engagements, and the rescinding of the law in favour of the true religion is testified against as an act of national perjury. Yet by the new Testimony all are bound to declare, that religious covenanting is entirely an ecclesiastical duty, and binding only on the Church and her members as such; and that 'those invested with civil power have no other concern with it but as Church members.' Is it any wonder that there should be Seceders who cannot submit to receive such doctrine? The time will come, when it will be matter of astonishment that so few have appeared in such a cause, and that those who have appeared should be borne down, opposed, and spoken against. It is not a matter of small moment to restrict the obligation of solemn oaths, the breach of which is chargeable upon a land, or to explain away any part of that obligation. The quarrel of God's covenant is not yet thoroughly pled by him against these guilty and apostatizing lands, and all that have any due sense of the inviolable obligation of them, should tremble at touching or enervating them in the smallest point."

At the request of the brethren, Dr. McCrie drew up and published a paper explanatory of the principles involved in the controversy, which had led to the breach. This work appeared in April 1807, and was regarded by those who took an interest in the subject, as exhibiting a very satisfactory view of the principles of the Constitutional Associate Presbytery. But however able, this treatise attracted little attention at the time, although copies of it were eagerly sought many years after when the VOLUNTARY CONTROVERSY (which see) engrossed much of the public interest. The Constitutional Presbytery continued steadfastly to maintain their principles, along with the small number of people who adhered to them, and from all who sought to join them they required an explicit avowal of adherence to the principles of the Secession as contained in the original Testimony. For twenty-one years the brethren prosecuted their work and held fast their principles in much harmony and peace with one another, and to the great edification of the flocks committed to their care. In 1827 a change took place in their ecclesiastical position, a cordial union having been effected between the Constitutional Presbytery and the Associate Synod of Protesters, under the name of the Associate Synod of Original Seceders. See ORIGINAL SECEDERS (ASSOCIATE SYNOD OF).

ORIGINAL BURGHERS. Towards the end of the eighteenth century, the ecclesiastical courts of both branches of the Secession Church in Scotland were engaged from year to year in discussing two points, which have often formed the subject of angry controversy north of the Tweed. The first of these points referred to the power of the civil magistrate in matters of religion, and the second to the binding obligation of the covenants upon posterity. In consequence of the change which the opinions of many had undergone on both topics of dispute, the Associate General (Antiburgher) Synod had deemed it necessary to remodel the whole of their Testimony,—a proceeding which led to the formation of the small but important body of Christians noticed in the previous article. The Associate (Burgher) Synod, however, did not proceed so far as to remodel their Testimony, but simply prefixed to the Formula of questions proposed to candidates for license or for ordination, a preamble or explanatory statement not requiring an approbation of compulsory measures in matters of religion; and in reference to the Covenants admitting their obligations on posterity, without defining either the nature or extent of that obligation. The introduction of this preamble gave rise to a violent controversy in the Associate (Burgher) Synod, which commenced in 1795, and has been usually known by the name of the Formula Controversy. The utmost keenness, and even violence, characterized both parties in the contention; the opponents of the Preamble declaring that it involved a manifest departure from the doctrines of the original standards of the Secession, while its favourers contended with equal vehemence that the same statements as those which were now objected to, had been already given forth more than once by the church courts of the Secession. At several successive meetings of Synod, the adoption of the Preamble was strenuously resisted, but at length in 1799 it was agreed to in the following terms: "That whereas some parts of the standard-books of this synod have been interpreted as favouring compulsory measures in religion, the synod hereby declare, that they do not require an approbation of any such principle from any candidate for license or ordination: And whereas a controversy has arisen among us respecting the nature and kind of the obligation of our solemn covenants on posterity, whether it be entirely of the same kind upon us as upon our ancestors who swore them, the synod hereby declare, that while they hold the obligation of our covenants upon posterity, they do not interfere with that controversy which has arisen respecting the nature and kind of it, and recommend it to all their members to suppress that controversy as tending to gender strife rather than godly edifying."

The adoption of this Preamble having been decided upon by a large majority of the synod, Messrs. William Fletcher, William Taylor, and William Watson, ministers, with ten elders, dissented from this decision; and Mr. Willis gave in the following protestation, to which Mr. Ebenezer Hyslop and two elders adhered: "I protest in my own name, and in the name of all ministers, elders, and private Christians who may adhere to this protest, that as the synod hath obstinately refused to remove the Preamble prefixed to the Formula, and declare their simple and unqualified adherence to our principles, I will no more acknowledge them: as over me in the Lord, until they return to their principles." Messrs. Willis and Hyslop having thus, in the very terms of their protest, declared themselves no longer in connexion with the synod, their names were erased from the roll; and all who adhered to them were declared to have cut themselves off from the communion of the Associate body. Accordingly, on the 2d of October 1799, the two brethren, who had thus renounced the authority of the synod, met at Glasgow, along with Mr. William Watson, minister at Kilpatrick, and solemnly constituted themselves into a presbytery under the name of the Associate Presbytery. This was the commencement of that section of the Secession, familiarly known by the name of "Old Light," or "Original Burghers."

In the course of the following year, the brethren, who had thus separated themselves from the Associate Burgher synod were joined by several additional ministers, who sympathized with them in their views of the Preamble, as being an abandonment of Secession principles. Gradually the new presbytery increased in numbers until in 1805 they had risen by ordinations and accessions to fifteen. They now constituted themselves into a synod under the name of "The Associate Synod," but the name by which they have usually been known is the Original Burgher Synod. In vindication, as well as explanation, of their principles, they republished the "Act, Declaration, and Testimony" of the Secession Church. They also published, in a separate pamphlet, an Appendix to the Testimony, containing "A Narrative of the origin, progress, and consequences of late innovations in the Secession; with a Continuation of that Testimony to the present times."

In course of time a union was proposed to be effected between the Original Burgher and Original Antiburgher sections of the Secession, and with the view of accomplishing an object so desirable, a correspondence was entered into between the synods of the two denominations, committees were appointed, and conferences held to arrange the terms of union. But the negotiations, though continued for some time, were fruitless, and the project of union was abandoned. In 1837 a formal application was made by the Original Burgher Synod to be admitted into the communion of the Established Church of Scotland. The proposal was favourably entertained by the General Assembly, and a committee was appointed to confer with a committee of the Original Burgher Synod, and to discuss the terms of union. The negotiations were conducted in the most amicable manner, and the General Assembly having transmitted an overture to presbyteries on the subject, the union was approved, and in 1840 the majority of the Original Burgher Synod became merged in the National Church of Scotland. A small minority of the synod declined to accede to the union, preferring to maintain a separate position, and to adhere to the Secession Testimony, still retaining the name of the Associate or Original Burgher Synod.

On the 18th May 1842, the small body of Original Burghers which remained after their brethren had joined the Established Church, was united to the synod of Original Seceders, henceforth to form one Association for the support of the covenanted Reformation in these kingdoms, under the name of the Synod of United Original Seceders. It had been previously agreed that the Testimony adopted by the synod of Original Seceders in 1827, with the insertion in it of the alterations rendered necessary by the union, were to be held as the Testimony of the United Synod, and made a term of religious fellowship in the body. The Synod of Original Burghers was understood to approve of the acknowledgment of sins and bond appended to the Testimony, and it was agreed to by the Synod of Original Seceders, that the question in the formula regarding the burgher-oath should be dropped. On these conditions the union was effected, and the Synod of Original Burghers ceased to exist.

ORIGINAL SECEDERS (ASSOCIATE SYNOD OF.) This body was formed in 1827, by a union between the Constitutional Associate Presbytery and the Associate (Antiburgher) Synod, commonly known by the name of PROTESTERS (which see), from the circumstance, that they protested against the basis of union between the two great branches of the Secession in 1820. The articles agreed upon with a view to union were drawn up by Dr. McCrie on the one side, and Professor Paxton on the other. The Testimony which was enacted as a term of fellowship, ministerial and Christian, in the Associate Synod of Original Seceders, was drawn up in the historical part by Dr. McCrie, and nowhere do we find a more able, luminous, and satisfactory view of the true position of the first Seceders, and of their contentings for the Reformation in a state of Secession. Dr. McCrie shows that the four brethren who formed the first Seceders, though soon after their deed of Secession they formed themselves into a presbytery on the 6th of December 1733, still for some time acted in an extrajudicial capacity, and in this capacity they issued, in 1734, a Testimony for the principles of the Reformed Church of Scotland. It was not, indeed, until two more years had elapsed, that they resolved to act in a judicative capacity; and accordingly, in December 1736, they published their judicial Testimony to the principles and attainments of the Church of Scotland, and against the course of defection from them. This Testimony, as Dr. M'Crie shows, was not limited to those evils which had formed the immediate ground of Secession, but included others also of a prior date, the condemnation of which entered into the Testimony which the faithful party in the church had all along borne. The whole of that Testimony they carried along with them into a state of Secession. In prosecuting their Testimony they deemed it their solemn duty to renew the National Covenants, the neglect of which had been often complained of in the Established Church since the Revolution.

The points of difference between the Original Seceders and the Cameronians or Reformed Presbyterians are thus admirably sketched by Dr. M'Crie, in the Historical Part of the Testimony of 1827: "1. We acknowledge that the fundamental deed of constitution in our reforming period, in all moral respects, is morally unalterable, because of its agreeableness to the Divine will revealed in the Scriptures, and because it was attained to and fixed in pursuance of our solemn Covenants; and that the nation sinned in overthrowing it. 2. We condemn the conduct of the nation at the Revolution in leaving the reformed constitution buried and neglected: and in not looking out for magistrates who should concur with them in the maintenance of the true religion, as formerly settled, and rule them by laws subservient to its advancement. 3. We condemn not only the conduct of England and Ireland, at that period, in retaining Episcopacy, but also the conduct of Scotland, in not reminding them of their obligations, and, in every way competent, exciting them to a reformation, conformably to a prior treaty and covenant; and particularly the consent which this kingdom gave at the union, to the perpetual continuance of Episcopacy in England, with all that flowed from this, and partakes of its sinful character. 4. We condemn the ecclesiastical supremacy of the crown, as established by law in England and Ireland, and all the assumed exercise of it in Scotland, particularly by dissolving the assemblies of the church, and claiming the sole right of appointing fasts and thanksgivings, together with the practical compliances with it on the part of church-courts or ministers in the discharge of their public office. 5. We condemn the abjuration oath, and other oaths, which, either in express terms, or by just implication, approve of the complex constitution. 6. We consider that there is a wide difference between the arbitrary and tyrannical government of the persecuting period, and that which has existed since the Revolution, which was established with the cordial consent of the great body of the nation, and in consequence of a claim of right made by the representatives of the people, and acknowledged by the rulers; who, although they want (as the nation also does) many of the qualifications which they ought to possess according to the Word of God and our covenants, perform the essential duties of the magistratical office by maintaining justice, peace, and order, to the glory of God, and protecting us in the enjoyment of our liberties, and in the free exercise of our religion. Lastly, Holding these views, and endeavouring to act according to them, we can, without dropping our testimony in behalf of a former reforming period, or approving of any of the evils which cleave to the constitution or administration of the state, acknowledge the present civil government, and yield obedience to all its lawful commands, not only for wrath but for conscience' sake; and in doing so, we have this advantage, that we avoid the danger of practically disregarding the numerous precepts respecting obedience to magistrates contained in the Bible,—we have no need to have recourse to glosses upon these, which, if applied to other precepts running in the same strain, would tend to loosen all the relations of civil life,—and we act in unison with the principles and practice of the Christians of the first ages who lived under heathen or Arian emperors, of Protestants who have lived under popish princes, of our reforming fathers in Scotland under Queen Mary, and of their successors during the first establishment of Episcopacy, and after the Restoration, down to the time at which the government degenerated into an open and avowed tyranny."

On the question as to the lawfulness of swearing the burgess-oath, which so early as 1747 rent the Secession body into two sections, the Original Seceders avowed in their Testimony a decided coincidence in sentiment with the Antiburghers. This is plain from the following explanations given by Dr. M'Crie, in which the religious clause in the oath is shown to be inconsistent with the Secession Testimony:—

"1. As it is a matter of great importance to swear by the great name of God, so the utmost caution should be taken to ascertain the lawfulness of any oath which we are required to take; and it is the duty of ministers and church courts to give direction and warning to their people in such cases; especially when the oath embraces a profession of religion; and, more especially, when the persons required to take it are already under the obligation of another oath, sanctioning an explicit profession of religion, in consequence of which they may be in danger of involving themselves in contradictory engagements. 2. We cannot be understood as objecting to the clause in question on account of its requiring an adherence to the true religion, in an abstract view of it, as determined by the standard of the Scriptures, (if it could be understood in that sense,) nor as it implies an adherence to the Protestant religion, in opposition to the Romish, which is renounced, or an adherence to the Confession of Faith, and any part of the standards compiled for uniformity in the former Reformation, so far as these are still approved of by the acts of the Church of Scotland, and authorized by the laws. In these respects we account the Revolution settlement and the present laws a privilege, and agree to all which the Associate presbytery thankfully expressed in commendation of them, in their Testimony, and in the Declaration and Defence of their principles concerning the present civil government. 3. The profession of religion required by the burgess-oath is of a definite kind. If this were not the case, and if it referred only to the true religion in the abstract, and every swearer were left to understand this according to his own views, the oath would not serve the purpose of a test, nor answer the design of the imposer. The Romish religion is specially renounced; but there is also a positive part in the clause, specifying the religion professed in this realm, and authorized by the laws of the land; while the word presently will not admit of its applying to any profession different from that which is made and authorized at the time when the oath is sworn. 4. The profession of the true religion made by Seceders, agreeing with that which was made in this country and authorized by the laws between 1638 and 1650, is different from, and in some important points inconsistent with, that profession which is presently made by the nation, and authorized by the laws of the land. The Judicial Testimony finds fault with the national profession and settlement made at the Revolution, both materially and formally considered, and condemns the State for excluding, in its laws authorizing religion, the divine right of presbytery, and the intrinsic power of the church,—two special branches of the glorious headship of the Redeemer over his spiritual kingdom, and for leaving the Covenanted Reformation and the Covenants under rescissory laws; while it condemns the Church for not asserting these important parts of religion and reformation. On these grounds we cannot but look upon the religious clause in question as inconsistent with the Secession Testimony; and accordingly must approve of the decision of synod, condemning the swearing of it by Seceders. 5. As that which brought matters to an extremity, and divided the body, was the vote declaring that all might swear that oath, while, at the same time, it was condemned as unlawful; we cannot help being of opinion, that this held out a dangerous precedent to church courts to give a judicial toleration or allowance to do what they declare to be sinful. But provided this were disclaimed, and proper measures taken to prevent the oath from being sworn in the body in future; and, as the use of the oath has been laid aside in most burghs,—we would hope that such an arrangement may be made, so far as regards this question, as will be at once honourable to truth, and not hurtful to the conscience of any. With respect to the censures which were inflicted, and which had no small influence in embittering the dispute, we think it sufficient to say, that they were transient acts of discipline, and that no approbation of them was ever required from ministers or people. If any difference of opinion as to the nature or effects of church censures exist, it may be removed by an amicable conference."

At the formation of the United Secession Church in 1820, by the union of the Associate (Burgher) Synod, and the General Associate (Antiburgher) Synod, a number of ministers belonging to the latter body protested against the Basis of Union, and nine of them formed themselves into a separate court, under the name of the Associate Synod. This body of Protesters, as they were generally called, having merged themselves in 1827 in the body which took the name of the Synod of Original Seceders, it was only befitting that the Testimony then issued should speak in decided language on the defects of the Basis of Union, which led the Protesters to occupy a separate position. Dr. McCrie, accordingly, thus details the chief points protested against:

"1. The Basis is not laid on an adherence to the Covenanted Reformation, and Reformed Principles of the Church of Scotland. In seceding from the established judicatories, our fathers, as we have seen, espoused that cause; declared their adherence to the Westminster Standards as parts of the uniformity in religion for the three nations; declared the obligation which all ranks in them were under to adhere to these by the oath of God; testified against several important defects in the Revolution-settlement of religion; and traced the recent corruptions of which they complained to a progressive departure from the purity attained in the second period of reformation. The United Synod, on the contrary, proceeds, in the Basis, on the supposition that the Revolution-settlement was faultless: agreeably to it, they receive the Westminster Confession and Catechisms, not as subordinate standards for uniformity for the three nations, but merely (to use their own words) 'as the confession of our faith, expressive of the sense in which we understand the Holy Scriptures;' they exclude entirely from their Basis the Propositions concerning church government, and the Directory for public worship, drawn up by the Westminster Assembly; and they merely recognize presbytery as the only form of government which they acknowledge as founded upon the Word of God, although the first seceders, in their Testimony, condemned the church at the Revolution for not asserting expressly the divine right of the presbyterian government. Besides, the exception which they make to the Confession and Catechisms, is expressed in such a manner as to give countenance to an unwarranted stigma on these standards as teaching persecuting principles; and as it was well known that this was offensive to not a few, by agreeing to it, they, on the matter, perpetuated two divisions in attempting to heal one.

"2. The testimony to the continued obligation of the National Covenant, and the Solemn League, is dropped. These deeds are not so much as named in the Basis. When the United Synod approve of the 'method adopted by our reforming ancestors, for mutual excitement and encouragement, by solemn confederation and vows to God,' this never can be considered as a recognition of the present and continued obligations of our National Covenants; and still less can we regard, in this light, the following declaration, including all they say on the subject:—'We acknowledge that we are under high obligations to maintain and promote the work of reformation begun, and to a great extent carried on by them.'

"3. Though the morality of public religious covenanting is admitted by the Basis, yet the present seasonableness of it is not asserted; any provision made for the practice of it is totally irreconcilable with presbyterian principles, being adapted only to covenanting on the plan of the Congregationalists or Independents, and not for confirming the common profession of the United Body; and, in the bond transmitted by the General Synod, and registered by the United Synod, to be taken by those who choose, all idea of the renovation of the Covenants of our ancestors is set aside, and the recognition of their obligation, formerly made, is expunged.

"4. By adopting the Basis, any testimony which had been formerly borne against sinful oaths, and other practical evils, inconsistent with pure religion, and a scriptural and consistent profession of it, was dropped; and all barriers against the practice of what is called free communion, which has become so general and fashionable, are removed.

"5. With respect to the Burgess-oath, we have already expressed our views, and candidly stated what we judge the best way of accommodating the difference which it occasioned in the Associate Body. Of the method adopted for this purpose, in the Basis, we shall only say, that while, on the one hand, by making no provision for preventing the swearing of an oath which has all along been viewed as sinful by one-half of the Secession, it tends to bring all contentings against public evils, and for purity of communion, into discredit with the generation; so, on the other hand, by providing that all in the United Body 'shall carefully abstain from agitating the questions which occasioned' the breach, it restrains ministerial and christian liberty in testifying against sin; and, on the matter, absolves the ministers and elders of one of the synods from an express article in their ordination-vows."

At the meeting of synod in 1828, the Original Seceders enacted that all the ministers of their body, together with the preachers and students of divinity under their inspection, should enter into the Bond for renewing the Covenants, at Edinburgh, on the 18th of the following September. Two years thereafter the synod authorized a committee of their number to prepare and to publish an Address to their people on the duty of Public Covenanting, and on Practical Religion. In 1832, a controversy arose in Scotland, which is usually known by the name of the VOLUNTARY CONTROVERSY (which see), and which involved important principles touching the duty of nations and their rulers to recognize, countenance, and support the true religion. In the heat of the controversy, the Synod of Original Seceders deemed it right to issue an Address on the subject. This production, entitled 'Vindication of the Principles of the Church of Scotland, in relation to questions presently agitated,' was published in 1834. It condemned the Voluntary system on various grounds, (1) on account of its atheistical character and tendency; (2) as at variance with sound policy; (3) as unscriptural; (4) as directly opposed to one important design of supernatural revelation—the improvement of human society; (5) as striking at the foundation of God's moral government, so far as regards nations or bodies politic. While thus maintaining in the strongest and most decided manner the principle of Establishments, in opposition to the Voluntary principle, the Original Seceders took occasion in the course of the same pamphlet to lay down with equal distinctness the grounds on which they felt themselves excluded from all prospect of an immediate return to the communion of the Established Church. "Our objections," they say, "to the Established Church of Scotland are not confined to her administration: we cannot unreservedly approve of her constitution as it was established at the Revolution. Though our fathers were in communion with that Church, yet they, together with many faithful men who died before the Secession, and some who continued in the Establishment after that event, were all along dissatisfied with several things in the settlement of religion at the Revolution, and in the ratification of it at the union between Scotland and England. The first Seceders, in their Judicial Testimony and Declaration of Principles, specified several important points with respect to which that settlement involved a sinful departure from a previous settlement of religion in Scotland (that, namely, between 1638 and 1650), which they distinctly held forth as exhibiting the model, in point of Scriptural purity and order, of that reformed constitution to which they sought by their contentings to bring back the church of their native land. This Synod occupy the same ground with the first Seceders. They are aware that the Established Church of Scotland has it not in her power to correct all the evils of the Revolution settlement which they feel themselves bound to point out; but they cannot warrantably quit their position of secession, until the Established Church show a disposition to return to that reformed constitution, by using means to correct what is inconsistent with it, so far as is competent to her, in the use of those powers which belong to her as an ecclesiastical and independent society under Christ her Head, and by due application to the State for having those laws rescinded or altered which affect her purity and abridge her freedom. It will be found, on a careful and candid examination, that a great part of the evils, in point of administration, which are chargeable on the Church of Scotland, may be traced, directly or indirectly, to the defects and errors cleaving to her establishment at the revolution; and as it is her duty, so it will be her safety, seriously to consider these, and, following the direction of Scripture and the example of our reforming ancestors, to confess them before God and seek their removal." The evils to which the document here refers, were chiefly the want of a formal recognition of the National Covenants, of the Divine Right of Presbytery, and of the spiritual independence of the Church.

The year in which the 'Vindication' appeared, formed an important era in the history of the Established Church of Scotland, since from that date commenced that line of policy in the General Assembly, which resulted at length in the Disruption of 1843. It was not to be expected that the Original Seceders, feeling, as they did, a lively interest in every movement of the National Church, could look with indifference on the crisis of her history upon which she was entering. In the following year, accordingly, a pamphlet was drawn up,—remarkable as being the last production which issued from the pen of the venerated Dr. Mc'Crie—entitled 'Reasons of a Fast, appointed by the Associate Synod of Original Seceders,' and containing several marked allusions to the peculiar circumstances of the Church of Scotland. Nor were such allusions inappropriate or unseasonable. From that period the struggles of the Established Church to maintain spiritual independence, and to protect the rights of the Christian people against the intrusion of unacceptable ministers, became the all-engrossing subject of attention in Scotland. The views of the Original Seceders were in harmony with those of the majority of the General Assembly; and the important proceedings from year to year of that venerable court were watched by them with deep and ever-increasing anxiety. At length, in 1842, a change took place in the position of the Original Seceders, a union having been formed between that body and the Associate Synod, commonly called the Synod of Original Burghers, which gave rise to a new denomination, entitled the Synod of United Original Seceders. See next article.

ORIGINAL SECEDERS (SYNOD OF UNITED).

This body was formed, as we have already seen in the preceding article, by the union in 1842 of the Synod of Original Burghers with the Synod of Original Seceders. Previous to the completion of the union, it had been agreed that the Testimony adopted by the Synod of Original Seceders in 1827, with the insertion in it of several alterations rendered necessary by the union, should be taken as the Testimony of the United Synod. One important alteration agreed to by the Synod of Original Seceders was, that the question in the formula regarding the burgess-oath should be dropped. To understand the position which the United body of Original Seceders occupied after the union, it must be borne in mind that the Testimony of 1827, which was drawn up in its historical part by Dr. Mc'Crie, was essentially Anti-burgher in its whole nature and bearings. This element was dropped in the Testimony of 1842, and thus the character of the Testimony underwent an important change. On this subject the United body give the following explanation in the historical part of the Testimony of 1842: "The synod of Original Seceders, in their Testimony, published in 1827, after stating their reasons for continuing to approve of the decision condemning the swearing of the oath by Seceders, suggested it as their opinion, that an arrangement might be made as to the subject of difference, which would be at once honourable to truth, and not hurtful to the conscience of any. This suggestion was readily and cordially met by the Synod of Original Burghers, and joint measures were, in consequence, adopted, with the view of ascertaining the practicability of such an arrangement. In concluding the negotiation, both parties proceeded on the principle, that desirable as union is, if the reality of the thing is to be sought, and not the appearance merely, this will be secured more effectually, and with more honour to truth, by candid explanations on the points in question, than by studiously avoiding the agitation of them, a plan which, while it makes greater pretensions to charity and peace, lays a ground for subsequent irritation and dissension.

"In the course of explanation, it was found that the only difference of opinion between the two bodies related to the exact meaning and necessary application of certain terms in the oath, which, as the question originally came before the Secession courts as a question of practice, did not appear to be an insuperable obstacle to a Scriptural adjustment of the dispute. After repeated conferences, it was satisfactorily ascertained, that the members of both synods were agreed on all points with the Judicial Testimony of the first Seceders, particularly in its approval of the profession of religion made in this country, and authorized by the laws between 1638 and 1650, on the one hand; and in its disapproval of the defects in the settlement of religion made at the Revolution, on the other. Encouraged by this harmony of sentiment as to the great cause of Reformation, so much forgotten and so keenly opposed from various quarters in the present time, and feeling deeply the solemn obligations under which they in common lie to support and advance that cause; and the burgess-oath, the original ground of separation, being now, in the providence of God, abolished, and both parties having now, for various reasons, seen it to be their duty to refrain from swearing that oath, should it be re-enacted; the two Synods agreed to unite upon the following explanatory declarations and resolutions, calculated, in their judgment, to remove the bars in the way of harmonious fellowship and co-operation, and to prevent, through the blessing of God, the recurrence of any similar difference for the future.

"1. That when the church of Christ is in danger from adversaries who hold persecuting principles, or who are employing violence or insidious arts to overturn it, the legislature of a country may warrantably exact an oath from those who are admitted to official and influential stations, calculated for the security of the true religion; and that, in these circumstances, it is lawful and proper to swear.

"2. That no Christian, without committing sin, can on any consideration swear to maintain or defend any known or acknowledged corruption or defect in the profession or establishment of religion.

"3. That a public oath can be taken only according to the declared and known sense of the legislature or enacting authority, and no person is warrantably to swear it in a sense of his own, contrary to the former.

"4. That no church court can warrantably give a judicial toleration or allowance to do what they declare to be sinful, or what there is sufficient evidence from the Word of God is sinful."

Those who hold high Antiburgher views maintain, that the ruling element of the Original Secession Testimony of 1827 involves the decision come to by the Antiburgher party of the Secession in 1746, viz. that "those of the Secession cannot with safety of conscience, and without sin, swear any burgess-oath with the said religious clause, while matters, with reference to the profession and settlement of religion, continue in such circumstances as at present; and, particularly, that it does not agree unto, nor consist with, an entering into the bond for renewing our Solemn Covenants." So strongly did the Antiburgher Synod of that time regard this decision as virtually comprehending the whole Secession cause, that they declared that the Burghers, who had opposed this decision, "had materially dropped the whole Testimony among their hands, allowing of, at least for a time, a material abjuration thereof." Thus it is plain, that the Antiburgher Synod made the decision of 1746, in regard to the burgess-oath, the exponent of the Judicial Testimony, as well as of the declinature and the act for renewing the covenants. Hence the Original Seceders, in uniting with the Original Burghers, and adopting the Testimony of 1842, might be regarded as acting in opposition to the decision of 1746, which was the ruling and expository element of the Testimony of 1827.

Another peculiarity which distinguished the Secession Testimony was the formal recognition and actual renewing of the covenants. To this peculiarity the Original Secession body steadfastly adhered, allowing no student to be licensed and no probationer to be ordained who had not previously joined the bond, or solemnly promised that he would do so, on the very first opportunity that offered. The descending obligation of the covenants was distinctly maintained accordingly in the Testimony of 1827, and the same doctrine is avowed also by the United Original Seceders in their Testimony of 1842. In this respect they were only following in the steps of the first Seceders, who had no sooner broken off their connexion with the Established Church of that day than they fell back upon the church of a former period, and proceeded to identify their cause with that of the Reformed Covenanted Church, and this they did by actually renewing the covenants. By their act relating to this subject published in 1743, "they considered the swearing of the bond was called for, and rendered necessary by the strong tide of defection from the Reformation cause which had set in," and that by so acting they would serve themselves heirs to the vows of their fathers. Dr. McCrie, accordingly, in referring to this part of the history of the first Seceders, tells us in the Historical Part of the Testimony of 1827:—"The ministers having entered into the bond, measures were taken for having it administered to the people in their respective congregations; and at a subsequent period (1744) they agreed that all who were admitted to the ministry should previously have joined in renewing the covenants, while such as opposed or slighted the duty should not be admitted to sealing ordinances." Thus both the formal recognition and the actual renewing of the covenants came to be necessary terms of fellowship in the early Secession Church. The work of renewing the covenants had, in the summer of 1744, been gone through in only two settled congregations, when a stop was put to it by the synod having forced upon it the settlement of the question, "Whether those in communion with them could warrantably and consistently swear the following clause in some burgess-oaths,—"Here I protest, before God and your Lordships, that I profess and allow with my heart, the true religion professed within this realm, and authorized by the laws thereof." The question involved in the swearing of the burgess-oath respected the character of the Revolution settlement or legally authorized profession of religion. It was on this point that the Secession body became divided into two conflicting synods.

From the Testimony of 1827, it is plain that the Original Seceders regarded both the principle and practice of covenanting as inherited by them from the first Seceders. Nor does there seem to be any material difference between the Testimony of 1827 and that of the United Original Seceders in 1842, in so far as regards the question as to the descending obligation of the Covenants. But in the latter Testimony, a clause occurs which seems to indicate a somewhat modified view of the necessity of actually renewing the covenants. The clause in question runs thus: "It is also agreed that while all proper means are used for stirring up and preparing the people in their respective congregations to engage in this important and reasonable duty, there should be no undue haste in those congregations where it has not been formerly practised." The clause marked in Italics is not found in the Testimony of 1827, and must therefore be considered as one of those alterations in the Testimony of the Original Seceders which was deemed necessary, in order to the accomplishment of the Union with the Original Burghers.

The year which succeeded the formation of the Synod of United Original Seceders, was the year of the Disruption of the Established Church of Scotland—an event which was one of the deepest interest to every denomination of Christians in the country, but more especially to the representatives of the first Seceders. The formation of the Free Church of Scotland, in a state of entire independence of all State interference, and professing untrammelled to prosecute the great ends of a Christian church, submissive to the guidance and authority of her Great Head alone, was hailed by the newly formed body of United Original Seceders as realizing the wishes, the hopes, and the prayers of their forefathers, who had concluded the Protest which formed the basis of the Secession in these remarkable words: "And we hereby appeal unto the first free, faithful, and reforming General Assembly of the Church of Scotland." As years passed on, after the memorable events of 1843, the conviction was growing stronger and stronger in the minds of many both of the ministers and people of the United Original Seceders, that in the Assembly of the Free Church they could recognize the General Assembly to which the first fathers of the Secession appealed, and that therefore the time had come when the Protest of the 16th November 1733 must be fallen from. At length it was resolved in the synod of the body to lodge a Representation and Appeal on the table of the Free Church Assembly, with a view to the coalescing of the two bodies. The union thus sought was accomplished in May 1852, on the express understanding that the brethren of the United Original Secession Synod, who thus applied for admission into the Free Church of Scotland, should be allowed to retain their peculiar views as to the descending obligation of the Covenants, while at the same time the Free Church did not commit itself directly or indirectly, in any way, either to a positive or to a negative opinion upon these views. Several ministers and congregations connected with the United Original Seceders refused to accede to the union with the Free Church, and preferred to remain in their former position, and accordingly, a small body of Christians still exists holding the principles, and calling themselves by the name of the United Original Secession. One congregation of Original Seceders in Edinburgh, under the ministry of the Rev. James Wright, with not a few adherents in various parts of the country, disclaims all connection with those who adhere to the Testimony of 1842, and professes to hold by the Testimony of 1827, thus claiming, in the principles which they avow, to represent the first Seceders, in so far as in the advanced state of the Secession cause they held their principles to be identical with those of the Reformed Covenanted Church of Scotland.

ORIGINAL SIN. This expression is frequently used in a twofold sense, to denote the imputation of Adam's first sin to his posterity, and also that inherent depravity which we have derived by inheritance from our first parents. The first view of the subject—the imputation of Adam's first sin—has already been considered under the articles IMPUTATION and HOPKINSIANS. According to the second view we come into the world, in consequence of the sin of Adam, in a state of depravity. On this point the Westminster Confession of Faith explicitly declares:—"By this sin," referring to the sin of our first parents, "they fell from their original righteousness and communion with God, and so became dead in sin, and wholly defiled in all the faculties and parts of soul and body. They being the root of all mankind, the guilt of this sin was imputed, and the same death in sin and corrupted nature conveyed, to all their posterity, descending from them by ordinary generation." Again, in another passage the same Confession teaches, "Man by his fall into a state of sin, hath wholly lost all ability to any spiritual good accompanying salvation, so as a natural man being altogether averse from that good, and dead in sin, is not able by his own strength to convert himself, or to prepare himself thereunto." This doctrine pervades the whole of the Sacred Writings, and may be called indeed a fundamental and essential truth of Revelation. Thus even before the flood we find the inspired penman declaring, Gen. vi. 5, "And God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually." And again after the flood the same statement is repeated, Gen. viii. 21, "The imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth." David also, in Ps. li. 5, declares, "Behold, I was shapen in iniquity; and in sin did my mother conceive me." The original and innate depravity of man might be deduced from the doctrine of Scripture respecting the necessity of regeneration. Our blessed Lord affirms, John iii. 3, "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God;" we are said to be "saved by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost; which he shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour." Such language has no meaning if it be not true that we are utterly depraved by nature. How early does this innate corruption manifest itself in children! It is impossible for us to examine our own hearts, or to look around us in the world, without having the conclusion forced upon us, that the wickedness which everywhere prevails, must have its seat in a heart that is "deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked."

The doctrine of original sin has been denied by heretics of different kinds. Socinians treat it as a foolish and absurd idea. The followers of Pelagius maintain, that notwithstanding the results of the fall, man still retains the power, independently of Divine grace, of originating, prosecuting, and consummating good works. God, they allege, gives us the ability to believe, but we can exercise the ability without farther assistance. This doctrine has been revived in our own day by the members of the Evangelical Union, commonly called Morrisonians. Arminians admit that we are born less pure than Adam, and with a greater inclination to sin, but in so far as this inclination or concupiscence, as it is called, is from nature, it is not properly sin. It is merely the natural appetite or desire, which as long as the will does not consent to it is not sinful. Romanists believing that original sin is taken away in baptism, maintain, like the Arminians, that concupiscence is not sinful. The apostle Paul, however, holds a very different opinion, declaring in the plainest language that the proneness to sin is in itself sinful. Thus in Rom. vii. 7, 8, he says, "What shall we say then? Is the law sin? God forbid. Nay, I had not known sin, but by the law: for I had not known lust, except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet. But sin, taking occasion by the commandment, wrought in me all manner of concupiscence. For without the law sin was dead."

A keen controversy concerning the nature of original sin arose in the sixteenth century in Germany. A party at Jena, led on by Matthias Flacius, endeavoured to prove that the natural man could never co-operate with the divine influence in the heart, but through the working of innate depravity was always in opposition to it. Flacius met with a keen opponent in Victorine Strigelius, and a public disputation on the subject of original sin was held at Weimar in 1560. On this occasion Flacius made the strong assertion that original sin was the very essence of man, language which was believed to imply either that God was the author of sin, or that man was created by the devil. Hence even the former friends of Flacius became his bitterest opponents. See SYNERGISTIC CONTROVERSY.

ORMUZD, the supremely Good Being, according to the system of the ancient Persians, not, however, original and undervived, but the offspring of illimitable Time. See ABESTA, PERSIANS (RELIGION OF THE ANCIENT).

ORNITHOMANCY (ornis-thos, a bird, and man-teia, divination), a species of divination practised among the ancient Greeks, by means of birds. See DIVINATION.

ORO, the principal war-god of the pagan natives of Polynesia. Such was the delight which he was supposed to have in blood, that his priest required every victim offered in sacrifice to be covered with its own blood in order to its acceptance. When war was in agitation a human sacrifice was offered to Oro, the ceremony connected with it being called fetehing the god to preside over the army. The image of the god was brought out; when the victim was offered, a red feather was taken from his person and given to the party, who bore it to their companions, and considered it as the symbol of Oro's presence and sanction during their subsequent preparations. Oro was, in the Polynesian mythology, the first son of Taaroa, who was the former and father of the gods. He was the first of the fourth class of beings worshipped in the Leeward Islands, and appears to have been the medium of connexion between celestial and terrestrial beings. In Tahiti Oro was worshipped under the representation of a straight log of hard casuarina wood, six feet in length, uncarved, but decorated with feathers. This was the great national idol of the Polynesians. He was generally supposed to give the response to the priests who sought to know the will of the gods, or the issue of events. At Opoa, which was considered as the birth-place of the god, was the most celebrated oracle of the people.

ORO, the name given in the Yoruba country of Western Africa to MUMBO JUMBO (which see).

OROMATUAS TIS, spirits worshipped among the South Sea Islanders. They were thought to reside in the world of night, and were never invoked but by wizards or sorcerers. They were a different order of beings from the gods, and were believed to be the spirits of departed relations. The natives were greatly afraid of them, and endeavoured to propitiate them by presenting offerings. "They seem," says Mr. Ellis in his 'Polynesian Researches,' "to have been regarded as a sort of demons. In the Leeward Islands, the chief oromatuas were spirits of departed warriors, who had distinguished themselves by ferocity and murder, attributes of character usually supposed to belong to these evil genii. Each celebrated tii was honoured with an image, through which it was supposed his influence was exerted. The spirits of the reigning chiefs were united to this class, and the skulls of deceased rulers, kept with the images, were honoured with the same worship. Some idea of what was regarded as their ruling passion, may be inferred from the fearful apprehensions constantly entertained by all classes. They were supposed to be exceedingly irritable and cruel, avenging with death the slightest insult or neglect, and were kept within the precincts of the temple. In the marae of Tane at Maeva, the ruins of their abode were still standing, when I last visited the place. It was a house built upon a number of large strong poles, which raised the floor ten or twelve feet from the ground. They were thus elevated, to keep them out of the way of men, as it was imagined they were constantly strangling, or otherwise destroying, the chiefs and people. To prevent this, they were also treated with great respect: men were appointed constantly to attend them, and to keep them wrapped in the choicest kinds of cloth, to take them out whenever there was a pæ alua, or general exhibition of the gods; to anoint them frequently with fragrant oil; and to sleep in the house with them at night. All this was done to keep them pacified. And though the office of calming the angry spirits was honourable, it was regarded as dangerous, for if, during the night or at any other time, these keepers were guilty of the least impropriety, it was supposed the spirits of the images, or the skulls, would hurl them headlong from their high abodes, and break their necks in the fall."

The names of the principal oromatus were Man-ri, Bua-rai, and Tea-fao. They were considered the most malignant of beings, exceedingly irritable and implacable. They were not confined to the skulls of departed warriors, or the images made for them, but were occasionally supposed to resort to the shells from the sea-shore, especially a beautiful kind of murex called the murex ramoses. These shells were kept by the sorcerers, and the peculiar singing noise perceived on applying the valve to the ear was imagined to proceed from the demon it contained.

ORPHEOTELESTS, a set of mystagogues in the early ages of ancient Greece, who were wont to appear at the doors of the wealthy, and promise to release them from their own sins and those of their forefathers by sacrifices and expiatory songs; and they produced on such occasions a collection of books of Orpheus and Musæus on which they founded their promises.

ORPHIC MYSTERIES, a class of mystical ceremonies performed at a very early period in the history of Greece. The followers of Orpheus, who was the servant of Apollo and the Muses, devoted themselves to the worship of Dionysus, not however by practising the licentious rites which usually characterized the Dionysia or Bacchanalia, but by the maintenance of a pure and austere mode of life. These devotees were dressed in white linen garments, and partook of no animal food, except that which was taken from the ox offered in sacrifice to Dionysus.

ORTHIA, a surname of Artemis, under which she was worshipped at Sparta, and in various other places in Greece.

ORTHODOX, a term used to denote those who are sound in the faith. It is the opposite of heretical, and supposes a standard to exist by which all doctrine is to be tried, that standard being, according to Romanists, both Scripture and tradition, while, according to all Protestant churches, it is Scripture alone.

ORTLIBENSES, a sect of the ancient WALDENSES (which see), who are alleged to have denied that there existed a Trinity before the birth of Jesus Christ, who then, for the first time, in their view, became the Son of God. They are charged also with having regarded the Apostle Peter as the Holy Ghost. Such foolish assertions in regard to this section of the Waldenses, however, are only found in Romish writers.

ORTYGIA, a surname of Artemis, from Ortygia, the ancient name of the island of Delos, where she was worshipped.

ORYX, a species of antelope held in high estimation among the ancient Egyptians. Sir John G. Wilkinson says, "Among the Egyptians the oryx was the only one of the antelope tribe chosen as an emblem; but it was not sacred; and the same city on whose monuments it was represented in sacred subjects, was in the habit of killing it for the table. The head of this animal formed the prow of the mysterious boat of Pthah-Sokari-Osiris, who was worshipped with peculiar honours at Memphis, and who held a conspicuous place among the contemplar gods of all the temples of Upper and Lower Egypt. This did not, however, prevent their sacrificing the oryx to the gods, or slaughtering it for their own use; large herds of them being kept by the wealthy Egyptians for this purpose; and the sculptures of Memphis and its vicinity abound, no less than those of the Thebaid, with proofs of this fact. But a particular one may have been set apart and consecrated to the Deity, being distinguished by certain marks which the priests fancied they could discern, as in the case of oxen exempted from sacrifice. And if the law permitted the oryx to be killed without the mark of the pontiff's seal, (which was indispensable for oxen previous to their being taken to the altar,) the privilege of exemption might be secured to a single animal, when kept apart within the inaccessible precincts of a temple. In the zodiacs, the oryx was chosen to represent the sign Capricornus. M. Champollion considers it the representative of Seth; and Horapollon gives it an unamiable character as the emblem of impurity. It was even thought 'to foreknow the rising of the moon, and to be indignant at her presence.' Pliny is disposed to give it credit for better behaviour towards the dog-star, which, when rising, it looked upon with the appearance of adoration. But the naturalist was misinformed respecting the growth of its hair in imitation of the bull Basis. Such are the fables of old writers; and, judging from the important post it held in the boat of Sokari, I am disposed to consider it the emblem of a good rather than of an evil deity, contrary to the opinion of the learned Champollion."

OSCOPIORIA, a festival among the ancient Greeks celebrated, as some writers allege, in honour of Athena and Dionysus, while others maintain it to have been kept in honour of Dionysus and Ariadne. It was instituted by Theseus, or, according to some, by the Phœnicians. On the occasion of this festival, which was evidently connected with the vintage, two boys, carrying vine-branches in their hands, went in ranks, praying, from the temple of Dionysus to the sanctuary of Pallas.

OSIANDRIANS, a sect which arose in the sixteenth century in Germany, taking their name from Andreas Osiander, the reformer of Nuremberg, who maintained that Christ becomes our righteousness in his Divine nature, and by dwelling essentially in the believer. He taught that if man had never fallen, the incarnation would still have taken place to complete the Divine image in human nature. Osiander was driven from Nuremberg by the operation of the Interim, and was placed by his friend Albert, duke of Brandenburg, at the head of ecclesiastical affairs in Prussia, a position which enabled him to triumph over his opponents, by driving them into banishment. After his death in 1552, his son-in-law, Funck, sought and obtained reconciliation with the Philippists, or those who belonged to the school of Melancthon. But a political party, favoured by the Polish feudal sovereign, having combined with his theological enemies against him, the controversy was terminated by the execution of Funck in 1566, and the condemnation of the doctrines of Osiander as an essential heresy.

OSIRIS, one of the chief deities of the ancient Egyptians. He was the husband of Isis, and according to Heliodorus, the god of the Nile. His descent is traced to Chronos and Rhea, or according to some writers to Jupiter and Rhea. He was worshipped under the form of an ox, having been the first god who taught man to use oxen in ploughing, and to employ agricultural implements in general. He instituted among the Egyptians civil laws and religious worship. In the popular belief he was the Supreme Being; but in the metaphysical or sacerdotal creed, he was called Cneph or Ammon, which correspond to the Agathodemon of the Greeks. In his vulgar acceptation Osiris was the sun or the fountain of light and heat, and as such merely an emanation of Cneph or Ammon. Osiris, as the Nile, is nothing else, as Plutarch observes, but an emanation, a reflected ray of the God of light. See EGYPTIANS (RELIGION OF THE ANCIENT).

OSSA, a Homeric female deity, the messenger of Zeus. She was worshipped at Athens, and seems to have corresponded to the Latin goddess Fama. See FAME.

OSSENIANS, a name sometimes applied to the ELCESAITES (which see).

OSSILAGO. See OSSIPAGA.

OSSILEGIUM (Gr. os-ossis, a bone, legere, to gather), the act of collecting the bones of the dead. It was customary among the ancient Greeks, when the funeral pyre was burnt down, to quench the dying embers with wine, after which the relatives and friends collected the bones of the deceased. This last practice received the name of the Ossilegium. The bones when collected were washed with wine and oil, and deposited in urns, which were made of different materials, sometimes even of gold.

OSSIPAGA, an ancient Roman deity whose office it was to harden and consolidate the bones of infants.

OSTIARI, subordinate officers in the ancient

Christian Church, whose employment was to separate catechumens from believers, and to exclude disorderly persons from the church. They closed the doors not only when religious worship was ended, but during divine service, especially when the first part was concluded, and the catechumens were dismissed. They had also the care of the ornaments of the church. It afterwards became their duty to adorn the church and the altar for festive occasions; to protect the sepulchres of the dead from being violated; to ring the bell; to sweep the church; and on Maundy Thursday to prepare for the consecration of the chrism. The customary forms of ordaining the Ostiarii are prescribed in the canons of the fourth council of Carthage, and the ceremony of delivering the keys is derived from the book of secret discipline among the Jews. The office was discontinued in the seventh or eighth century as being no longer necessary. In the Greek Church the order of Ostiarii has been laid aside since the council of Trullo, A. D. 692. The Roman Catholic Church allege the office to have been of apostolical institution, but no mention of such an office occurs in the writings of the first three centuries. The ceremony of ordination in the case of the Ostiarii in the Latin Church consisted simply in delivering the keys of the church into their hands with a charge couched in these words, addressed to each individually: "Be have thyself as one that must give an account to God of the things that are kept locked under these keys."

OVATION, a lesser triumph among the ancient Romans. The name seems to have been derived from the animal sacrificed on the occasion, which was not a bull, but a sheep (ovis). In an ovation the general entered the city on foot, clothed not in gorgeous robes, but simply in the toga pretexta of a magistrate. The wreath with which his brows were girt was composed not of laurel but of myrtle. He carried no sceptre in his hand. The procession by which he was attended consisted not of senators and a victorious army, but of knights and plebeians. No trumpets heralded the general's entry into the city, in the case of an ovation, but simply a band of flute players.

OVERSEER (CHRISTIAN). See BISHOP.

OVERSEERS (JEWISH), sacred officers connected with the ancient Jewish worship. They were fifteen in number, and presided over the same number of companies. Mr. Lewis, in his 'Origines Hebrææ,' gives the following detailed account of them:—

"The overseer concerning the times, whose office it was, either himself, or by his deputies, when it was time to begin divine service, to publish with a loud voice, O ye priests to your service; O ye Levites to your desks; and O ye Israelites to your station. And upon his proclamation they all obeyed, and repaired to their several duties.

"The overseer of shutting the doors; by whose order they were opened or shut, and by whose appointment the trumpets sounded when they were opened. He was a person appointed by the Inmarcalin for this office; for those seven officers had the charge and disposal of the keys of the seven gates of the court.

"The overseer of the guards. This officer was called the man of the mountain of the house. His business was to go his rounds every night among the guards of the Levites, to see if they kept their posts; and if he found any one asleep, he endgelled him, and set his coat on fire.

"The overseer of the singers. He appointed every day who should sing and blow the trumpets.

"The overseer of the cymbal music. As the officer above took care to order the voices, the trumpets, and strung instruments, so this had the management of the music by the cymbal, which was of another kind.

"The overseer of the lots. This person, every morning, designed by lots what service the priests were to perform at the altar.

"The overseer about birds. His care was to provide turtles and pigeons, that those who had occasion for them might purchase them for their money; and he gave an account of the money to the treasurers.

"The overseer of the seals. These seals were such kind of things as the tickets that some clergymen at this time usually give to persons admitted to the Sacrament. There were four sorts of these tickets, and they had four several words written or stamped upon them; upon one was a calf, on another a male, on a third a kid, and on the fourth a sinner. The use of these tickets was this: when any one brought a sacrifice, to which was to be joined a drink-offering, he applied to this overseer of the tickets: he looked what his sacrifice was, and when he was satisfied, considered what drink-offering was assigned by the law to such a sacrifice. Then he gave him a ticket, whose inscription was suitable to his sacrifice: as, suppose it was a ram, he gave him a ticket with a male; was it a sin-offering, then he had the ticket a sinner; and so of the others. For this ticket the overseer received from the man as much money as his drink-offering would cost; and with this ticket the man went to

"The overseer of the drink-offerings: whose office was to provide them ready, and deliver them out to every man according to his ticket; for by that he knew what nature his sacrifice was of, and what drink-offering it required; and accordingly he delivered it out. Every night this overseer of the drink-offerings, and the overseer of the seals, reckoned together, and computed what the one had received, and the other had given out.

"The overseer of the sick. His business was to attend upon the priests that were sick, to administer medicines, and was physician to the temple; for the priests serving at the altar barefooted and thin clothed, and eating abundance of flesh, which was not so agreeable in that climate, were very subject to colds and cholics, and other distempers; and this officer was appointed to take care of them.

"The overseer of the waters: whose office it was to provide that wells, cisterns, and conduits should be digged and made, that there shou'd be no want of water at the temple, especially at the three great festivals, when the whole people of Israel were to appear there.

"The overseer of the making of the shew-bread.

"The overseer of the making of the incense.

"The overseer of the workmen that made the veils.

"The overseer who provided vestments for the priests."

OX-WORSHIP. See BULL-WORSHIP.

OXYGRAPHIUS (Gr. oxus, swift, and grapho, to write), a name sometimes given by the Greek fathers to the NOTARY (which see) of the ancient Christian Church.

P

PACALIA, a festival celebrated anciently at Rome on the 30th of April, in honour of the goddesses Pax and Salus.

PACHAMAMA, the goddess of the earth among the ancient Peruvians.

PACHAMAMAC. See MANGO-CAPAC.

PACIFICATION (EDICTS OF), a name given to certain edicts issued by sovereigns of France, intended, under special circumstances, to afford toleration to the Reformed Church in that country. The first edict of this kind was granted by Charles IX. in 1562, and repeated the following year. This treaty was but imperfectly kept, and hostilities were resumed between the Protestants and Romanists; but at length, in 1568, peace was again concluded, and an edict of pacification issued. Only a short time elapsed, however, when war broke out anew, and raged with increased violence until, in 1570, peace was once more concluded. So hollow were the successive edicts proclaimed by Charles IX.

that instead of bringing relief to the Protestants, they only served to lull them into a false and deceitful security, while the cruel monarch was preparing the way for the Bartholomew massacre on the 25th of August 1572, when thousands of the inoffensive Huguenots were butchered in cold blood. A few years more passed away and the Protestants were tantalized by another edict of pacification, published by Henry III. in 1576, which, through the influence of the supporters of the Romish Church, the sovereign was compelled to recall. The most famous edict of pacification, however, was the edict of Nantes, issued by Henry IV. in 1598, the most effectual measure of relief which the French Protestants had ever enjoyed. By this edict of toleration they were allowed the free exercise of their religion, declared to be eligible to all public offices, and placed in all respects on a footing of equality with their Roman Catholic fellow-subjects. This edict, though its provisions were set at nought by Louis XIII. and XIV., was not formally repealed until 1685, when its fatal revocation was signed, and the Protestant Church of France, robbed of all her privileges, was given over to the tender mercies of her cruel enemies. See FRANCE (PROTESTANT CHURCH OF).

PACIFICATION (PLAN OF). See METHODISTS (WESLEYAN).

PÆ ATUA, a general exhibition of the gods among the South Sea islanders.

PÆAN, the name in the Homeric mythology of the physician of the Olympic gods, and afterwards applied as a surname to Asclepius, the god of healing. The term was also applied to Apollo.

PÆAN, a hymn anciently sung in honour of Apollo. It was of a mirthful festive character, sung by several persons under a skilful leader, as they marched in procession. It was used either to propitiate the favour of the god, or to praise him for a victory or deliverance obtained. It was sung at the HYACINTHUS (which see), and in the temple of the Pythian Apollo. Pæans were usually sung among the ancient Greeks, both at the commencement and close of a battle, the first being addressed to Ares, and the last to Apollo. It would appear, indeed, that in later times other gods were also propitiated by the singing of pæans in their honour; and at a later period even mortals were thus honoured. The practice prevailed from a remote antiquity of singing pæans at the close of a feast, when it was customary to pour out libations in honour of the gods.

PÆDOBAPTISTS. See BAPTISM.

PÆDOTHYSIA (Gr. pais, paidos, a child, and thysia, a sacrifice), a term used to denote the sacrifice of children to the gods. See HUMAN SACRIFICES.

PÆONIA, the healing goddess, a surname of Athena, under which she was worshipped at Athens.

PAGANALIA, an annual Roman festival celebrated by the inhabitants of each of the pagi or districts into which the country was divided from the time of Numa.

PAGANS, a name applied to Heathens or IDOLATERS (which see), from the circumstance that, by ancient Christian writers, those who adhered to the old Roman religion were called Pagani, because, for a long time after Christianity became the prevailing religion of the towns, idolatry continued to maintain its hold over the inhabitants of the country districts. The name religio Paganorum, religion of the Pagans, first occurs as applied to heathenism in a law of the Emperor Valentinian of the year 368.

PAGASÆUS, a surname of Apollo, derived from Pagasus, a town in Thessaly, where he had a temple.

PAGODA, a house of idols. In Hindustan, Burmah, and China, it implies a temple in which idols are worshipped. It is likewise applied to an image of some supposed deity. A Hindu pagoda or temple is merely a receptacle for the idol, and a company of Brahmans as its guardian attendants. Hence, as there is not much occasion for light, there are few or no windows. The light of day is usually admitted only by the front door when thrown wide open. Darkness is thus mingled with light in the idol cell, and tends to add to the mysteriousness of the scene. The pagodas in honour of Vishnu and Shiva are loftier and more spacious than those in honour of inferior divinities. Large endowments, in many cases, are expended in support of the pagodas, their idols, and attendant Brahmans. The ceremonies observed by the Hindus in building a pagoda are curious. They first enclose the ground on which the pagoda is to be built, and allow the grass to grow on it. When the grass has grown considerably, they turn an ash-coloured cow into the enclosure to roam at pleasure. Next day they examine carefully where the cow, which they reckon a sacred animal, has condescended to rest its body, and having dug a deep pit on that consecrated spot, they place there a marble pillar, so as that it may rise to a considerable height above the surface of the ground. On this pillar they place the image of the god to whom the pagoda is to be consecrated. The pagoda is then built quite round the pit in which the pillar is placed. The place in which the image stands is dark, but lights are kept burning in front of the idol. Besides the large pagodas there are numberless smaller ones, many of which have been erected by wealthy Hindus for the purpose of performing their private devotions in them. A pagoda for Hindu worship generally consists of an outer court, usually a quadrangle, sometimes surrounded by a piazza, and a central edifice constituting the shrine, which again is divided into two parts, the sabha or vestibule, and the garbhagrha or adytum, in which the image is placed. When a Hindu comes to a pagoda to worship, he walks round the building as often as he pleases, keeping the right hand towards it; he then enters the vestibule, and if there be a bell in it, as is usually the case, he strikes upon it two or three times. He then advances to the threshold of the shrine, presents his offering to the Brahman in attendance, mutters inaudibly a short prayer, accompanied with prostration of the body, or simply with the act of lifting his hands to his forehead, and straightway retires.

PAH-KWA, a Chinese charm, consisting of eight diagrams arranged in a circular form. This is one of the charms in most common use in China, and the figure is thus formed :

The eight diagrams are thus described by Mr. Cuthbertson, an American missionary to the Chinese : "They are triplets of lines, whole and broken, the various combinations of which produce eight sets of triplets, each having its peculiar properties. These, by further combination, produce sixty-four figures, which also possess their several peculiar powers. The first set are representative respectively of heaven, vapour, fire, thunder, wind, water, mountains, earth. These mysterious figures embody, in some inscrutable manner, the elements of all change, the destinies of all ages, the first principles of all morals, the foundation of all actions. They of course furnish important elements for the subtle calculations of the diviner. From such a system of calculation, the results obtained must depend wholly on the ingenuity and imagination of the practitioner. The figure of the eight diagrams is seen everywhere. It is often worn upon the person. It is seen, too, pasted in conspicuous positions about houses, chiefly over the door, to prevent the ingress of evil influences."

PAIN (MYSTICAL), a certain indescribable agony which has been believed by mystics to be necessary, in order to prepare them for a state of rapture. "This mysterious pain," says Mr. Vaughan, "is no new thing in the history of mysticism. It is one of the trials of mystical initiation. It is the depth essential to the superhuman height. With St. Theresa, the physical nature contributes toward it much more largely than usual; and in her map of the mystic's progress it is located at a more advanced period of the journey. St. Francis of Assisi lay sick for two years under the preparatory miseries. Catharine of Siena bore five years of privation, and was tormented by devils beside. For five years, and yet again for more than three times five, Magdalena de Pazzi endured such 'aridity,' that she believed herself forsaken of God. Balthazar Alvarez suffered for sixteen years before he earned his extraordinary illumination. Theresa, there can be little doubt, regarded her fainting fits, hysteria, cramps, and nervous seizures, as divine visitations. In their action and reaction, body and soul were continually injuring each other. The excitement of hallucination would produce an attack of her disorder, and the disease again foster the hallucination. Servitude, whether of mind or body, introduces maladies unknown to freedom."

"These sufferings," adds the same writer, "are attributed by the mystics to the surpassing nature of the truths manifested to our finite faculties (as the sun glares pains the eye),—to the anguish involved in the surrender of every ordinary religious support or enjoyment, when the soul, suspended (as Theresa describes it) between heaven and earth, can derive solace from neither,—to the intensity of the aspirations awakened, rendering those limitations of our condition here which detain us from God an intolerable oppression,—and to the despair by which the soul is tried, being left to believe herself forsaken by the God she loves."

PALÆMON, a surname of HERACLES (which see).

PALAMITE CONTROVERSY. See BARLAAMITES.

PALATINUS, a surname of Apollo, under which he was worshipped at Rome, where he had a temple on the Palatine hill.

PALES, a deity worshipped by the ancient Romans as presiding over shepherds and their flocks.

PALICI, demons anciently worshipped in the neighbourhood of Mount Ætna in Sicily. They were said to be twin sons of Zeus and Thaleia, daughter of Hephestus. In remote ages they were propitiated by human sacrifices. The temple of the Palici was resorted to as an asylum by runaway slaves.

PALILIA, a festival celebrated at Rome annually on the 21st of April in honour of Pales, the god of shepherds. On the same day afterwards this festival was kept as a memorial of the first founding of the city by Romulus. A minute description of the ceremonies practised on this occasion occurs in the Fæsti of Ovid. The first object to which the festival was directed was a public lustration by fire and smoke. For this purpose they burnt the blood of the OCTOBER HORSE (which see), the ashes of the calves sacrificed at the festival of Ceres, and the shells of beans. The people were also sprinkled with water, they washed their hands in springwater, and drank milk mixed with must. In the evening the stables were cleansed with water sprinkled by means of laurel-branches, which were also hung up as ornaments. To produce purifying smoke for the sheep and their folds, the shepherds burnt sulphur, rosemary, fir-wood, and incense. Sacrifices, besides, were offered, consisting of cakes, millet, milk, and other eatables, after which a prayer was offered by the shepherds to Pales, their presiding deity. Fires were then kindled, made of heaps of hay and straw, and amid cheerful strains of music the sheep were purified by being made to pass three times through the smoke. The whole ceremonies were wound up with a feast in the open air. In later times the Palilia lost its character as a shepherd-festival, and came to be held exclusively in commemoration of the day on which the building of Rome commenced. Caligula ordered the day of his accession to the throne to be celebrated as a festival under the name of Palilia.

PALL, the covering of the altar in ancient Christian churches. It was usually a linen cloth, but sometimes it was composed of richer materials. Palladius speaks of some of the Roman ladies who, renouncing the world, bequeathed their silks to make coverings for the altar. And Theodoret says of Constantine, that among other gifts which he bestowed upon his newly-built church of Jerusalem, he gave a royal pall, or piece of rich tapestry for the altar.

PALLADIUM, an image of Pallas Athena, which was looked upon as a secret source of security and safety to the town which owned it. The most celebrated of these was the palladium of Troy, which was believed to have come down from heaven. It was an image three cubits in height, holding in its right hand a spear, and in its left a spindle and distaff. It was stolen by Odysseus and Diomedes, under the impression that while it remained in the city, Troy could not be taken. After this, various towns both in Greece and Italy claimed to have obtained possession of this sacred image. Pausanias speaks of an image bearing the name of the Palladium, which stood on the Acropolis at Athens.

PALLAS, a surname of Athena, always joined with her name in the writings of Homer, but used independently by the later writers, to denote this goddess.

PALLENIS, a surname of Athena, under which she was worshipped between Athens and Marathon.

PALLIUM, the consecrated cloak of a Romish archbishop, which he receives from the Pope, as a token of the full possession of the pontifical office and privileges. The Grecian philosophers in ancient times were accustomed to wear a pallium or cloak; and when some early Christian teachers assumed this dress, their enemies took occasion to deride them. Hence Tertullian wrote a treatise de Pallio, showing the folly and malice of the objection grounded on wearing this gown. Jerome says of his friend Nepotian, that he kept to his philosophic habit the pallium, after he was ordained presbyter, and wore it as long as he lived. He asserts the same of Hieracles, presbyter of Alexandria. Thus gradually the philosophic pallium came to be used by the Western monks and afterwards by the other clergy. It was not, however, until many centuries had elapsed that the pallium came to be conferred by the popes of Rome as a sign of pontifical dignity and authority. At first it was bestowed by the Christian emperors upon the prelates as a badge of authority over the inferior orders of the clergy. It was first conferred by the bishops of Rome in the sixth century. The first who bestowed it was Pope Vigilius, who sent it, A. D. 543, to Auxenius, bishop of Arles. Pelagius I., the successor of Vigilius, sent it also to Sabaudus, the next bishop of Arles. Towards the close of the sixth century, Gregory I. sent it to many bishops, and among the rest to Augustine of Canterbury, declaring, at the same time, that the custom was to give it only to bishops of merit who desired it importunately. Even in the ninth century, Hincmar observes, that "the pall is only an ornament suitable to the metropolitans as a mark of the dignity or virtue of him who wears it." Before the end of the fourteenth century, however, it was believed to convey extensive spiritual powers, so that, in the decretals of Gregory XI., it was declared, that without the pallium an archbishop could not call a council, consecrate a bishop, make the chrism, dedicate churches, or ordain clergy. Innocent III. went still farther, having decreed that it conveys the plenitude of apostolic power, and that neither the functions nor the title of archbishop could be assumed without it. Even though the archbishop may have already received the pallium, still in the event of his translation to another charge, he must petition the see of Rome for a new pallium. An archbishop-elect cannot have the cross carried before him until he has received the pallium. Nor can any patriarch or archbishop wear the pallium out of his own province, nor even within the same at all times, but only in the churches in the solemnities of mass, on special feast-days; but not in processions, nor in masses for the dead; moreover, the pallium is a personal thing, and, therefore, cannot be lent to another, nor left to any one at death, but the patriarch or archbishop must be buried with it on him.

The pallium being a vestment possessed, in the view of the Romish Church, of peculiar sacramental efficacy, is made with very special ceremonies. The nuns of St. Agnes present two lambs every year as an offertory on the altar of their church on the feast day of their patron saint. These holy lambs are conveyed away during the night, and put to pasture till shearing time, when they are shorn with great ceremony, and the pall is made of their wool mixed with other wool. Having been manufactured, it is laid on the high altar of the Lateran church at Rome, which is said to contain the bodies of the apostles Peter and Paul. From this time it is supposed to convey full pontifical power to any person on whom the Pope confers it for that purpose; and, accordingly, when the pallium is sent from Rome, it is delivered with great solemnity in these terms: "We deliver to thee the pallium taken from the body of the blessed Peter, in the which is the plenitude of the pontifical office, together with the name and title of archbishop, which thou mayest use within thy own church on certain days expressly mentioned in the privileges granted by the apostolic see." At the inauguration of a Pope also, the chief cardinal-deacon arrays him in the pallium, addressing him thus: "Receive the pallium which represents to you the duties and perfection of the pontifical function; may you discharge it to the glory of God, and of his most holy mother, the blessed Virgin Mary, of the blessed apostles St. Peter and St. Paul, and of the holy Roman Church." It is said to have been Boniface who introduced the custom of conferring the pallium on metropolitans, as a sign of their spiritual dignity; this robe of honour having been previously bestowed only on primates, or the special representatives of the Pope. Boniface, however, made it a mark of dependence on the Roman see.

PALLOR, a divine personification of paleness or fear, which was regarded by the ancient Romans as a companion of Mars.

PALLORII, priests of the Roman deity PALLOR (which see).

PALM-SUNDAY, the Sunday immediately before Easter, which derives its name from palm-branches having been strewed on the road by the multitude, when our Saviour made his triumphal entry into Jerusalem. This festival is annually celebrated with great pomp at St. Peter's church at Rome. The Pope, magnificently arrayed, is carried into the church on the shoulders of eight men, attended by his court. The priests bring him palm-branches, which he blesses and sprinkles with holy water. Then the cardinals, bishops, priests, and foreign ministers receive from his holiness a palm-branch, some kissing his hand, and others his foot. Then the procession of palms commences, and the whole is ended by high mass; after which, thirty years' indulgence is granted to all who witness the ceremony. Every member of the congregation carries home his branch, which, having been blessed by the Pope, is regarded as a sure preservative against several diseases, and an instrument of conveying numberless blessings. The sacristan reserves some of these branches, in order to burn them to ashes for the next Ash-Wednesday.

PALM-TREE, a tall and graceful tree which is common in many parts of the East and in Africa. It is rarely found in Palestine now, though formerly it abounded in that country, and hence is frequently mentioned in Sacred Scripture. Thus, in Psalm xcii. 12, its flourishing growth is referred to as emblematic of the prosperity of the righteous man.

"The righteous shall flourish as the palm-tree." The Hebrews carried palm-branches in their hands at the Feast of Tabernacles. Palm-branches were strewed along the road as our Lord made his last entry into Jerusalem. Those who conquered in the Grecian games received a branch of palm in token of victory; and in the Apocalypse, the redeemed are represented as standing before the throne and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and with palms in their hands. The ancients believed the palm to be immortal; or, at least, if it did die, that it recovered again, and obtained a second life by renewal.

PALMER, a religious pilgrim who vows to have no settled home.

PAMBŒOTIA, a festival celebrated by all the inhabitants of Bœotia, that they might engage in the worship of Athena Itonia. While this national festival lasted, it was unlawful to carry on war; and, accordingly, if it occurred in the course of a war, hostilities were forthwith interrupted by the proclamation of a truce between the contending parties.

PAN, the great god worshipped by the ancient Greeks as presiding over flocks and shepherds. He was born in a perfectly developed state, having horns, beard, goats' feet, a tail, and his body all covered with hair. His father Hermes carried him to Olympus, where he became a favourite of the gods. The earliest seat of the worship of Pan appears to have been Arcadia, whence it passed into other parts of Greece. He was the god of flocks and shepherds, and all that belonged to the pastoral life, including the use of the shepherd's flute. Fir-trees were consecrated to this god, and sacrifices were offered to him, consisting of cows, rams, lambs, milk, and honey. He was extensively worshipped throughout various parts of Greece. Later writers speak of him as the symbol of to pan, the universe, and, indeed, identical with it.

PANACEIA (Gr. the all-healing), a daughter of Asclepius, worshipped at Oropus.

PANACHEA, the goddess of all the Achæans, a surname of Demeter and also of Athena.

PANATHENÆA, the most famous of all the festivals celebrated in Athens in honour of Athena Polias, the guardian of the city. At first it was called Athenæa, being limited in its observance to the inhabitants of Athens, but afterwards being extended to all Attica, it received the name of Panathenæa, in the reign of Theseus, who combined the whole Attic tribes into one body. The Panathenæa were distinguished into the greater and the lesser, the former being celebrated every fifth year, while the latter were celebrated annually. On the year in which the greater occurred, the lesser Panathenæa were wholly omitted. Both these festivals continued for twelve days, which was a longer time than any other ancient festival lasted. The greater was distinguished from the lesser festival by being more solemn, and marked by a splendid procession, at which the peplus of Athena was carried to her temple.

The Panathenaea were observed with solemnities of various kinds. Bulls were sacrificed to Athena, each town of Attica, as well as each colony of Athens, supplying a bull. Races on foot, on horseback, and in chariots were indulged in; contests were held in wrestling, in music, and in recitation; amusements, in short, of every kind, were practised on this festive occasion. The prize of the victors in these contests consisted of a vase supplied with oil from the olive-tree sacred to Athena, which was planted on the Acropolis; and numerous vases of this kind have been discovered in different parts of Greece and Italy. In the case of the victors in the musical contests, a chaplet of olive-branches was given in addition to a vase. Dancing was one of the amusements in which the people indulged at this festival, and, particularly, the pyrrhic dance in armour. Both philosophers and orators also displayed their skill in debate. Herodotus is even alleged to have read his history to the Athenians at the Panathenaea. Another entertainment, on the occasion of this festival, was the LAMPADEPHORIA (which see), or torch-festival. A representation of the solemnities of the great procession in the Panathenaea is found on the sculptures of the Parthenon in the British Museum. This procession to the temple of Athena Polias was the great solemnity of the festival, and probably occurred on the last day, as the crowning act of the occasion. It seems to have been limited to the greater Panathenaea, and to have had as its object the carrying of the peplus of Athena to her temple. The peplus or sacred garment of the goddess was borne along in the procession, suspended from the mast of a ship, which was so constructed as to be moved along on land by means of underground machinery. Nearly the whole population of Attica took part in the procession, either on foot, on horseback, or in chariots; the old men carrying olive-branches, the young men clothed in armour, and maidens of noble families, called CANEPHORI (which see), carrying baskets, which contained gifts for the goddess. At the great Panathenaea golden crowns were conferred on those individuals who had deserved well of their country, and prisoners were set at liberty during the festival.

PANDANA. See EMPAIDA.

PANDEMOS, a surname of Aphrodite, under which she was worshipped at Athens from the time when Theseus united the scattered tribes of Attica into one political body. White goats were sacrificed to this goddess. The surname of Pandemos was also applied to Eros.

PANDIA, said to have been a goddess of the moon worshipped by the ancient Greeks.

PANDIA, an Attic festival, the precise nature of which is somewhat doubtful, some supposing it to have been instituted in honour of the goddess mentioned in the preceding article, and others alleging it to have been a festival in honour of Zeus, and celebrated by all the Attic tribes, just like the Panathenaea already described. It was held on the 14th of the Greek month Elaphebolion, and it appears to have been celebrated at Athens in the time of Demosthenes.

PANDORA, the name of the first woman according to the ancient Greek cosmogony. When Prometheus stole fire from heaven, Zeus in revenge ordered Hephaestus to make a woman out of the earth, who should be the source of wretchedness to the whole human family. When created she received the name of PANDORA, all gifts, as being endowed with every quality by the gods, wherewith she might accomplish the ruin of man. According to some writers she was the mother, and according to others the daughter, of Pyrrha and Deucalion. Later writers tell the story of Pandora's box, which contained all the blessings of the gods, but which, through the rashness of Pandora, in opening the box, were irrecoverably lost. She is mentioned in the Orphic poems as an infernal goddess, associated with Hecate and the Furies. Pandora is sometimes used as a surname of Ge, the earth, from the circumstance that it supplies all blessings to man.

PANDROSOS, a daughter of Cecrops and Agraëlos, worshipped at Athens along with Thallo. She had a sanctuary there near the temple of Athena Polias.

PANEGYRIS, a term used by the ancient Greeks to denote a meeting of an entire nation or people, for the purpose of uniting together in worship. It was a religious festival, in which the people engaged in prayer, sacrifices, and processions, besides games, musical contests, and other entertainments. At these meetings poets recited their verses, authors read their productions, orators delivered speeches, and philosophers conducted grave debates in the midst of assembled multitudes. At a later period the Panegyris seems to have degenerated into a mere market or fair for the sale of all kinds of merchandise, and to have almost entirely lost its religious character.

PANELLENIA, a festival of all the Greeks, as the name implies. Its first institution is ascribed to the Emperor Hadrian.

PANHELLENIUS, a surname of Dodonean Zeus, as having been worshipped by all the Hellenes or Greeks. There was a sanctuary built for his worship in Ægina, where a festival was also held in honour of him.

PANIONIA, the great national festival of the Ionians, in honour of Poseidon, the god whom they specially revered. On this occasion a bull was sacrificed, and if the animal roared during the process of killing, it was regarded as pleasing to the deity. The sacrifices were performed by a young man of Priene, who was chosen for the purpose, with the title of king. The festival was held on Mount Mycale, where stood the Panionium or temple of Poseidon Heliconius.

PANIS BENEDICTUS (Lat. Blessed bread). This expression occurring in a passage of the work of Augustine on baptism, has given rise to much controversy respecting the sacrament of the catechumens. But Bona, Basnage, and Bingham have clearly shown that the panis benedictus of Augustine was not the sacramental bread at all, but bread seasoned with salt; and that this at baptism was administered with milk and honey, salt being the emblem of purity and incorruption. The blessed bread of the Greek Church is the ANTIDORON (which see).

PANIS CONJURATUS. See CORSNED BREAD.

PANOMPHILEUS, a surname of Zeus, as being the author of all omens and signs of every kind.

PANTHEISTS, a class of infidels who maintain that God is the soul of the universe, the one and only true existence, the Infinite Element into which all being ultimately resolves itself. This belief, that God is all, and that all is God, a belief which amounts to a complete denial of a living personal God, has been held by some men of a peculiarly mystical turn of mind in all ages and countries. It had its origin at a very remote period in the East, and forms, in fact, the groundwork of the entire system of the Vedanta school of philosophy, which proceeds upon the fundamental axiom, "Brahm alone exists; all else is an illusion." According to this ancient Pantheistic system, when man regards external nature, and even himself, as distinct from Brahm, he is in a dreaming state, realizing only phantoms, but when he recognizes Brahm as the one totality, he rises to a waking state, and science is this awaking of humanity. It is at death, however, that the soul of the sage will be completely freed from illusion, when he shall be finally blended and lost in Brahm, the one infinite being, from whom all things emanate, and to whom all things return. Pantheism is the necessary result of such a system. It denies true existence to any other than the one absolute, Independent Being. It declares that what is usually called matter can have no distinct separate or independent essence, but is only an emanation from, and a manifestation of, the one, sole existing spiritual essence—Brahm.

The philosophy of Greece, in its earliest form, was thoroughly Oriental, and, accordingly, the Orphic doctrines, which, from their very remote antiquity, are shrouded in mystery, are supposed by Dr. Cudworth to have been Pantheistic in their character, the material world being termed "the body of Zeus," in a poetic fragment said to have been written by Orpheus. At an after period, we find the doctrine of EMANATIONS (which see), taught by Pythagoras and other Greek philosophers, more especially by Xenophanes, the founder of the Eleatic school. With the exception, however, of the last mentioned school, the Greeks can scarcely be charged with having taught Pantheism as a system. Zeno, the most distinguished Eleatic philosopher, maintained that there was but one real existence in the universe, and that all other things were merely phenomenal, being only modifications or appearances of the one substratum. It was not, however, in Greece that Pantheistic doctrines met with extensive acceptance; they found a more favourable soil in the dreamy speculative Oriental mind. The ancient Egyptian mythology was framed on principles of this kind, and at a much later period, the Alexandrian school was deeply imbued with a Pantheistic spirit. In the doctrines of the Neo-Platonists and various Gnostic sects, we can plainly trace the same tendency. God was with them the universal idea, which includes the world as the genus includes the species. Scotus Erigena, also, declared that God is the essence of all things. What men call creation was with him a necessary and eternal self-unfolding of the Divine nature. This doctrine was revived in the thirteenth century by Amalric of Bena and David of Dinant, who declared God not to be the efficient cause merely, but the material, essential cause of all things. The practical extravagance of this Pantheism was repeated by the mystics of the fourteenth century, not, however, in a materialistic, but in an idealistic form. They held the creatures to be in and of themselves a pure nullity, and God alone to be the true being, the real substance of all things. All things are comprised in him, and even the meanest creature is a partaker of the Divine nature and life. Such was the doctrine of the Behghards, the Brethren of the Free Spirit, and the later Cathari.

The Pantheists of the Middle Ages held different shades of opinion, which it is difficult accurately to distinguish. Some claimed for themselves a perfect identity with the Absolute, which reposes in itself, and is without act or operation. Another class placed themselves simply and directly on an equality with God, alleging that being by nature God, they had come into existence by their own free-will. A third class put themselves on a level with Christ according to his divine and human nature. A fourth class finally carried their Pantheistic notions to such an extravagant length as to land themselves in pure nihilism, maintaining that neither God nor themselves have any existence. Among the Pantheistical mystics of the fourteenth century, Eckart occupied a very high place, having wrought his doctrines into a regular speculative system. "This system," says Dr. Ullmann, "resembles the dome of the city in which he lived, towering aloft like a giant, or rather like a Titan assailing heaven, and is for us of the highest importance. Not unacquainted with the Aristotelian Scholasticism, but more attracted by Plato, 'the great priest,' as he calls him, and his Alexandrian followers, imbued with the mystical element in the works of Augustine, though not with his doctrine of original sin, and setting out from the foundations laid by the Areopagite, Scotus Erigena, and by the earlier mystics of the Middle Ages, but adhering still more closely to the Pantheistic doctrines which Amalie von Bena and David of Dinant had transferred to the sect of the Free Spirit and to a part of the Beghards, Master Eckart, with great originality, constructed out of these elements a system which he did not expressly design to contradict the creed of the church, but which nevertheless, by using its formulas as mere allegories and symbols of speculative ideas, combats it in its foundations, and is to be regarded as the most important mediæval prelude to the Pantheistic speculation of modern times."

The fundamental notion of Eckart's system is God's eternal efflux from himself, and his eternal reflux into himself, the procession of the creature from God, and the return of the creature back into God again by self-denial and elevation above all that is of a created nature. Accordingly, Eckart urges man to realize habitually his oneness with the Infinite. From this time the doctrine of a mystical union with God continued to occupy a prominent place in the writings of those German divines who were the forerunners of the Reformation. The language was Pantheistic, but the tenet designed to be inculcated was accurate and Scriptural. "This mysticism," says Mr. Vaughan, "clothes its thought with fragments from the old philosopher's cloak, but the heart and body belong to the school of Christ."

Spinoza has been usually regarded as the father of modern Pantheism, but in the writings of Jordano Bruno, who wrote in the course of the latter half of the sixteenth century, a system as decidedly Pantheistic as that of Spinoza is fully developed. This eminent Italian philosopher boldly lays down the principle, that all things are absolutely identical, and that the infinite and the finite, spirit and matter, are nothing more than different modifications of the one universal Being. The world, according to this system, is simply the unity manifesting itself under the conditions of number. Taken in itself the unity is God; considered as producing itself in number, it is the world. It was in the writings of Spinoza, however, that Pantheism was, for the first time, exhibited in the regular form of a demonstration. Fully developing the principles of Des Cartes, who derived existence from thought, Spinoza identified them, referring both to the one Infinite Substance, of which everything besides is simply a mode or manifestation. Thus the distinction between God and the universe was annihilated, and Pantheism openly avowed. To the philosophy of Spinoza, propounded in the seventeenth century, is to be traced that Pantheistic spirit which has pervaded the philosophy as well as theology of Germany since the commencement of the nineteenth century. Schelling and Hegel, in fact, have proved themselves faithful disciples of Spinoza, carrying out to their legitimate extent the principles of this rigid logical Pantheist. Fichte, by his subjective idealism, had banished from the realms of existence both Nature and God, reducing everything to the all-engrossing Ego. Schelling reproduced what Fichte had annihilated, but only to identify them with one another, thus declaring plainly the universe and God to be identical, nature being, in his view, the self-development of Deity. The philosophy of Hegel was equally Pantheistic with that of Schelling, inasmuch as he declared everything to be a gradually evolving process of thought, and God himself to be the whole process.

Thus "the fundamental principle of philosophical Pantheism," to use the language of Dr. Buchanan, in his 'Faith in God and Modern Atheism Compared,' "is either the unity of substance, as taught by Spinoza,—or, the identity of existence and thought, as taught, with some important variations, by Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel. The Absolute is conceived of, not as a living Being to whom a proper personality and certain intelligible attributes may be ascribed, but as a vague, indeterminate something, which has no distinctive character, and of which, in the first instance, or prior to its development, almost nothing can be either affirmed or denied. But this absolute existence, by some unknown, inherent necessity, develops, determines, and limits itself: it becomes being, and constitutes all being: the infinite passes into the finite, the absolute into the relative, the necessary into the contingent, the one into the many; all other existences are only so many modes or forms of its manifestation. Here is a theory which, to say the very least, is neither more intelligible, nor less mysterious, than any article of the Christian faith. And what are the proofs to which it appeals,—what the principles on which it rests? Its two fundamental positions are these,—that finite things have no distinct existence as realities in nature,—and that there exists only one Absolute Being, manifesting itself in a variety of forms. And how are they demonstrated? Simply by the affirmation of universal 'Identity.' But what if this affirmation be denied? What if, founding on the clearest data of consciousness, we refuse to acknowledge that existence is identical with thought? What if we continue to believe that there are objects of thought which are distinct from thought itself, and which must be presented to the mind before they can be represented by the mind? What if, while we recognize the ideas both of the finite and the infinite, the relative and the absolute, the contingent and the necessary, we cannot, by the utmost effort of our reason, obliterate the difference between them, so as to reduce them to one absolute essence? Then the whole super-structure of Pantheism falls along with the Idealism on which it depends; and it is found to be, not a solid and enduring system of truth, but a frail edifice, ingeniously constructed out of the mere abstraction, of the human mind."

Nor is Pantheism confined to the philosophic schools of Germany; it has been taught, also, from her pulpits and her theological chairs. The boldest and most reckless of her Pantheistic divines is undoubtedly Dr. David Friedrich Strauss, who represents the left wing of the Hegelian system, as applied to theology, and who, in his 'Das Leben Jesu,' has resolved the entire Gospel history into a mass of mythological fables, and recommended the worship of human genius as the only real divinity. Strauss is an extreme Pantheist. With Hegel he believes God to have no separate individual existence, but to be a process of thought gradually unfolding itself in the mind of the philosopher. Christ, also, he regards as simply the embodied conceptions of the church. This is the extreme point to which Pantheism has been carried in Germany, and at this point it becomes nearly, if not completely, identical with Atheism. A personal God, and a historical Christianity, are alike rejected, and the whole doctrines of the Bible are treated as a congeries of mythological ideas. Such outrageous infidelity as this was scarcely exceeded by that of Feuerbach, when he declared that religion was a dream of the human fancy.

While this controversy was still raging, both in the philosophical and theological world, there arose, after the Revolution of 1830, a school of light literature, which went by the name of Young Germany, and which, combining German Pantheism with French wit and frivolity, had as its avowed object, by means of poems, novels, and critical essays, to destroy the Christian religion. This school, headed by Heine, Börne, and others, substituted for the Bible doctrine that man was created in the image of God, the blasphemous notion that God is no more than the image of man. The literary productions, however, of this class of infidel wits was more suited to the atmosphere of Paris than that of Berlin, and, accordingly, some of the ablest writers of the school left Germany for France, and Young Germany, having lost its prestige, was speedily forgotten.

The Pantheistic system is too abstract and speculative in its character to find acceptance with the French mind generally; but the prevailing philosophy of France is deeply imbued with Pantheism. Thus Cousin, the founder of the modern eclectic school of France, declares God to be "absolute cause, one and many, eternity and time, essence and life, end and middle, at the summit of existence and at its base, infinite and finite together; in a word, a Trinity, being at the same time God, Nature, and Humanity." In what words could Pantheism be more plainly set forth than in those now quoted, yet Cousin anxiously repels the charge of Pantheism, simply because he does not hold with Spinoza and the Eleatics that God is a pure substance, and not a cause. Pantheism, however, assumes a variety of phases, and though Cousin may not with Spinoza identify God with the abstract idea of substance, he teaches the same doctrine in another form when he declares the finite to be comprehended in the infinite, and the universe to be comprehended in God.

The system of philosophico-theology, which maintains God to be everything, and everything to be God, has extensively spread its baleful influence among the masses of the people in various continental nations. It pervades alike the communism of Germany and the socialism of France. Feuerbach, in the one country, holds that God is to be found in man, and Pierre Leroux, in the other, that humanity is the mere incarnation of Divinity. And in our own country, the same gross Pantheism, decked out with all the charms of poetry and eloquence, has been imported from America. Man-worship is, indeed, the pervading element of the philosophy taught by the Emerson school, or INTUITIONISTS (which see), and believed by a considerable number of speculative thinkers in England. "Standing on the bare ground," says the apostle of this latest form of Pantheism, "my head bathed by the blithe air, and uplifted into infinite space, all mean egotism vanishes. The currents of the Universal Being circulate through me. I am part or particle of God."

The Pantheist repels with indignation the charge of Atheism. Far from denying the existence of God, he pretends to recognize God in all he sees, and hears, and feels. In his creed all is God, and God is all. But the very essence of his system consists in the denial of a living personal God, distinct from Nature and presiding over it. This, if not Atheism, approaches to the very verge of it. We may theoretically distinguish Pantheism and Atheism from each other, but the man who can look around him and say that the universe is God, or that he himself is an incarnation of God, a finite particle of the Infinite Being, makes assertions tantamount in meaning to the statement, that there is no God. Christianity has no longer to maintain a conflict with open, avowed, unblushing Atheism, but with secret, plausible, proud Pantheism. Nor can the result of the conflict be doubtful. Christianity will assuredly triumph over this, as she has already done over all her former adversaries, and men will rejoice in recognizing the One Living Personal God, who watches over them, to whom they can pray, in whom they can trust, and with whom they hope to dwell throughout a blessed eternity.

The baneful effects of Pantheism cannot fail to unfold themselves wherever, as among the Hindus, it lies at the foundation of the prevailing religion. Its practical fruits, in such circumstances, are moral degradation, barbarism, and cruelty. The natural consequences of a Pantheistic creed are thus ably sketched by Dr. Buchanan: "The practical influence of Pantheism, in so far as its peculiar tendencies are not restrained or counteracted by more salutary beliefs, must be deeply injurious, both to the individual and social welfare of mankind. In its Ideal or Spiritual form, it may be seductive to some ardent, imaginative minds; but it is a wretched creed notwithstanding; and it will be found, when calmly examined, to be fraught with the most serious evils. It has been commended, indeed, in glowing terms, as a creed alike beautiful and beneficent,—as a source of religious life nobler and purer than any that can ever spring from the more gloomy system of Theism: for, on the theory of Pantheism, God is manifest to all, everywhere, and at all times; Nature, too, is aggrandised and glorified, and everything in Nature is invested with a new dignity and interest; above all, Man is conclusively freed from all fantastic hopes and superstitious fears, so that his mind can now repose, with tranquil satisfaction, on the bosom of the Absolute, unmoved by the vicissitudes of life, and unscared even by the prospect of death. For what is death? The dissolution of any living organism is but one stage in the process of its further development; and whether it passes into a new form of self-conscious life, or is re-absorbed into the infinite, it still forms an indestructible element in the vast sum of Being. We may, therefore, or rather we must, leave our future state to be determined by Nature's inexorable laws, and we need, at least, fear no Being higher than Nature, to whose justice we are amenable, or whose frown we should dread. But even as it is thus exhibited by some of its warmest partizans, it appears to us, we own, to be a dreary and cheerless creed, when compared with that faith which teaches us to regard God as our 'Father in heaven,' and that 'hope which is full of immortality.' It is worse, however, than dreary: it is destructive of all religion and morality. If it be an avowed antagonist to Christianity, it is not less hostile to Natural Theology and to Ethical Science. It consecrates error and vice, as being, equally with truth and virtue, necessary and beneficial manifestations of the 'infinite.' It is a system of Syneretism, founded on the idea that error is only an incomplete truth, and maintaining that truth must necessarily be developed by error, and virtue by vice. According to this fundamental law of 'human progress,' Atheism itself may be providential; and the axiom of a Fatalistic Optimism—'Whatever is, is best'—must be admitted equally in regard to truth and error, to virtue and vice."

PANTHEON, a heathen temple still remaining at Rome, called also the Rotunda. It was anciently dedicated, as appears from the inscription on the portico, to Jupiter and all the gods, by Agrippa, son-in-law to the Emperor Augustus; but in A. D. 608, it was re-dedicated by Pope Boniface IV., to the Virgin Mary and all the saints. In this once Pagan, but now Romish temple, may be seen different services going on at different altars at the same time, with distinct congregations round them, just as the inclinations of the people lead them to the worship of this or that particular saint. In 1632, a Barberini, then on the Papal throne, thought he would add to his reputation by disfiguring the Pantheon, which he despoiled of the ornaments spared by so many barbarians, that he might cast them into cannon, and form a high altar for the church of St. Peter.

PAPA, father, a name anciently applied to all bishops, though now claimed as the special prerogative and sole privilege of the bishop of Rome. Thus we find Jerome giving the title to Athanasius, Epiphanius, and Paulinus, and among Cyprian's Epistles, those written to him are addressed Cypriano Papæ, to Father Cyprian. Many proofs might be adduced, which clearly show that Papa was the common name of all bishops for several ages; and it was sometimes applied even to the inferior clergy, who were called pape pisini, little fathers, and their tonsure or crown, papalebra, the tonsure of the fathers. The first bishop of Rome who obtained the title of Universal Bishop, and commenced the line of popes, properly speaking, was Boniface III., in A. D. 606. But it was not till the publication of the PSEUDO-ISIDOREAN DECRETALS (which see), in the ninth century, that the temporal as well as the spiritual authority of the bishop of Rome was authoritatively declared, it being intimated in these decretals that the Emperor Constantine had transferred his sovereign authority in Rome to the Roman bishop, and from that date commenced a new era in the history of Romanism.

PAPACY, a term used to denote the Church of Rome, not in its ecclesiastical character, but in its political constitution and position, as aspiring to, and claiming, pre-eminence and power with relation to European society and governments. In this article, accordingly, we are concerned not with the spiritual, but with the temporal authority of the Pope, and it will be our principal aim to trace the various steps by which the papal system has risen to its present position as a political government on the earth. The first introduction of Christianity into Rome does not appear to have been distinguished by any peculiarities which marked it out as different from its introduction into other places. In the Acts of the Apostles we learn that "strangers of Rome" were present at Jerusalem when the Spirit was remarkably poured out on the Day of Pentecost; and it is possible, nay, not unlikely, that some of those persons on their return home publicly avowed their adherence to the Gospel of Christ, and laid the foundation of a church in their native city. And so rapidly does the truth seem to have advanced in Rome, that the Apostle Paul, in addressing an Epistle to the Christians there in the middle of the first century, mentions their faith as having been "spoken of throughout the whole world." The conclusion, therefore, is legitimate, that at an early period, coeval, indeed, with the churches of Jerusalem and Antioch, there was a Christian church in Rome. The arrival of Paul as a prisoner at Rome during the persecution under the Emperor Nero, must have had no small effect in encouraging and establishing the Christians in that city. Considerable doubts have been raised on the point as to the visit of Peter to Rome, but granting that he resided there for a time, it must have been after the date of Paul's Epistle to the Romans, as that apostle makes no mention of Peter amid the numerous Christians to whom he sends salutations by name. The period, therefore, of Peter's arrival in Rome was, in all probability, about the time of Paul's release from prison; and the two apostles are sometimes by the earlier writers classed together as founders of the Church at Rome.

No trace, however, of assumed authority and power on the part of the Roman Church is to be found until the lapse of at least 150 years from the Christian era. About that time, in the reign of Commodus, may be discovered the first germs of the papacy, in a celebrated passage which occurs in the writings of Irenæus. That early father, in his work against Heresies, speaks of the Roman Church as "at once the largest, the most ancient and universally known, and which was founded and constituted by the two most illustrious apostles, Peter and Paul." Again, he adds, that "every church, that is to say, the faithful of all parts, must of necessity repair to, or agree with (convenire ad) this church on account of its greater pre-eminence (propter potorem principatatem)—a church in which the apostolical tradition has always been preserved by those who are of all parts." This passage, to which Romish writers attach no small importance, has been rejected by not a few ecclesiastical authors, as occurring only in a Latin translation of the original Greek, which has been unhappily lost. But even admitting its authenticity, it is to be observed, that while Irenæus speaks of the Roman Church as entitled to respect, he neither attributes to it the right of authority over other churches, nor does he imply that it made any such pretensions. No doubt, even at that early period the Church of Rome was accounted the chief of the Western churches; but a few years later, Irenæus, though bishop of the smaller and poorer church of Lyons, in a letter to a Roman bishop, refused to yield undue submission to the large and wealthy Church of Rome. The occasion on which this letter was written, was the Paschal controversy, in which Victor, bishop of Rome, holding the generally entertained opinion, that Easter, or the festival of the Resurrection, should be celebrated on the Lord's day, and no other, addressed a letter to the faithful everywhere, declaring that his own church should not hold communion with the churches of Asia Minor, and endeavouring to persuade the bishops of other churches to adopt a similar measure. In this attempt, though made with a spirit of overweening arrogance, Victor was completely unsuccessful; but throughout the whole of his conduct, we see nothing which would warrant us in charging this Roman bishop with an attempt to usurp a power of governing other churches. It is impossible, however, to shut our eyes upon the fact, that the rising spirit of the papacy may be traced throughout the whole of this transaction, there having been an evident attempt to compel the minority of churches to yield to the dictates of the majority. "The spirit of ecclesiastical aggression and tyranny," says Mr. Riddle, in his 'History of the Papacy,' "had begun to work; and it developed itself, first, in the sentiments and conduct of a Roman bishop. And observe how insidious was the attempt. There was, in the first place, an effort at something like persuasion: Victor tried the effect of a letter, a paternal letter as he no doubt would have called it, but in fact a threatening letter, as a means of inducing compliance; and with regard to the act of writing this letter (though not as to the tone of it), he could appeal to the practice of sending and receiving epistles which had prevailed from time immemorial among Christian churches. Failing in his brotherly endeavour at persuasion, he sought to arouse a spirit, which indeed would not come at his command, but which, if he could have evoked it, would have displayed itself in an act of persecution against his unoffending brethren of the East. He did not succeed in his unworthy efforts; but he set a pernicious example to bishops of later times, and framed an idea of spiritual despotism which was afterwards carried out to an extent such as neither himself nor his contemporaries could possibly have foreseen. Victor, in short, being himself in advance of his age, attempted to get up, and bring into action, a kind of Church union;—a step which he was led to take, either thinking that he possessed, or at least being desirous of possessing, the influence of a leader."

In the course of the Easter controversy, church councils were for the first time convened, and those assemblies being generally presided over by the bishop of the largest or the most influential church in the district, a difference of rank, and a system of subordination among both the clergy and the churches, began to manifest themselves. The president of a council was naturally recognized as having a precedence among his brethren, and he being in most cases the bishop of a metropolitan church, the bishops of smaller communities came to acknowledge him as their superior. The metropolitans, therefore, as primi inter pares, first among their equals, soon obtained the right of convening and conducting synods, and of confirming and ordaining provincial bishops. The same circumstance which led to the elevation of the Metropolitans conduced, in a still higher degree, to give power and pre-eminence to the bishops of the three principal cities, Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch. To these bishops, accordingly, were assigned larger dioceses, Rome having obtained Middle and Lower Italy, with uncertain limits, while Egypt was assigned to Alexandria, and Syria to Antioch.

Of these three principal churches, that of Rome was the largest, the most wealthy, and the most honoured of all the churches of the West, and was thus placed in circumstances peculiarly advantageous for asserting authority over the other churches. So early as the middle of the second century a Jewish party in Rome claimed, in behalf of the Apostle James, a right to be recognized as a bishop of bishops, a movement which was looked upon by the African churches as equivalent to an ecclesiastical tyranny. But in the close of that same century, although the bishop of Rome, in common with all other bishops, received the name of Papa or father, the existence of papal authority and power was as yet unknown. The germs of it, however, may be discerned in that pre-eminence in size and reputation which was now so extensively conceded to the Church of Rome. In the second century, besides, the doctrine of the universal priesthood of Christians began to be lost sight of, and a separate sacerdotal caste made its appearance in the Christian Church. It is in the writings of Tertullian that the distinction between clergy and laity is for the first time developed, and the superiority of the former to the latter plainly asserted. And coeval with this formation of a sacerdotal caste, a tendency began to develop itself among Christians generally, to substitute outward in place of inward religion, and in the course of the third century many additions were made to the Christian ritual, which, from their very nature, indicated a melancholy declension from the primitive simplicity of Christian worship. Before the time of Constantine numerous innovations had been introduced into the service of the church, all tending towards that increase of priestly power, which formed the very foundation of the papacy.

The first presage of the future position of the Roman Church was afforded in two attempts which it made to impose its usages upon other churches. These were sternly repelled by the Asiatic and African bishops. Cyprian acknowledges the Roman to be the principal church in various passages of his writings, without, however, allowing that it possessed a supremacy inconsistent with the parity of all bishops. But it is an undoubted fact, that Cyprian saw, in what he considered the pre-eminence of the Apostle Peter, the symbol of ecclesiastical unity, and in a passage of his work on the unity of the church, this writer introduces the phrase as applied to the Church of Rome, of cathedra Petri, or chair of Peter. In the minds of the Roman bishops themselves, the idea early arose, and took deep root, that their connexion with the Apostle Peter authorized them to take precedence of all other apostolic churches as the source of the apostolic tradition. It was this impression, doubtless, which led Victor to assume the high ground which he took on the subject of the dispute about Easter. And after the middle of the third century, we find Stephanus, another Roman bishop, displaying equal presumption in the controversy about the validity of the baptism of heretics, and even daring to excommunicate the churches of Asia Minor and of North Africa, which refused to acknowledge the tradition of the Roman Church, as an unalterable and decisive law, binding on all other Christian churches. The arrogant claims, however, set forth by the Roman bishops were rejected by the whole of the Eastern, and even by many of the Western churches. Cyprian openly declared, in a council of more than eighty of the bishops of North Africa, that "no one should make himself a bishop of bishops;" and when Stephanus appealed to the authority of the Roman tradition, and spoke against innovations, Cyprian replied, that it was Stephanus himself who had made the innovations, and had broken away from the unity of the church. Such language is far from indicating that Cyprian acknowledged the bishop of Rome as entitled to exercise supreme jurisdiction in the church. On another occasion, also, Cyprian, in the name of the North African synod, declared, that the decision of the Roman bishop was without force, and therefore not entitled to be respected.

The elevation of Constantine the Great to the imperial throne, and the subsequent establishment of Christianity as the legal and recognized religion of the Roman Empire, had an important influence upon the fortunes of the church. Extensive immunities were granted to ecclesiastical persons; large donations of money, corn, and land were bestowed upon the church; a portion of the public revenue was appropriated to the use of the clergy, and unlimited license was given to testamentary bequests in favour of the church. In the new state of matters various arrangements made by the emperor tended to strengthen the power of the clergy, and to prepare the way for papal domination. Constantine was himself supreme in all causes ecclesiastical, as well as civil; but taking advantage of his position, he gave into the hands of the rulers of the church a large share of political influence and power. From the moment that he embraced Christianity he seems to have regarded himself as the temporal head and governor of the church. He issued commissions for the decision of church controversies, convened councils, and sometimes presided over them, while their decrees were without force, unless they received the imperial ratification. He even appointed to ecclesiastical offices, and deposed or otherwise punished ecclesiastical offenders. In the exercise of his assumed power he invested the canons of councils with the authority of civil law, and thus made them universally binding on the people. Heresy now became a crime against the state, as well as against the church, and a foundation was laid for all the subsequent persecutions.

By the transfer of the seat of empire to Constantinople, the ecclesiastical power, in the hands of the bishops of Rome, received considerable extension. Not being kept in check by the presence of the civil ruler, they found less difficulty in securing to themselves political power. As yet, however, we find no pretension to supreme authority on the part of the bishop of Rome. On the contrary, at the council of Nice, A. D. 325, summoned by the authority of Constantine, the sixth canon runs in these terms: "The ancient custom in Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis shall continue to be observed, namely, that the bishop of Alexandria have ecclesiastical jurisdiction over all these districts; as the bishop of Rome, according to usage, exercises such jurisdiction over the churches of certain countries. In like manner also their privileges shall be preserved to the Church of Antioch and the churches in other provinces. In general, it is plain that the great council will not suffer any person to remain a bishop who has become such without the consent of the metropolitan. If, however, an otherwise unanimous election of a bishop, according to the laws of the church, should be factiously opposed by only two or three, the choice of the majority shall prevail." This canon expressly asserts the equal authority of the three metropolitan, afterwards patriarchal, sees of Alexandria, Rome, and Antioch. The jurisdiction of the bishop of Rome is also declared to be limited to certain countries. And this was in reality the case. The Roman bishop exercised a metropolitan jurisdiction over the ten suburbicarian provinces, which was as far as the political district of Rome extended, and comprehended Central and Lower Italy. Thus far, and no farther, the authority of the Roman bishop extended at the beginning of the fourth century, though afterwards, as primate or patriarch, he was recognized as the head of nearly all the churches of the West.

The high reputation which the Roman Church possessed in respect of apostolical tradition since the days of Irenæus, gave much value to her opinion and her decision as a mediator in all controversies. When the whole Eastern Church was Arian, she declared her strict adherence to the Nicene creed, and in consequence East Illyria sought an alliance with her, and the bishop of Thessalonica courted her friendship and countenance. "This same state of affairs," says Dr. Hase, "made the Roman court at the council of Sardica, A. D. 347, a court of cassation, for the reception of appeals in the case of bishops. The Eastern churches, when they were so disposed and when united among themselves, never hesitated to disregard the interference of the Roman bishops, and the synods of Nicea and Constantinople were entirely independent of his influence; but when the patriarchs contended with each other, or with the imperial court, his powerful friendship was generally sought by both parties, and was often purchased by concessions. From observing these facts, Innocent I. became convinced that even in his day nothing, in the whole Christian world, could be brought to a decision without the cognizance of the Roman see, and that especially in matters of faith all bishops were under the necessity of consulting St. Peter. The position of the Roman bishops in the state was that of powerful subjects who could be judged only by the emperor himself, but who, as in the case of Liberius for his defence of the Nicene creed, might sometimes be abused by him. But although the glory surrounding the apostolic chair had already become so attractive, that those who contended for it sometimes pressed towards it over the bodies of their competitors, it was still the subject of derision and complaint among the heathen. The recollection that this worldly glory commenced only in the time of Constantine, gave occasion to the remark, that Sylvester lived long enough to do and witness what was suitable for a Roman bishop according to more modern views."

The real founder, however, of the future greatness of the Roman see was Pope Leo I., usually styled the Great. Looking upon the Roman church as possessed of the true succession from the Apostle Peter, he regarded the bishop of that church as appointed by God to be head of the whole Church of Christ upon the earth. Taking advantage of the disturbed state of the African Church, in consequence of the outcry raised by the Arian Vandals, he added Africa to the Roman patriarchate. Through the influence of this ambitious Pope, Valentinian III. enacted a law which declared the apostolic see the supreme legislative and judicial authority for the whole church. This law was at first intended only for the West, and through the decay of the empire beyond the Alps, it became an empty title, to take effect only in subsequent times.

After the sixth century, the bishops of Rome were called Popes, and considered themselves as under a sacred responsibility to execute the decrees of councils, being invested, as they supposed, with a peculiar power derived from the divine right of Peter. And the vigour and energy with which they acted, recommended them to the favour of the people. More than once the popes delivered Rome and the surrounding country from the hands of the barbarians. And when the Western Empire had been completely destroyed A. D. 476, and a German kingdom had been set up in Italy, the Roman people continued to look upon the popes as their native rulers, giving them homage and obedience as the masters of the country. The high position of influence and power which the bishops of Rome had now acquired, enabled them the more readily to adopt measures for the farther aggrandisement of the clergy. With this view laymen were publicly prohibited from interfering in the affairs of the church, and the clergy were declared to be amenable to no bar but that of the Almighty.

Italy was reconquered by Justinian I., and the bishops and clergy of Rome became dependent upon Constantinople, a state of matters which continued till the time of Gregory I., who sought to establish ecclesiastical authority by the deliverance of the clergy from political dependence. No pontiff ever wore the triple crown who was more earnest than Gregory in promoting the interests of the Roman Church, and advancing the authority and influence of the popes. His successors sometimes acknowledged the authority of the emperor, but never willingly. In the celebrated and protracted controversy on the subject of image-worship, they hesitated not to lay the emperor under the ban of a solemn excommunication.

Until the time of Gregory, the papacy contended for dominion over the church, not only through the ambition of individual popes, but still more from the exigencies of the times: but after that period the struggle for the independence and ascendancy of the church assumed a totally different aspect. To his spiritual authority, as the vicerent of God upon the earth, the bishop of Rome now added temporal authority, having become lord of a considerable territory. At this period commenced the struggle between the emperors and the popes, which was severe and protracted. Though the Pope was the vassal of the emperor, and chosen under the imperial dictation, he received homage from each emperor as a spiritual father, from whose hand the crown was received. But during the reign of Louis the Pious, and the contentions of his sons for the government, the popes threw off to a considerable extent their dependence upon the emperors.

Towards the close of the eighth century the papacy made great advances towards the establishment of its temporal power, by the spurious story which arose, and was extensively credited, as to an alleged donation of Constantine the Great; that emperor, as was pretended, having given over Rome, and even the whole of Italy, to Pope Sylvester. This fiction received no little countenance from the alleged discovery of a document which purported to be the original deed of gift executed by Constantine in the Pope's favour, in A. D. 324. Only a short time elapsed when another expedient was resorted to for increasing the power and influence of the papacy; namely, the wide circulation of a new code of ecclesiastical laws framed on the principle of favouring the papal theocratic system. The collection now referred to, and which acquired great authority, by assuming the names of ancient popes, is usually termed the Pseudo-Isidorean Decretals, and professes to exhibit a complete series of the decretals of the Roman bishops from Clement I. A. D. 91, to Damasus I. A. D. 384. The claims of the papacy were here put forth under the authority of Christian antiquity. "It was repeatedly inculcated," says Neander, "that the Church of Rome was directly constituted head over all the others, by Christ himself. The episcopal chair of Peter, the princeps apostolorum, had been transferred on grounds of convenience from Antioch to Rome. The Church of Rome, which appoints and consecrates all bishops, is therefore the sole and sufficient judge, in the last resort, over the same, to which in all cases they may appeal. Among the important affairs which could not be decided without the authority of the Pope, belonged the cases of bishops. In one of the decretals, the condition is indeed expressed, that whenever an appeal is made, it should be reported to the Pope. But in other places, it is expressly declared, as indeed it follows, as a matter of course, from the principle lying at the ground of these decretals, that a decisive sentence can in no case whatsoever be passed upon bishops, without the concurrence of the Romish church, as well as that no regular synod can be convoked without its authority. Hence it followed again, that the Pope, whenever he thought proper, could bring the cause before his own tribunal, even where no appeal had been made, in case the bishop, as might indeed often happen under the circumstances of those times, had not dared to appeal; and the decision of the Pope must be acknowledged and carried into effect without demur. Moreover, it is already intimated in these decretals, that the Emperor Constantine had transferred his sovereign authority in Rome to the Roman bishop."

The firmness and energy of the government of Charlemagne were by no means favourable to the carrying out of such principles as were developed in the Pseudo-Isidorean Decretals. But the reign of his feeble-minded successor, Louis the Pious, and the quarrels which ensued between him and his sons, gave the church an opportunity of now and again taking part in the political strife. Gregory IV. came to France as mediator, but far from acknowledging him as necessarily supreme, the Frankish bishops threatened him with deposition.

The pontificate of Nicholas I., which commenced in A. D. 858, formed a new epoch in the history of the papacy. Boldly avowing his wish to follow out the principles of the Pseudo-Isidorean Decretals, he quoted this document for the first time as authoritatively binding upon the church. With that all-grasping ambition which has so often characterized the popes, Nicholas claimed the right of sovereignty over the universal church, and conceived the plan of convoking synods in Rome, composed of bishops from different countries, with the view of gathering information as to the state of the churches in all quarters, and promulgating the new ordinances throughout the whole world. He asserted a supreme authority over monarchs as well as bishops, obliging Lothaire II. to humble himself and own subjection to the papal see. On the death of Lothaire, Pope Adrian II. defended the rights of the lawful heir to the throne against Charles the Bald and Louis the German. Finding that he was defeated in his object by the firmness of Charles, he sought to win him over by promising him the succession to the empire. This project was executed by Adrian's successor, John VIII. who, however, compelled Charles, as the condition of obtaining the title of king of France, to acknowledge the independence of Rome and its territory, and to confess that he only held the empire by the gift of the Pope.

But while the popes were thus triumphant over the emperors, they were severely harassed by the turbulent feudal lords, who sought to establish for themselves a virtual independence. These feudal lords interfered in the election of the popes, and generally controlled them; they insulted, imprisoned, and murdered the pontiffs, and while the supremacy of the papal power was tacitly acknowledged throughout Europe, it was itself compelled to submit to a race of petty tyrants. Two shameless prostitutes, through their influence with the profligate nobles, procured the papal chair for their paramours and their illegitimate children; and so great were the disorders of the church, that the emperors once more rose above the popes, and Pope John XII. was deposed by the Emperor Otho, after summoning him before a synod at Rome, which convicted him of murder, blasphemy, and all kinds of lewdness. Leo VIII. was now elected to the papal throne, and the Romans swore to the emperor that no Pope should be chosen or consecrated without his consent. The succeeding popes were nominated and with great difficulty defended by the emperor against the hatred of the people and the craft of the Tuscan party. Such was the low state of degradation to which the church had sunk, that a loud cry was raised for its deliverance from the simony and the licentiousness of the clergy. Every office in the church was bought and sold. In these circumstances the emperors had little difficulty in maintaining their superiority over a race of profligate popes, who pretended to govern a church which was notoriously the seat of every species of corruption.

With the elevation of Leo IX. to St. Peter's chair in A. D. 1049, commenced a new era in the history of the papacy, when strenuous efforts were made to render the church independent of the secular power. The prevailing corruption of the clergy had now reached its height, and a strong reaction began to manifest itself. The soul of this new reforming movement was the monk Hildebrand, a man of remarkable talent, activity, and energy. In aiming at a reformation and emancipation of the church, two things seemed to be necessary, the introduction of a stricter moral discipline among the clergy by reviving the ancient laws concerning celibacy, and the abolition of simony in disposing of the offices of the church. Through the influence of Hildebrand over the mind of Leo, that Pope became zealous in opposing the abuses which had crept into the administration of ecclesiastical affairs, and yet amid his anxiety to reform the church, he transgressed its laws in his own person, by leading an army against the neighbouring Normans, who had laid waste the territories of the church. Such unwarrantable conduct, on the part of the head of the church, excited the greatest regret in the minds of all the true friends of ecclesiastical order; and all the more as the expedition proved disastrous, the Pope's army having been wholly destroyed, and the Pope himself taken prisoner; but when in his confinement he beheld the conquerors at his feet, he blessed their arms and confirmed their conquests. Leo died of a broken heart soon after his release from prison.

While Hildebrand was maturing his plans for the re-establishment of the papacy, many circumstances occurred which confirmed his desire to prosecute his design. For nearly two hundred years had the ecclesiastics of the diocese of Milan maintained their independence of the holy see; it appeared, therefore, to the cardinal-monk a most desirable object to bring about the submission of this refractory portion of the Italian clergy. A legate was, accordingly, despatched to Milan on this important errand; but though he apparently succeeded, it was only for a time, and no sooner had the legate departed than the clergy declared as strongly as ever their opposition to papal authority. The Anglo-Saxon Church had, from the very commencement of its history, declined to yield subjection to the see of Rome. Now, however, it was destroyed by the Norman conquest, to the success of which the interference of the Pope and of Hildebrand materially contributed. All the political struggles of this period, however, were cast into the shade by the daring citation of the Emperor Henry IV. The Saxons appealed to Rome against Henry for his intolerable oppression of his subjects, and for exposing to sale all ecclesiastical offices for the support of an army; and the then reigning Pope, Alexander II., at the instigation of Hildebrand, summoned the king to Rome that he might answer the charges made against him by his own subjects. This was plainly a declaration of open war between the spiritual and temporal authorities, and it was only the death of the Pope which prevented the contest from coming to an immediate crisis. The ambitious Hildebrand, on hearing the tidings of Alexander's death, felt that the time had now arrived for his entering upon the execution of his long-cherished plans, and assuming the dignity of an independent sovereign. Even at the funeral of Alexander, the people exclaimed "Hildebrand is Pope, St. Peter has elected him."

Hildebrand accepted of the papal tiara under the title of Gregory VII., and to disarm hostility, and prevent the election of an anti-pope, he feigned submission to the emperor, refusing to be consecrated without the imperial sanction. And yet no sooner did he find himself securely seated in St. Peter's chair than he proceeded forthwith to carry out his favourite plan for securing the independence of the church by preventing lay interference in the collation of benefices. The two great objects of this celebrated Pope, one of the most famous indeed in the history of the papacy, were, to enforce the celibacy of the clergy, and the right of the popes to the investiture of bishops. At a synod held at Rome A. D. 1074, Gregory re-established the ancient law of celibacy. A second synod was held at Rome in the following year, which condemned all simony, and pronounced a sentence of excommunication on every man who should give or receive an ecclesiastical office from the hands of a layman. These decrees were communicated to the sovereigns of Europe by Gregory himself in letters which afford ample evidence of the pre-eminent abilities of the writer. The kings contended earnestly in behalf of a long-established prerogative to which they had been accustomed to attach the greatest importance. Hence the protracted controversy on investitures between the emperors and the popes.

Gregory gladly availed himself of every opportunity to assert his privileges as a feudal lord paramount, and to exercise his office as a divine umpire and lawgiver among the nations of Europe. His plausible professions were viewed with great jealousy both by kings and nobles, accompanied as they were by an open invasion of their privileges. At length a conspiracy was formed against the pontiff in Rome itself, when Cincius, the prefect of the city, arrested his holiness while celebrating mass on Christmas day, and threw him into prison, but the populace interfered and rescued their favourite. The growing power and influence of Gregory could not fail to awaken suspicion in many of the crowned heads of Europe, but more especially was this the case with the youthful emperor, Henry IV., who saw with mingled jealousy and indignation a new power established which more than rivalled his own. In defiance of the Pope he restored bishops in his dominions who had been deposed and excommunicated for simony. Soon afterward Gregory cited the emperor to appear at Rome and answer to the charges laid against him, threatening him with excommunication if he disobeyed the summons. Enraged at the insolence and presumption of the Pope, Henry assembled a synod at Worms A. D. 1076, composed of the princes and prelates devoted to his cause, and procured a sentence of deposition against Gregory. The Pope replied by excommunicating Henry, and absolving his subjects from their allegiance, deposed several prelates in Germany, France, and Lombardy who favoured the emperor, and published a series of papal constitutions, in which the claims of the popes to supremacy over all the sovereigns of the earth were plainly set forth. The most important of these resolutions, which form the basis of the political system of the papacy, were as follows: "That the Roman pontiff alone can be called Universal. That he alone has a right to depose bishops. That his legates have a right to preside over all bishops assembled in a general council. That the Pope can depose absent prelates. That he alone has a right to use imperial ornaments. That princes are bound to kiss his feet, and his only. That he has a right to depose emperors. That no synod or council summoned without his commission can be called general. That no book can be called canonical without his authority. That his sentence can be annulled by none, but that he may annul the decrees of all. That the Roman Church has been, is, and will continue, infallible. That whoever dissents from the Romish Church ceases to be a Catholic Christian. And that subjects may be absolved from their allegiance to wicked princes."

Both the Emperor and the Pope now prepared for war, but all the advantages were on the side of Gregory. Henry was forsaken by the princes of his own court, who so far sided with the Pope, that they resolved, if the ban of excommunication were not removed from Henry within a limited period, he would be deprived of his throne. The emperor's condition was now one of peculiar perplexity, difficulty, and danger. He knew not in what direction to look for succour. In despair, therefore, he resolved to apply for a personal interview with the Pope, and to ask for absolution. He crossed the Alps, accordingly, in the depth of a severe winter with his queen and child, enclosed in the hides of oxen, and entered Italy so disheartened, that he thought only of conciliating his powerful enemy by submission. Through the intercession of some of the most influential Italian nobles, the Pope consented to grant Henry an interview. His holiness then resided at Canosa, and thither the emperor proceeded, but was doomed to experience at the hands of his holiness the greatest indignities that were ever heaped upon a sovereign. On reaching the papal residence, at the first barrier he was compelled to dismiss his attendants; when he reached the second he was obliged to lay aside his imperial robes, and assume the habit of a penitent. In this dress he was forced to stand three whole days barefooted and fasting from morning till night in the outer court of the castle during one of the severest winters that had ever been known in Northern Italy, imploring pardon of his transgressions from God and the Pope. He was at length admitted into the presence of the haughty pontiff, who, after all the humiliations to which the emperor had submitted, granted him not the entire removal, but only the suspension of the sentence of excommunication.

The harsh treatment which he had received from Gregory roused the indignation of Henry, and to retrieve his lost honour he joined the nobles of Lombardy in a renewed war against the Pope. The sentence of excommunication and deposition was again declared against the emperor, a rival Pope and a rival king were set up, and Italy and Germany were filled with blood. Henry besieged and took Rome in A. D. 1084; but the Pope, though shut up in his castle of St. Angelo, would accept of nothing short of the unconditional submission of the king. Having been liberated by Robert Guiscard, and finding that even his own people were not disposed to espouse his cause, Gregory retired to Salerno, where he was seized with a mortal disease, and died unconquered, repeating with his latest breath the excommunication he had issued against Henry and all his adherents. Thus terminated the career of the great founder of the papacy as a political power in Europe, and a power, too, which renders all subservient to its own aggrandisement.

The principles on which Gregory had acted throughout the whole of his public life, both as a cardinal-monk and as the proud occupant of the papal chair, continued long after his death to actuate his successors, so that in course of time the Pope became the controlling power, heading and directing every popular movement in the Western world. The CRUSADES (which see), had no small influence in placing the church on a political vantage-ground, from which, amid the general and all-absorbing fanaticism which pervaded the European nations, she could hurl her anathemas against the most powerful kings with little chance of encountering the slightest resistance. At the very first council, that of Clermont, which authorized the first Crusade, the king of France, in whose dominions the council met, was excommunicated, and could only obtain absolution by humiliating submission. To consolidate the papal structure, Paschal II. procured the enactment of a new oath to be taken by all ranks of the clergy, whereby they abjured all heresy, promised implicit obedience to the Pope and his successors, and pledged themselves to affirm what the church affirms, and to condemn what she condemns.

Henry V. proved a more formidable enemy to the papacy than his father. He led an army into Italy, took Pope Paschal prisoner, compelled him to perform the ceremony of his coronation, and to issue a bull securing the right of investiture to the emperor and his successors. By the remonstrances of his cardinals, however, the Pope was persuaded to annul the treaty, but the death of his holiness prevented an immediate war. Both Gelasius II. and Calixtus II. supported the policy of Paschal, and after a long struggle, the emperor was forced to resign his claim to episcopal investitures, with the exception of investiture to the temporal rights belonging to the sees. This was the purport of the Concordat agreed upon at an imperial diet at Worms in A. D. 1122, and confirmed the following year at the first general council in the Lateran. Such now was the authority of the papacy that the influence hitherto exercised by the emperors in the election of bishops was gradually transferred to the popes.

About this period arose Arnold of Brescia, a disciple of Abelard, who directed his attention to the reform of the church and of the government. The followers of this able and energetic man were numerous both in Italy and Germany. See ARNOLDISTS. Against this powerful party Innocent II., Celestine II., Lucius II., and Eugenius III. found it necessary to contend earnestly for their own domestic power; and during this period the aggressions of popery on the rights of kings and nations were suspended. The second council of Lateran, in A. D. 1139, at which a thousand bishops were present, condemned the opinions of Arnold, and by papal influence he was driven from Italy, France, and Zurich, until in the city of Rome itself he attained supreme power. Rome now set an example of resistance to the temporal power of the papacy, confining the Pope to the exercise of ecclesiastical government and to the possession of tithes and voluntary offerings. Lucius II. led an army against the Roman people, and though he was killed while his troops were storming the city, his successor, Eugenius III. made no attempts to conciliate his refractory subjects, but called in the assistance of the king of the Normans to protect him from their violence. While the popes were thus exposed to the contempt and hatred of the subjects of their secular government, a work appeared from the pen of St. Bernard, which was designed to prop up their tottering power. In this work, which was entitled 'Contemplations on the Papacy,' the author exhibits the system in its most favourable aspect, as designed by God for the promotion of the best interests of the people, but, at the same time, he candidly predicts that its worldly arrogance will prove its destruction. Neither by force nor flattery, however, could the Roman people be persuaded to subject themselves anew to the yoke of the papacy, and it was not until they discovered that the overthrow of the hated system would seriously diminish the funds of the Roman exchequer, that they consented anew to surrender their liberties to the pontiffs.

Frederick I. ascended the throne of Germany with the fixed resolution to re-establish if possible the ancient dominion on both sides of the Alps. He entertained the bold idea of rescuing his subjects from the subjection which had been so long yielded to a foreign bishop, and of forming a great national German Church, under the spiritual jurisdiction of the archbishop of Treves. The project, however, was unsuccessful, chiefly through the jealousy of the German princes. Soon after this a circumstance occurred which led to a remarkable assertion on the part of the papacy, of the right to bestow kingdoms and empires at pleasure. Henry II., king of England, anxious to annex Ireland to his dominions, applied to Pope Adrian IV. to sanction his undertaking, declaring that his chief object was to re-establish true Christianity, as he called it, in that island. Adrian acceded to Henry's request, and wrote him a letter professing to give over Ireland into his hands. This conveyance was communicated by Henry to the Irish hierarchy, but it was not until several years had elapsed, that Henry was formally proclaimed lord of Ireland, and the severest censures of the church denounced against all who should impeach the donation of the holy see, or oppose the government of its illustrious representative. No better proof could be given that the doctrine of the decretal and canon law, as to the papal supremacy, had now been admitted, than the fact that the English king asked for Ireland as a gift from the Pope, thus acknowledging the superiority of the Roman pontiff. This admission was, of course, fatal to the independence of Henry's crown, and paved the way for the exercise of the papal usurpation in the reign of his son John.

The death of Adrian gave Frederick an opportunity of asserting the ancient right of the emperors in the election of a successor; but finding himself unable to push matters to extremities, he contented himself with effecting the election of an anti-pope, Victor IV., in opposition to Alexander III., who was elected by the Norman party in the college of cardinals. The choice of the emperor was ratified by a council summoned to meet at Pavia, A. D. 1160, and several of the clergy, especially all the Cistercian monks who refused to acknowledge Victor, were compelled to leave the country. His rival Alexander retired to France, where he was kindly received, and gained over to his interest the kings of France, England, Spain, and most other countries of Western Europe. In 1164 Victor died, and the cardinals of his party chose as his successor Guido, bishop of Crema, who assumed the title of Paschal III., and was confirmed by the emperor. The Romans, however, recalled Alexander from France, but the emperor, having occasion to enter Italy with an army for the purpose of suppressing an insurrection of the Lombards, advanced to Rome, and took possession of the city, Alexander being compelled to flee in the garb of a pilgrim, and to seek shelter among the Normans. At length, in 1167, Alexander recovered his power in Rome, and having excommunicated Frederick, deposed him, and absolved his subjects from their allegiance. The death of Paschal III., in 1168, was followed by the election in his room of Calixtus III., who, however, though confirmed by the emperor, never obtained any considerable influence.

In the meantime the power of the papacy, while thus keenly opposed in Germany, was making rapid progress in other countries, more especially in France and England. To this result the famous dispute of Henry II. of England with the notorious Thomas à Becket not a little contributed. The haughty prelate, with whom the advancement of the papal authority was a paramount object, obstinately persevered in resisting the constitutions of Clarendon, by which all ecclesiastics were placed under the due control of the sovereign. Becket was banished, but he found an asylum with the king of France. The result of this struggle, which takes a prominent place in English history, was, that Becket triumphed over Henry, returned to England, and issued his excommunications against his opponents. His ambition and insolence provoked Henry to utter an unguarded exclamation, which was too rigidly interpreted by his followers. Becket was murdered at the altar, and the Romish Church has enrolled him in the list of her saints and martyrs. Henry was alarmed at the unexpected murder of the archbishop, and he lost no time in despatching an embassy to Rome, declaring himself ready to submit to any penance which the Pope might inflict, and to comply with any demands he might make. The humiliation of the English monarch tended more than any event which had happened for a long period to enhance the influence of the papacy throughout Europe. This event was speedily followed by another still more favourable and flattering to the Pope than the submission of Henry; the emperor of Germany having agreed to recognize Alexander as Pope, to receive absolution at his hands, to restore to him the government of the city of Rome, and to renounce the anti-pope. To proclaim his triumph over schismatics and kings, Pope Alexander summoned, in A. D. 1178, a large council, which was attended by nearly 300 prelates, and is usually reckoned the third general Lateran council. To prevent any schisms in future from controverted elections of the popes, this council decreed that the votes of two-thirds of the cardinals should be necessary to secure the success of a candidate.

The advances which the papacy had already made in temporal power and authority, encouraged the successors of Alexander to carry on a renewed struggle for supremacy with the emperors of Germany. The contest was protracted throughout another century, before the close of which the popes had contrived to exalt themselves far above the occupants of the imperial throne. England also, through the pusillanimity of King John, became the victim of papal ambition. A disputed election to the archbishopric of Canterbury was submitted to the decision of the Pope, by whom it was pronounced invalid, and another prelate named Langton nominated to the vacant see. King John refused to acknowledge the papal nominee, and seized upon the revenues of the clergy. Pope Innocent III. then laid all England under an interdict, and excommunicated the king. In vain did John strive to resist this act of the Romish pontiff; he was deposed by Innocent, and his kingdom handed over to Philip, king of France. Alarmed at this violent exercise of papal authority, John, with the most disgraceful cowardice, humbled himself before the Pope, and consented to receive England as a fief from the holy see. These transactions called forth one universal cry of indignation from the English people. The barons flew to arms, and in defiance of papal prohibitions, John was compelled to sign the MAGNA CHARTA of English liberty. It was to no purpose that the Pope hurled his anathemas against the estates and their charter; the papal power, notwithstanding the proud elevation it had reached, had now found an enemy too powerful to be withstood.

The same year (1215) that Innocent III. was foiled in his attempts upon England by the unflinching energy of her nobles and people, he summoned the fourth council of Lateran, which, by a solemn decree, declared the Pope to be the head of the great Christian family of nations, and elated by the pre-eminent superiority which he was declared to possess, Innocent, in his vanity, likened himself to the sun, and the various civil governments to the moon, receiving their light from him as from a feudal lord. Great was the presumption involved in such a statement, but it must be admitted that, by the exertions of this ambitious pontiff, Rome became once more the head of the civilized world.

At his death Innocent was succeeded by Honorius III., a man of mild dispositions, who was utterly unfit to maintain the ground which his predecessor had gained, and, accordingly, allowed the power of the papacy to be weakened in his contest with the emperor of Germany. The reign of Honorius, however, was very brief, and to repair the damage which had been occasioned by his weakness, the cardinals elected as his successor Gregory IX., a nephew of Innocent III., and of a kindred spirit with that eminent Pope. No sooner had he taken his seat in St. Peter's chair than the new pontiff assumed an attitude of uncompromising firmness towards the emperor. At his coronation Frederick had taken the vow of the cross, and renewed it at Jerusalem. But when called upon to fulfil his vow during the pontificate of Honorius, he had always evaded compliance. But Gregory would submit to no further delay, and perceiving that Frederick was taking no serious steps to fulfil his vow by setting out for Palestine, he issued a sentence of excommunication against the dilatory emperor, and sent it round to all the courts and kingdoms of Europe. It happened, however, that Frederick, actuated by mere motives of self-interest, had resolved to undertake the crusade in earnest. His preparations were nearly ready, and disregarding, therefore, the papal ban, he actually set out for Palestine in August 1228. The expedition was successful; he entered the holy city in triumph, placed upon his head the crown of Jerusalem, hastened back to Italy, and drove the soldiers of the Pope before him. At length a peace was concluded between the Emperor and the Pope, by which full satisfaction was made to the papacy for the injuries it had sustained, and even new political advantages were conferred upon it. Such an arrangement was peculiarly seasonable, as the Romans, weary of the priestly domination under which they had suffered so much oppression, had made a determined effort to throw off the yoke, and it was only through the effective aid of the emperor that Gregory was enabled to maintain his temporal sovereignty.

The success, however, which Frederick obtained soon after, in his war with the Lombards, awakened anew the jealousy of the Pope. The result was, that both parties came to an open rupture, and on Palm Sunday 1239, the Pope pronounced a solemn excommunication against the emperor, sending it throughout Europe along with an interdict upon every place in which Henry should reside. An angry epistolary controversy now ensued, in which an attempt was made, on the one side, to show the injustice of the papal sentence; and on the other to show that it was fully warranted by the conduct of the emperor. But the dispute was not confined to letters; the Pope raised an army of his own, and openly joined with the Lombards and Venetians against Frederick, who in turn led his troops into the States of the church, and shut up Gregory in Rome. In these circumstances the Pope, beleaguered in his own city, issued an order for the assembling of a general council the following year. Frederick, however, frustrated this design, and soon after the Roman pontiff died in extreme old age—an event which seemed for a time to promise a restoration of tranquillity.

Gregory IX. was succeeded by Celestin IV., who, however, survived his elevation only a month, and the cardinals, being divided in opinion as to the most suitable person to supply the vacancy, an interregnum of two years' duration ensued, at the end of which a cardinal of the Ghibelline or imperial faction was chosen under the name of Innocent IV. The new pontiff feeling that he was unable to cope with Frederick in the field, endeavoured to baffle him by negotiation. He professed, accordingly, the utmost readiness to be at peace with the emperor, and his overtures to that effect being accepted, a personal interview was arranged, at which a treaty of peace should be finally concluded. Meanwhile the Pope, probably afraid to meet Frederick, fled from Rome to Genoa, his native city, and after in vain asking for an asylum from the kings of England, France, and Arragon, he repaired to the free city of Lyons. Here he assembled a council, which solemnly deposed Frederick, and thus kindled a civil war throughout the empire. Offers of peace were made to the Pope through Louis IX., king of France; but these offers were rejected by Innocent, who set up a rival emperor, and adopted every expedient in his power to reduce Frederick to submission. Treason and rebellion were openly preached at the instigation of his holiness by many Romish ecclesiastics in Germany, and the Dominican monks urged their hearers to deeds of blood.

In 1250 the Emperor Frederick died, and was succeeded in the imperial government by his son Conrad. The Pope returned from Lyons to Rome, and as if his rage had been only redoubled by the death of his enemy, he persecuted and excommunicated the young emperor, offering the crown of Sicily to a brother of the king of England, and afterwards to a brother of the king of France. Germany was now the scene of civil commotions of the most painful kind, the clergy fighting against the laity, and the laity against the clergy. The unexpected death of Conrad did not diminish the hatred of the Pope to his family, although the young emperor before his death had bequeathed his infant son Conradin to the mercy of Innocent. Unsubdued by this mark of the confidence reposed in him, even by an enemy, the pontiff took possession of the Neapolitan dominions, while Manfred, the illegitimate son of Frederick, usurped the throne of Sicily, and refusing to do homage to the Pope, threatened to become as formidable an enemy of the papacy as his father had been. At this juncture, the ambitious career of Innocent was brought to a close by his death, which took place at Naples in the midst of schemes for the aggrandisement of the papal see, such as, had they not been arrested, would in all probability ere long have embroiled the whole of the European kingdoms in a general war.

Innocent IV. was succeeded by Alexander IV. who, though he excommunicated Manfred, found himself unable to encounter him alone, and, therefore, he sought the assistance of Henry III., king of England, offering the investiture of Sicily to his son Prince Edward. Aid, however, was refused, and Manfred setting the Pope at defiance, raised such a spirit of insurrection in the city of Rome, that Alexander fled to Viterbo, where he died. Urban IV., the next Pope, followed the same line of policy, but while engaged in negotiations with the view of giving the investiture of Sicily to Charles of Anjou, brother of the king of France, he also was cut off. The negotiations, however, were completed by his successor, Clement IV., who entered upon his pontificate with a firm determination to destroy Manfred, and with this view invited Charles to come into Italy. In accordance with this invitation, Charles set out for Rome with a large army, and having paid homage to the Pope, marched towards Naples to seize his new dominions. Manfred encountered the invaders at Beneventum, but was defeated and slain, after which the cruel conqueror murdered the wife, the children, and sister of his rival. Conradin now entered Italy to assert the hereditary claims of his family, and encouraged by the enthusiasm with which he was received, he went forward, in the face of papal excommunications, and took possession of Rome. Charles, however, appeared with his French army, and attacking Conradin, took him prisoner. He subjected the young prince, who was only sixteen years of age, to a mock trial, and commanded him to be executed. Thus perished on the scaffold the last prince of the house of Swabia, which had long been the most powerful obstacle to papal usurpation. The triumph of the papacy now appeared to be complete; Italy was severed from the German empire, but it recovered its independence only to be rent asunder by contending factions, and the pontiffs were doomed to discover that the spirit of freedom, which they had so largely encouraged, was a more formidable enemy than the German emperors themselves.

Charles of Anjou, fired with the ambition of conquest, aimed almost openly at the complete sovereignty of Italy. Assuming the title of Imperial Vicar, he usurped supreme power, and formed the project of overthrowing the Greek Empire, which had just been restored by Michael Palæologus. Gregory X. had succeeded Clement IV. in the chair of St. Peter, and being anxious to rouse Christendom to a new Crusade, as well as to put an end to the schism which divided the Greek and Latin churches, he saw that to effect these objects, it was necessary for him to restrain the ambition of Charles. With this view he procured the election of a new western emperor in the person of Rodolph of Hapsburg, who, in entering on his government, formally renounced all imperial rights over the city of Rome, and made provision for the separation of the kingdom of Sicily from the empire.

It was during the pontificate of Gregory X. that the second general council of Lyons was convened, at which was laid the foundation of the present mode of electing the popes. By this system the cardinals are bound to assemble ten days after the death of a Pope for the purpose of electing a successor, and to remain shut up until the new Pope shall be regularly elected by a majority of votes. Soon after the introduction of this new mode of election to the papal chair, the cardinals were called upon, with extraordinary frequency, to exercise their privilege, for it so happened, after the death of Gregory, that, in the course of one single year, three separate pontificates began and ended, those, namely, of Innocent V., Adrian V., and John XX. These short-lived Popes were succeeded by Nicholas III., who was well qualified to defeat the projects of Charles. The first step which this ambitious and crafty pontiff took after his election, was to enter into negotiations with the Emperor Rodolph. Charles, alarmed at this coalition, readily made concessions, resigning the title of Imperial Vicar to please Rodolph, and that of Roman senator, to gratify the Pope. Rodolph, remembering that the house of Hapsburg owed its elevation to the papal see, yielded to every demand of Nicholas, and confirmed the grants which had been made to the popes by Charlemagne and his successors. Ignorant of his hereditary rights, he permitted the provinces, which Rome called the patrimony of St. Peter, to be entirely separated from the empire. Thus the papacy was formed into a kingdom, and the Pope enrolled in the list of European sovereigns.

At this time, Charles having lost the affections of his subjects by his tyrannical conduct, a conspiracy was formed to deprive him of his kingdom. The Sicilians were quite prepared for revolt, and a signal of insurrection was about to be given, when the death of Nicholas delivered Charles from his most formidable foe. A Frenchman was now elected to the vacant see, who took the title of Martin IV., and his elevation being chiefly due to the influence of Charles, duke of Anjou, the new pontiff, as an expression of gratitude to his patron, restored to him the dignity of a Roman senator. The conspiracy, however, which had been forming in Sicily to put an end to French rule in the person of Charles, was now matured, and on the evening of Easter Monday,

A. D. 1282, the Sicilians, at the signal of the bell for vespers service, flew to arms, and massacred all the French on the island, declaring the rule of the foreign tyrant to be at an end. This wholesale butchery is known in history by the name of the Sicilian Vespers. When this event occurred, Charles was at Orvieto holding a consultation with the Pope, and when the tidings of the revolt reached him, his indignation knew no bounds; he prevailed upon the Pope to excommunicate the Sicilians, and all who were suspected of favouring their cause, while he himself hastily assembled an army and laid siege to Messina. For a time the inhabitants were so intimidated by the threats of the papal legate, and the boastings of the French, that they thought of surrendering, but they were happily relieved by the arrival of Peter, king of Arragon, who came to their assistance with a fleet. The rage of the Pope was now turned against Peter, who, however, in spite of the interdict pronounced upon his kingdom and the papal ban upon himself, kept possession of Sicily, and set the Pope at defiance. Charles made two different attempts to recover his kingdom, but without success; and both he and Martin were cut off the same year, 1285.

During the pontificates of the three succeeding popes, Honorius IV., Nicholas IV., and Celestin V., war was still carried on between the sons of Peter and the sons of Charles. The result was, that the crown of Sicily was given over to the princes of Arragon, who recognized the Pope as their liege lord, while Charles II. having consented to renounce all claim to the throne of Sicily, was secured in the possession of Naples.

Celestin V., when elected to the pontificate, was an old monk, who had lived for many years as a hermit, and being totally unfit for the office to which he was chosen, was persuaded to resign; whereupon Cardinal Cajetan ascended the papal throne, under the title of Boniface VIII. This remarkable man was at once crafty, ambitious, and despotic. His chief aim, in undertaking the papal office, was to establish to himself an undisputed sovereignty over ecclesiastics, princes, and nations, a sovereignty, in fact, both temporal and spiritual. He commenced his ambitious career by interfering in the political affairs of Naples and Sicily, authoritatively commanding Frederick of Arragon to lay aside the title of king of Sicily, and forbidding all princes and their subjects, under pain of excommunication, to lend him their support. Not contented, however, with intermeddling with the rulers of Italian principalities, he resolved to establish his authority, if possible, over the most powerful sovereigns of Europe. For this purpose he wrote to Philip the Fair, king of France, to Edward I., king of England, and to Adolphus, emperor of Germany, commanding them, under pain of excommunication, to settle their differences without delay. This bold and presumptuous step was quite in accordance with the lately acknowledged rights and duties of the papacy, but Philip, who was one of the ablest monarchs in Christendom at that time, wrote to Boniface a firm, though courteous reply, stating his readiness to listen to any exhortation coming from the see of Rome, but declaring that he would never consent to receive a command even from such a quarter. The Pope, however, was resolved, if possible, to humble the haughty monarch; and an opportunity of accomplishing his purpose now presented itself. To defray the expenses of his war with England, Philip had raised heavy contributions from the church and clergy, and some French prelates having forwarded a complaint to Rome, the Pope gladly took advantage of this circumstance, and issued the celebrated bull, called, from its commencing words, "Clericis laicos," excommunicating the kings who should levy ecclesiastical subsidies, and the priests who should pay them; and withdrawing the clergy from the jurisdiction of lay tribunals.

The attempt of Boniface to establish a theocracy independent of monarchy excited general indignation, not in France alone, but in other countries. In England Edward resorted to an expedient by which he compelled the ecclesiastics to pay their subsidies, namely, ordering his judges to admit no causes in which ecclesiastics were the complainants, but to try every suit brought against them. The king of France, again, while he refrained from openly opposing the Pope's bull, published a royal ordinance prohibiting the export from his dominions of gold, silver, jewels, provisions, or munitions of war without a license; and at the same time he forbade foreign merchants to settle in France. Such an edict as this would necessarily affect, in a very serious manner, the papal treasury, and therefore, Boniface lost no time in remonstrating with Philip, and urging upon him to modify his edict. At the same time the French bishops entreated Boniface to render his bull less stringent, there being no small danger that the effect of such a papal decree as the "Clericis laicos," might be the irretrievable ruin of the Gallican church. The Pope, accordingly, abandoned some of the most obnoxious provisions of the bull, and allowed Philip to impose a tribute upon the clergy of France to the amount of one-tenth of their revenues for three years. Still further to gratify the king and the whole French nation, Boniface carried out the canonization of Louis IX., which had been delayed for twenty-five years. Finally, the Pope promised to Philip that he would support his brother Charles of Valois, as a candidate for the imperial crown, and thus restore the empire to France. These measures had the desired effect on the mind of the French monarch, and at the beginning of 1298, the dispute between Philip and Edward was submitted to the arbitration of the Pope, who, with great pomp and solemnity, published his decision in the form of a bull. To the astonishment and mortification of the king of France, Boniface decided that Guienne should be restored to England, that the count of Flanders should receive back all his former possessions, and that Philip himself should undertake a new Crusade. When this papal decree was read in the presence of the French court, the king listened to it with a smile of contempt; but the count of Artois, enraged at the insolence of the Pope, seized the bull, tore it in pieces, and flung the fragments into the fire.

Without deigning to send any formal reply to the Pope's bull, Philip renewed the war. Angry reproaches now passed between the Roman pontiff and the French monarch, and the papal legate in France was thrown into prison for high treason. Boniface now issued edicts summoning the French prelates to Rome; but the king appealed to his people, and convened a general diet of his kingdom. The three estates assembled in 1302, and were unanimous in declaring France to be independent of the holy see. Boniface, accordingly, commenced a contest with the whole French nation. He denied that he had ever claimed France as a papal fief; but he maintained that every creature, on pain of final perdition, was bound to obey the Roman bishop. He then proceeded to excommunicate the king, who appealed once more to a general diet of his kingdom. Before that body he accused Boniface of the most flagrant crimes, and demanded that a general council should be forthwith summoned for the trial of the pontiff. His holiness in turn pronounced an interdict upon the kingdom of France, and bestowed the French crown upon the emperor of Germany. At the instigation of Philip, the Pope was imprisoned in his own city of Anagni, and although, after three days, he was liberated by his countrymen, such was the effect produced upon him, by the dishonour shown to his sacred person, that he died of a broken heart.

The death of Boniface marks an important era in the history of the papacy. From this time we find it seeking to avoid provoking the hostility of kings and emperors, acting only on the defensive, and though still theoretically maintaining its claims to universal supremacy, making no active efforts to enforce them. Gregory VII., Innocent III., and Boniface VIII., stand out from the long list of pontiffs as earnest supporters of the temporal authority of the popes, and vindicators of their supreme sovereignty, not only over the church, but over all the kingdoms of the earth.

Benedict XI., the successor of Boniface, being of a mild and pacific disposition, sought a reconciliation with the French king, by revoking all the decrees which had been passed against France. But the early death of this pontiff prepared the way for a new crisis, in which the political system of the papacy suffered greater shocks than any to which it had been hitherto exposed. When the cardinals met for the election of a successor to Benedict, the French and Italian parties were so violently opposed to each other, that the election was protracted for several months; but at length the choice fell upon Bertrand d'Agoust, archbishop of Bordeaux, who assumed the title of Clement V. This was the first of the series of popes who took up their residence at Avignon instead of Rome. By this new arrangement the Pope was brought into a state of complete dependence upon the French monarchs, whose interest it now became to perpetuate and uphold the papacy. For about five years, however, the intention of the new Pope to reside permanently within the dominions of France was carefully concealed, but at length it was openly divulged. The chief object which Clement seemed to have in view was to secure the countenance and support of the French king. Immediately after his accession, accordingly, he bestowed upon Philip a grant of the tenth of all church property in France for the space of ten years, and secured the future election of popes in the French interest, by nominating ten French cardinals. But one of the most flagrant instances of the complete subserviency of Clement to the will of Philip, was the part which he took in the abolition of the order of Knights Templar, having issued a bull to that effect.

The murder of Albert I., emperor of Germany, which occurred in 1308, led Philip to resume his old project of securing the imperial throne for his brother Charles of Valois. The electors, however, were not disposed to comply with the wishes of the French king, and their choice fell upon Henry of Luxemburg, who ascended the imperial throne, bearing the title of Henry VII. The Pope approved and confirmed the election, and commissioned his cardinals to crown the new emperor at Rome. Henry no sooner ascended the imperial throne than he put forward his claims to be recognized as sovereign of Italy; and in virtue of this assumed dignity, he summoned Robert, king of Naples, to appear before him as his vassal, and on his failing to appear, he put him under the ban of the empire. Clement, claiming to be Henry's superior, removed the ban; and even went so far as to excommunicate the emperor. The wars were now about to be renewed between the papacy and the empire; but the sudden death of Henry followed soon after by the death of Clement, obviated in the meantime such a calamity. But the vacancy thus caused in the imperial throne, and in the papal see, led, in the case of both, to a disputed succession. After a delay of two years another French Pope, John XXII., was elected. Philip, king of France, did not long survive Clement, and during the vacancy in the papal chair, Philip's successor, Louis X., also died.

At this period almost every kingdom of Europe was in a disturbed and distracted state, and the new Pope took advantage of the prevailing dissensions to revive the papal claims to the supremacy of Italy. In the election of a new emperor, also, in place of Henry, Pope John availed himself of the difference of opinion among the electors, some favouring Louis of Bavaria, and others Frederick of Austria, to advance his claim to act as vicar of the empire during an interregnum. He issued a bull accordingly asserting this claim in 1317. And the better to secure his hold upon the empire, John caused an oath to be taken by all the German bishops, that they would not acknowledge as emperor any one whom he should not confirm in that dignity. At length, however, the battle of Muhlendorf established Louis of Bavaria on the imperial throne, and though the Pope had been inclined to favour Frederick of Austria, he now vainly endeavoured to gain over the successful sovereign. Louis assumed the title of king of the Romans without waiting for the confirmation of the Pope, and exercised imperial rights in Germany and Italy. John was indignant at his authority being thus palpably overlooked, and after having, to no purpose, required him to abandon the administration of the affairs of the empire, he excommunicated him in a bull dated March 1324. In reply to the fulminations of the pontiff, the diet of Ratisbon, which met the same year, decreed that no papal bull against the emperor should be received, and that any person who should attempt to introduce such a document should be forthwith expelled from the empire.

At the invitation of the Ghibelline party, Louis marched into Italy in 1327, and in the beginning of the following year he entered Rome, and was crowned in St. Peter's by four temporal barons, having already received the crown of Lombardy at Milan. He now called together a public assembly of the Roman people, and in their presence deposed John from the pontificate as an arch-heretic. In a similar assembly summoned a few weeks thereafter he presented the Romans with a Pope under the title of Nicholas V. Meanwhile, Pope John at Avignon was issuing bulls and decrees against the emperor without the slightest effect. The emperor, however, having soon lost his influence, first at Rome, and then throughout Italy generally, returned to Germany; and his Pope was seized and sent to Avignon, where he was imprisoned for life. By a papal decree Italy was forever separated from Germany.

Louis was by no means satisfied with the state of affairs in Germany, and began to long for a reconciliation with the church. The Pope, perceiving that he was ready to make extensive concessions, endeavoured to prevail upon him unconditionally to abdicate. But while negotiations were in progress on this subject Pope John died. His successor in the papal chair, Benedict XII., urged strongly upon Louis to carry out his proposed abdication; but it was prevented by French influence. The complete dependence of the popes, indeed, upon the king of France, was felt by the imperial princes to be attended with many disadvantages, and all the estates agreed to adopt as a fundamental principle of state policy, that the imperial dignity and power are derived immediately from God, and, therefore, the emperor needed no other confirmation, having no superior in things temporal.

In 1342 Benedict having died, was succeeded by Clement VI., who maintained with unabated earnestness the contest between the papacy and the emperors. In vain did Louis apply for absolution; the refusal was followed by a bull of excommunication in 1343, which was renewed in 1346, and the electors, at the instigation of the Pope, elected to the empire Charles, the eldest son of the king of Bohemia. This election was opposed by the other estates, who strongly protested against the assumption that the Pope had power to depose the emperor. Charles fled to France, and it was not until two years after the death of Louis, which took place in 1347, that he was recognized as emperor, and crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle. Nor would the election of the Bohemian prince have been accepted even then, had not the Germans become weary of fighting with the popes.

While these contests were actively maintained between the papacy and the empire, other countries were also embroiled in similar quarrels. In England, during the reign of Edward II., a dispute having arisen between the sovereign and the other estates of the realm, the Pope was requested to act as arbiter. Legates, accordingly, were despatched from Rome with full powers to adjust the dispute; but the powerful party which was opposed to Edward, refused to allow the legation to enter the kingdom. The Pope was indignant at the insult offered to his deputies, and forthwith he laid England under an interdict, but from reasons of policy he did not see fit to push matters to extremities. A second time Edward found it necessary to apply for the good offices of the popes. Being involved in a war with the Scotch under Robert Bruce, and finding that matters had taken an unfavourable turn, he despatched an embassy to John XXII., in 1316, asking his assistance, and promising payment of all arrears due to the Holy see, as well as expressly acknowledging papal rights in England. This appeal to Rome was gladly received, and the Pope without delay issued a command to the Scottish king to cease from hostilities, and make a truce with Edward, at the same time charging the Irish, who were threatening rebellion, to continue their allegiance to the English monarch. The papal orders were disregarded both in Scotland and Ireland, and both countries, accordingly, were laid under an interdict. The war continued, and the king of Scotland in turn, finding himself in difficulties, applied to the Pope, who consented to remove the interdict from Scotland, and to compel the king of England to conclude a truce for two years. Thus did Rome succeed in procuring the recognition of papal rights both in England and Scotland.

Notwithstanding the close connection between the papal court at Avignon and the court of France, a quarrel ensued between them in 1340. Edward III.

of England, who had so far reduced the French under his authority, that he caused himself to be crowned king of France, despatched an ambassador to the Pope at Avignon. While on his journey the ambassador was seized by Philip, the French king, and the Pope, on hearing the intelligence, laid the whole kingdom of France under an interdict, a step which led to the speedy submission of the king, and the liberation of the ambassador.

Pope Clement VI. died in 1352, and was succeeded by Innocent VI., on whose elevation an attempt was made by the cardinals to obtain the entire control of the papal movements, and to have one-half of the revenues of the Church of Rome placed at their disposal. Had this attempt been successful, it would have inflicted a fatal blow upon the power of the papacy: but the new Pope made it one of the first acts of his pontificate to annul the arrangement by a formal deed of cassation. He reduced also the splendour of his court at Avignon, and introduced various salutary reforms. During the whole of his reign war raged between England and France, and on this account he was better able to maintain his independence of French influence and control than any of his predecessors throughout the entire line of Avignon popes. For a time after the removal of the pontiffs from Italy to France, the Romans rejoiced in their deliverance from papal rule, but the warm friends of the papacy felt that the change in the seat of government was injurious both to the power and the prestige of the popes, and that it was most desirable, now that they could act independently, that they should transfer the papal court again to Rome. Contrary, therefore, to the wishes of his cardinals, and of the king of France, Urban V., who succeeded to the pontificate in 1362, removed in 1367 from Avignon to Rome, to the great delight of the Roman people, who had long felt that their city had lost much of its greatness by the absence of the popes.

Matters had now apparently returned to their ancient order, and the spectacle was witnessed by the Romans, of a solemn procession, in which the emperor was seen leading the Pope's horse from the castle of St. Angelo to St. Peter's church, and officiating as his deacon at the celebration of high mass. Urban had not, however, remained at Rome more than two or three years, when, in consequence of the unsettled state of affairs in Italy, he returned to Avignon, alleging, however, no other reason for the sudden step than the general good of the church. But whatever may have been the impelling motives which led to the change, it was far from favourable in its results to the temporal interests of the papacy. The Romans were enraged at being so soon deprived of the advantages which they derived from the residence of the popes in their city; and at length Gregory XI., the successor of Urban, yielded to the earnest solicitations of his Italian subjects, and returned in 1377 to Rome. His reception, however, by the States of the church was far from encouraging, and he was actually preparing to set out again for France, when he died in March 1378.

As Gregory had ended his days in Rome, the conclave was held in that city for the election of a successor, and the Romans having influenced the election, an Italian Pope was at length obtained in the person of Urban VI., who was unanimously elected, and gladly hailed by the Roman people. No sooner had the new pontiff taken his seat in St. Peter's chair than he began to treat with the most unwarranted severity the cardinals of the French party, charging them with extravagance, and even immorality, reducing their pensions, and in every way striving to weaken their influence. The consequence was, that the twelve French cardinals fled to Anagni, from which place they invited Urban to confer with them on the affairs of the church. The Pope made no reply, and having gained over to their party three Italian cardinals, they sought the protection of Charles V., king of France, and being assured of the royal support, they issued a manifesto, declaring that, in the election of Urban they had acted under constraint. In vain did the Pope appeal to a general council, to which he was willing to submit the question as to the validity of his election. The proposal was only met by another manifesto declaring the election of Urban to have been illegal, and calling upon him to resign the office without delay. In the course of a month they formally chose one of their own body, Cardinal Robert of Geneva, for their Pope, under the name of Clement VII. Thus was effected the well-known schism of the papacy, which lasted from 1378 to 1428.

The different European nations were divided in regard to the rival pontiffs, some adhering to the one, and some to the other. The chief supporters of Urban were the emperor of Germany, the kings of England, Hungary, and Poland, of Sweden and Denmark; while the kings of France and Scotland, along with Queen Joanna of Naples, adhered to Clement. The latter pontiff, who was the proper successor of the French popes, endeavoured at first to maintain his ground in Italy, but was at length compelled to escape to France, where he took up his residence at Avignon. The two rival popes hurled anathemas at each other, and though Urban died in 1389, the schism was not thereby brought to an end; but, on the contrary, so violent was the hatred of the Romans to the French, that almost immediately they chose a successor in the person of Boniface IX. This new Pope made a proposal to Clement, that if he would resign all claim to the pontificate, he would appoint him his legate in all the countries which had acknowledged him as Pope. The offer was instantly and indignantly rejected. The first effective movement for the restoration of peace was made by the University of Paris, which drew up a memorial recommending the abdication of both the contending popes, calling upon Charles VI., the king of France, to support them in making this pacific recommendation. A copy of the memorial was forwarded to Clement at Avignon, and such was the effect produced upon him that it caused his death. No sooner did this event happen, than the French king urged upon the cardinals at Avignon to take no steps in the meantime towards filling up the vacancy thus caused in the pontificate. The cardinals inclined to follow the suggestion, but declared their readiness to bind the Pope whom they should elect to abdicate as soon as the rival pontiff at Rome should do the same. Accordingly, they elected Cardinal Peter de Lucca under the title of Benedict XIII.; but though he solemnly swore to abdicate, he sternly refused when called upon to fulfil his engagement. Boniface IX., the rival pontiff in Rome, adopted the same course. The courts of Europe being earnestly desirous to put an end to this unseemly schism in the papacy, resolved to use compulsory measures, with the view of bringing about the abdication of the two refractory popes. Benedict was more unpopular than Boniface, and against him, therefore, the sovereigns directed their attacks. The king of France led the way in this movement, publishing an edict charging both popes with unfaithfulness to their engagement, renouncing on the part of his people all obedience to Benedict, and declaring that the French Church should be governed only by its own bishops, who alone should fill up the vacant benefices. Besides issuing this manifesto, the king of France despatched an army to Avignon, which shut up Benedict for three years in his own palace.

Boniface was supported by Robert, emperor of Germany, who sent an expedition into Italy to maintain the authority of the Italian Pope in opposition to that of his rival. Shortly after, chiefly through the influence of the duke of Orleans, a reconciliation took place between the French king and Benedict, who agreed to abdicate as soon as it might appear to be necessary. This Pope, in 1404, despatched an embassy to Boniface, inviting him to a personal conference on the present complicated state of affairs; but while the ambassadors were still in Rome, Boniface died, and availing themselves of this event to promote the interests of their master, they urged upon the cardinals the importance and desirableness of putting an end to the unhappy schism by electing Benedict. The French Pope, however, had rendered himself so unpopular, that the Italian cardinals preferred to choose a Pope of their own, and fixed upon Innocent VII.; and when, after a brief pontificate, he died in 1406, they chose Gregory XII., imposing in both cases the condition, that they should abdicate as soon as Benedict should take the same step. A reasonable time having elapsed, and there being still no prospect of either the one Pope or the other abdicating, the cardinals, on both sides, at length laid aside their divisions, and convoked a general council, which met at Pisa in 1409. To this important assembly the eyes of the whole church were anxiously turned. The attendance was large and highly influential, and envoys also were present from the courts of France and England. At the commencement of the proceedings the principle was formally affirmed, that the power with which Christ invested the church was independent of the Pope. The two rival pontiffs were then summoned before the council, and after a regular trial, were deposed for contumacy and the violation of their solemn engagements. It only now remained to elect a successor, and the cardinals having gone into conclave, they presented to the council an aged and peaceful cardinal as the new Pope, under the title of Alexander V. Notwithstanding this unanimous election, however, and its ratification by the council, Benedict still maintained authority in Spain and in Scotland, while Gregory was acknowledged by Rupert, emperor of Germany, and Ladislaus, king of Naples. Thus Christendom beheld the strange spectacle of three popes reigning at one and the same time, each professing to be the legitimate successor of St. Peter.

The party of Alexander V. was by far the strongest; but his adherents, who hailed his election as likely to promote the reformation of the church, were not a little disappointed by his postponement of all such matters to a council which he pledged himself to summon for the purpose in the course of three years. The advanced age, however, at which he assumed the tiara gave small promise of a lengthened pontificate. In one short year, accordingly, his course was run, and he was succeeded by Cardinal Cossa, under the title of John XXIII. The new pontiff, who, in early life, had been a pirate, was better fitted for the management of secular affairs than to exercise the duties of a spiritual office. Soon after his election he was driven from the Ecclesiastical States in a war with the king of Naples. He applied for aid in his difficulties to the Emperor Sigismund, who, however, declined to render him assistance, unless he would convene a council beyond the Alps for the removal of the schism and the reformation of the church. A council was accordingly summoned at the instance of John and the emperor to meet at Constance in 1414. At this famous assembly the acts of the council of Pisa were declared to be null and void, and it was agreed that all the three existing popes should be called upon to abdicate. There was a very general feeling, also, in favour of the impeachment of John XXIII., in consequence of the notorious profligacy of his character. He endeavoured to arrest the proceedings by manifesting an apparent readiness to resign the tiara, but in a short time, with the assistance of Frederick of Austria, he fled to Schaffhausen, revoking his promises, and assuming an attitude of proud defiance. After a short suspense, the council declared itself superior to the popes, and proceeding to the trial of John in his absence, and finding him guilty of a long list of crimes, they suspended him from his office, imprisoned, and at length deposed him. This was soon followed by the voluntary abdication of Gregory XII., who vacated the papal chair on the most honourable terms. Benedict was now called upon to take the same step; but he obstinately refused to resign the papal dignity, and was at length, in 1417, deposed by the council as a heretic with respect to the article asserting that there is only one Catholic Church.

The ground was now clear for the election of a new Pope, who should be recognized by all parties as the only sovereign pontiff. To secure unanimity as far as possible, six deputies from each of the European nations were combined with the twenty-three cardinals in the conclave, and the election fell upon Otho Colonna, a Roman noble, who took the name of Martin V. The council of Constance, from which high expectations were formed in the matter of church reform, terminated its proceedings in 1418, having been chiefly famous for healing the great schism of the West, and for condemning the reforming doctrines of Wycliffe and Huss. The latter having received a safe-conduct from the emperor, appeared before the council to defend the doctrines he had taught; but Sigismund was persuaded to forfeit his pledge, and to deliver the courageous reformer into the hands of his enemies, by whom he and his friend Jerome of Prague were burned at the stake as obstinate heretics. One of the most obnoxious tenets of the Bohemian reformer, which called forth the censures of the council, was the denial of the supremacy of the popes; and so enthusiastic were the members in the support of their new pontiff that, at the close of the whole proceedings, they attended him in solemn procession to the gates of Constance, the emperor leading his horse by the bridle.

Martin V. regarded his election to the papal chair as a sure evidence that the papacy had recovered its former supremacy, and his whole efforts were directed to maintain the pre-eminence it had gained. Himself descended from the illustrious Colonna family, and accustomed to the splendour of the Roman court, he sought to revive all its former luxury and pomp. One of the first acts of his pontificate was to declare that it was unlawful to make appeal from the decision of the Pope, a decree which was keenly opposed by the French clergy. Though John Huss had been burnt, as we have seen, by the orders of the council of Constance, the Hussite party had risen to great power, and actually threatened the security of the imperial throne. Martin proclaimed a crusade against them, chiefly in consequence of their determined hostility to the papacy, but though they protracted the struggle for several years, the unhappy divisions which arose in their councils finally led to the triumph of the papal party.

Benedict XIII., now arrived at extreme old age, still obstinately persisted in maintaining his right to the dignity of Pope, and his empty pretensions were supported by the king of Arragon. Death, however, put an end to the claims of Benedict, and the two cardinals who adhered to his party elected Clement VIII. as his successor—a step which would undoubtedly have renewed the schism of the papacy, had not Martin, using his influence with the king of Arragon, brought about the abdication of Clement; after which the two cardinals, by whom he had been chosen, went formally into conclave, and declared Martin V. to be the object of their inspired choice. Thus finally, in 1428, came to an end that papal schism which had lasted upwards of half a century.

The principles of Wycliffe and Huss on the question of the authority and power of the popes had now obtained extensive diffusion throughout a great part of Christendom. For a time Martin flattered himself that the doctrine of the papal supremacy was firmly established, but the events of every day served to undeceive him. A general demand arose for a new council, to which this contested point might be referred. The Pope resisted the urgent entreaties which reached him from all quarters, but at last he was compelled to yield, and it was agreed to convoke a council at Basle in 1431. Before the appointed time arrived, Martin died, and a successor was elected in the person of Eugenius IV., who, however, before assuming the tiara, took an oath, that he would interpose no hinderance to the meeting of the proposed council. The council, accordingly, assembled at Basle, and the new Pope, perceiving that its proceedings were likely to be at variance with his own views and policy, endeavoured, at the very commencement of its sessions, to procure its adjournment to Bologna, where he himself offered to preside. This proposal, though coming from his holiness through his legate, was rejected, and the council, after declaring the chief object of its meeting to be the consideration of the question of ecclesiastical reform, set out with formally sanctioning the great principle recognized by the council of Constance, that a general council is superior to the Pope. Eugenius continued to insist upon the dissolution of the council, but instead of listening to his remonstrances, the ecclesiastical body agreed, with scarcely a dissenting voice, to summon the Pope to appear within three months at Basle in person, or by a plenipotentiary, to take his proper part in the deliberations of the assembly. At the expiry of the prescribed time, it was moved in the council that the Pope should be declared contumacious; but it was decreed that a new term of sixty days should be allowed; to this was afterwards added thirty days, and even thirty more. The Pope now resolved to submit, and declared himself fully reconciled to the council, recognizing the validity of all its acts, and revoking all his proceedings against it. The submission of the Pope gave great satisfaction to the council, which, however, to secure itself against papal encroachment, formally repealed the decree of Constance, declaring the superiority of a general council to the Pope. Soon after, the proceedings of the council being directed against the claims and authority of the Pope, gave great offence to Eugenius, who resolved to come to open war with the council. He renewed his attempt to dissolve it, or at least to change its place of meeting; fixing upon Ferrara as the most eligible locality, and one which would suit the convenience of the emperor, who was willing to attend in order to promote a reunion of the Greek Church with the Latin. The council had already consented to accommodate the emperor by removing their sittings to Avignon; but the Pope, to carry out his own views, caused the Venetians to convey the emperor and his bishops to Italy, and opening his council at Ferrara on the 8th of January 1438, he declared the meeting at Basle schismatical, and all its acts invalid. Undeterred by the proceedings of the Pope, the council of Basle declared his holiness suspended from his office, and announced that the administration of all the power of the papacy, whether temporal or spiritual, had now reverted to itself. The council at Ferrara was pronounced schismatical, and at length, on the 25th of May 1439, Eugenius was formally deposed. It was not, however, until the 27th of November following that the council elected a new Pope in the person of the duke of Savoy, who took the title of Felix V.

Although the council of Basle had spent much of its time in personal altercations with the Pope, it had not lost sight of the important subject of ecclesiastical reform. In particular, it had defined the nature and extent of papal authority, declaring that infallibility and the plenitudo potestatis, or fulness of power, did not reside in the Pope, but in the whole church represented by a general council, the Pope being only the ministerial head of the church. The decrees of the council of Basle on this important subject were accepted by Charles VII., king of France, and by edict known as the Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges, they were constituted fundamental laws of France and of the GALLICAN CHURCH (which see).

The estates of Germany accepted also of the most important decrees of the council in the matter of ecclesiastical reform; but dreading the renewal of a schism of the papacy, they declined to support the council in its proceedings against Eugenius. A new emperor, Albert II., had been elected in 1438, and on the occasion of this election, the estates had agreed to use all their endeavours to accomplish a reconciliation between the Pope and the council. Eugenius gladly availed himself of the support thus rendered to him, and by skilful diplomatic arrangements, in which he was assisted by Æneas Sylvius, one of the ablest men of the age, he established his authority over the patrimony of St. Peter, and alienated from the antipope most of his former supporters. By the death of Eugenius, however, which occurred in 1447, the pontiff's chair became vacant, and was immediately filled up by the election of Nicholas V., who enjoying, like his predecessor, the support of the German nation, maintained the authority of the Pope against the council. One of the first acts of the new pontiff was to issue a bull absolving all who had taken part with the council of Basle, on condition of their abandoning it within six months, and returning to their obedience to the papal see. The emperor also withdrew his protection from the council, and ordered its members forthwith to disperse. A number of the bishops had already quitted Basle, and those who still remained when the commands of the emperor reached them, retired to Lausanne, where they still continued to sit as a council, until their Pope, Felix, resigned the pontificate in 1449, thus leaving Nicholas V. in exclusive possession of the papal authority and power.

The latter half of the fifteenth century forms a most eventful period in the history of the papacy. Europe was evidently ripening for some great change. A loud and earnest cry resounded through every country for ecclesiastical reform. A large and influential party had arisen irrespective altogether of the Lollards and Hussites, who were determined to use the most energetic and persevering efforts to reduce within reasonable bounds the exorbitant power of the popes. The papacy was equally resolved, on the other hand, to maintain with unflinching tenacity all its privileges, and the firm exercise of all its powers. Such was the policy on which Rome acted quietly and steadily during the reign of several successive pontiffs, until the abuses which led to the reforming decrees of Constance and Basle were more deeply rooted, and more firmly sanctioned, than they had ever been in any previous period of the history of the popes. All the states of Europe were now groaning under Romish despotism and oppression; nor did complaints, however well grounded, meet with any other treatment from the haughty pontiffs than ridicule and contempt. Lordly insolence, insatiable avarice, and disgusting profligacy characterized several of the popes of this time. Every act of power was in their case an act of extortion; every new oppression was connected with some financial speculation.

When Leo X. ascended the papal throne in 1513, he found the treasury exhausted by the expensive wars which had been carried on by his predecessors, and yet enormous demands made upon the exchequer, not only for the maintenance of an army, and the pay of numerous political agents, but also for carrying on extensive public works, especially the building of the cathedral of St. Peter's. To recruit his treasury, Leo had recourse to the sale of indulgences—an expedient which had been frequently adopted by his predecessors. But from the extent to which the minds of men came to be divided on the claims of the papacy, this mode of raising money, more especially when carried to excess, raised a for midable opposition, which led by a rapid series of events to the Reformation.

Leo taking more interest, perhaps, in the cultivation of art and science than in the progress of religion, was far from being prepared for this great revolt from the authority of Rome. He had achieved a glorious victory for the papacy in the removal of the Pragmatic Sanction which was yielded by Francis I. in 1516. Four years after this apparent triumph, he confidently entered the lists against Martin Luther, who had boldly published ninety-five theses, condemning the sale of indulgences as contrary to reason and Scripture. The haughty pontiff miscalculated the strength of this obscure Augustinian friar. Vainly imagining that he could crush him by the slightest exertion of papal power, Leo issued a bull condemning the theses of Luther as heretical and impious. The intrepid reformer at once declared open war against the papacy, by appealing to a general council, and burning the bull of excommunication in presence of a vast multitude at Wittenberg. Not contented with setting the reigning Pope at defiance, Luther collected from the Canon Law some of the most remarkable enactments bearing on the plenitude of the papal power, as well as the subordination of all secular jurisdiction to the authority of the holy see; he published these with a Commentary, showing the impiety of such tenets, and their evident tendency to subvert all civil governments. The result was, that in Germany Luther soon counted among his warm supporters princes as well as their subjects. In Switzerland also reformed principles, by the labours of Zwingli and Eccolampadius, made rapid progress. But in England the most severe blow was inflicted upon the authority of the papacy. Henry VIII., irritated by Pope Clement's opposition to his divorce, proclaimed himself head of the English Church, and abolished the authority of the Pope throughout his dominions. Several kingdoms of Europe threw off their allegiance to the Pope, and abolished his jurisdiction within their territories. "The defection," says Dr. Robertson, in his History of Charles V. "of so many opulent and powerful kingdoms from the papal see, was a fatal blow to its grandeur and power. It abridged the dominions of the popes in extent, it diminished their revenues, and left them fewer rewards to bestow on the ecclesiastics of various denominations, attached to them by vows of obedience as well as by ties of interest, and whom they employed as instruments to establish or support their usurpations in every part of Europe. The countries, too, which now disclaimed their authority, were those which formerly had been most devoted to it. The empire of superstition differs from every other species of dominion; its power is often greatest, and most implicitly obeyed in the provinces most remote from the seat of government; while such as are situated nearer to that, are more apt to discern the artifices by which it is upheld, or the impostures on which it is founded. The personal frailties or vices of the popes, the errors as well as corruption of their administration, the ambition, venality, and deceit which reigned in their courts, fell immediately under the observation of the Italians, and could not fail of diminishing that respect which begets submission. But in Germany, England, and the more remote parts of Europe, these were either altogether unknown, or being only known by report, made a slighter impression. Veneration for the papal dignity increased accordingly in these countries in proportion to their distance from Rome; and that veneration, added to their gross ignorance, rendered them equally credulous and passive. In tracing the progress of the papal domination, the boldest and most successful instances of encroachment are to be found in Germany and other countries distant from Italy. In these its impositions were heaviest, and its exactions the most rapacious; so that in estimating the diminution of power which the court of Rome suffered in consequence of the Reformation, not only the number but the character of the people who revolted, not only the great extent of territory, but the extraordinary obsequiousness of the subjects which it lost, must be taken in the account.

Thus did the Church of Rome suffer a severe shock at the Reformation, not only in her spiritual, but also in her civil power and influence. In the midst of this eventful crisis in her history, however, arose the order of the JESUITS (which see), a society of zealous and energetic Romanists, who devoted themselves with indefatigable diligence to revive the decayed influence of the church, and to win back Protestant heretics into the true fold. But however much the church was indebted to the Jesuits for her defence in the time of need, the occurrence of the Reformation rendered the cry for internal reform imperative and irresistible. The council of Trent, accordingly, was convened by Paul III. with the avowed design of exterminating heretics, and securing definitively the internal unity of the church. The canons of the council were accepted unconditionally by some of the Romish countries, while certain reservations were made by others, and in the case of France, only those of them were adopted which referred to doctrines.

No event, indeed, has ever occurred in the history of the papacy which has more effectually weakened the temporal power of the popes than the great Reformation of the sixteenth century. After that revolution in ecclesiastical affairs, the popes were not long in feeling that their cause could ill dispense with the favour of kings, and to secure this they contrived to bestow large subsidies upon them, thus rendering it a source of wealth to sustain the papacy. In most of the principal cities, also, the popes sought to preserve their influence by establishing nuncios invested with high plenipotentiary powers. The Gallican Church alone kept aloof from these agencies,

The papacy now began to feel that all hope of subjecting the world to its control must be surrendered; it gradually dwindled down to a small Italian principality. And yet, unwilling to part with the vast claims which it had so long been accustomed to put forth, it continued to urge its proud but ineffectual demands upon the Roman Catholic states of Europe. In France, more especially, the extravagant pretensions of the popes were almost disregarded, and during the long and brilliant reign of Louis XIV. the Gallican Church boldly continued to assert its independence of the sec of Rome. Long did the Jesuits struggle, not only to overthrow the Jansenists in France, but to bring the whole Gallican Church into implicit submission to the Pope. In the first object they succeeded to a great extent at least, but in the second they utterly failed. The French Revolution inflicted a heavy blow upon the power of the papacy, not in France alone, but throughout all Europe, and though the return of the Bourbons to the throne, and the restoration of quiet to the country, gave an apparent revival to the influence of the popes, that influence, in political matters, has been directly limited to the small Italian government over which they rule; and even there, so unpopular is papal sovereignty, that only a few years have passed away since the reigning Pope, Pius IX., was compelled to flee in disguise from Rome, and to seek a temporary asylum in the neighbouring kingdom of Naples. Under the joint protection of France and Austria he was restored to his throne, where he is enabled to maintain his seat solely by their united support. The day, however, is evidently not far distant when the Pope shall be wholly divested of his temporal authority, and the papacy shall cease to exist as a political power in Europe.

PAPÆUS, a Scythian surname of Zeus.

PAPAS, a name given to the secular clergy in the GREEK CHURCH (which see).

PAPELLARDS, a term applied to a class of Pietists in the thirteenth century. Neander considers it as denoting etymologically persons wholly devoted to the popes, the parsons, the clergy. They were most directly opposed to the men of the world. To this body Louis IX., king of France, was considered to belong, and their ascetic habits were keenly opposed in the writings of William St. Amour.

PAPHIA, a surname of Aphrodite derived from a temple in honour of this goddess at Paphos in Cyprus.

PAPISTS, a name frequently applied by Protestants to Roman Catholics, in consequence of their acknowledgment of the Pope as the head of their church. The tenth article of the creed of Pope Pius IV. runs in these terms: "I promise true obedience to the bishop of Rome, successor to St. Peter, prince of the apostles, and vicar of Jesus Christ." And the Douay Catechism teaches, that "He who is not in due connection and subordination to the Pope and general councils, must needs be dead, and cannot be accounted a member of the church." The term papists, however, is more strictly applicable to those members of the Church of Rome who admit the infallibility of the Pope, and the fulness of power as being vested in him alone independently altogether of general councils. This view is held by a large portion of the Romish Church, but is strenuously resisted by all who hold Gallican and Jansenist principles, including a considerable body of Romanists both in England and France. See ROME (CHURCH OF).

PAPPATI, the New-Year's day festival among the PARSEES (which see). This day is celebrated in honour of Yezdegird, the last king of the Sassanide dynasty of Persian monarchs, who was dethroned by Caliph Omar about A. D. 640. The ancient Persians reckoned a new era from the accession of each successive monarch, and as Yezdegird had no successor, the date of his accession to the throne has been brought down to the present time, making the current year (1859) the year 1219 of the Parsee chronology. On the Pappati the Parsees rise early, and either say their prayers at home or repair to the fire-temples, where a large congregation is assembled. After prayers they visit their friends and relations, when the Hamma-i-jour, or joining of hands, is performed. The rest of the day is spent in feasting and rejoicing till a late hour at night. It is customary on this day to give alms to the poor, and new suits of clothes to the servants.

PAPREMIS, the god of war among the ancient Egyptians, who was worshipped under the figure of the hippopotamus. At Heliopolis, and at Buto, sacrifices are said to have been offered to this deity, and at Papremis, which was called after him, there was a festival celebrated every year in honour of him.

PARABAPTISMATA, baptisms in private houses or conventicles, which are frequently condemned in the canons of ancient councils under this name.

PARABOLANI, a name applied among the ancient Romans to those who hired themselves out to fight with wild beasts in the public amphitheatres. Hence the word came to be sometimes used in reference to the early Christians, who, in the days of persecution, were in some cases compelled to enter the arena and fight with wild beasts as a public spectacle for the amusement of the heathen. To this custom the Apostle Paul alludes in 1 Cor. xv. 32, when he says, "If after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus."

PARABOLANI, an order of officers in the ancient Christian Church, whose office it was to attend upon the sick, and to take care of their bodies in time of their weakness. At Alexandria they were incorporated into a society to the number of 500 or 600, to be chosen at the discretion of the bishop of the place under whose government and direction they were, according to a law laid down by the Emperor Theodosius the younger, A. D. 415. We find no mention of the office before the fifth century, and yet it is then referred to as a standing and settled office in the church. Nor was it limited to the church of Alexandria, but is mentioned also as existing in the church of Ephesus in A. D. 449. The Parabolini derived their name from the circumstance that they exposed their lives to dangers in attendance upon the sick in all infectious and pestilential distempers. It would appear that the civil government of Rome looked upon them as a formidable body of men, and, therefore, laid down laws strictly limiting them to their proper duties.

PARABRAHMA, a term often used to denote BRAHM (which see), the supreme divinity of the Hindus.

PARACLETE, a word used in John xiv. 16 and 26; xv. 26; and xvi. 7, where it is applied to the Holy Spirit. Considerable difference of opinion exists among the learned as to the proper signification of the original word; some supposing that the term Paraclete is employed to denote the Spirit's office as Comforter, while others believe that the name strictly signifies an advocate. The great Persian heresiarch Mani or Manes, from whom the Manicheans derived their name, claimed to be the promised Paraclete or Comforter. The same pretensions were put forth by Mohammed, and the Islamite doctors assert that the Christians are chargeable with a wilful perversion of the texts in the Gospel according to John, inasmuch as they have substituted Paracletos, a Comforter, for the word Periclitatos, Most Famous, which has the same signification as the name Mohammed. Such a charge is absurd in the extreme.

PARADISE, a word used in the New Testament to denote the state of the souls of believers between death and the resurrection. The Apostle Paul describes himself in 2 Cor. xii. 2, 4, as having enjoyed a foretaste of the blessedness of this state. The Jewish Rabbis teach that Paradise is twofold; one in heaven and another here below upon earth. They are said to be separated by an upright pillar, called the strength of the hill of Zion. By this pillar on every Sabbath and festival the righteous climb up and feed themselves with a glance of the Divine Majesty, and at the end of the Sabbath or festival they slide down and return to the lower Paradise. Access to the upper Paradise is represented as not enjoyed by the righteous immediately after death, but they must first pass a kind of novitiate in the lower Paradise. Even when admitted into the upper Paradise, the righteous are alleged to be in the habit of revisiting this lower world. Both in the upper and the lower Paradise there are said to be seven apartments or dwellings for the righteous. A certain Rabbi affirms that he sought all over Paradise, and he found therein seven houses or dwellings; and each house was twelve times ten thousand miles long, and as many miles in width.

The Paradise of the Mohammedans is wholly sensual in its character, consisting, to adopt the language of Mr. Macbride, in his 'Mohammedan Religion Explained,' "of gardens through which rivers flow abounding with palm-trees and pomegranates, where the believers will taste of whatever fruit they desire, which they may gather from the branches which will bend towards them while reclining not only under the shade, but on silk couches, themselves clothed in green silk and brocades, and adorned with bracelets of gold and pearl. They are to drink of the liquor forbidden in this life, but this wine will never intoxicate or make the head ache; it will be sealed not with clay, but with musk, and diluted with water from the spring Tasnim, and this shall be served to them in cups of silver by beautiful youths. But their highest enjoyment will be derived from the company of damsels created for the purpose out of pure musk, called Houris, from the brightness of their eyes. Such will be the perpetual sensual enjoyments of all who are admitted into Paradise; but for those who have attained the highest degree of excellence it is said, in language borrowed from the genuine Scriptures, that for them are prepared, in addition, such joys as eye has not seen nor ear heard, nor has entered into the heart of man to conceive. This addition is said to be the beatific vision, and many of the more respectable Moslems endeavour to explain away and spiritualize the sensual delights, of their prophet's Paradise; Algazali considers the attempt heretical, and Mohammed himself seems to have intended his words to have been taken literally. It is still the common faith of his people; and we read, in an early native history of the conquest of Syria, of a voluntary martyr, who, longing after these joys, charged the Christian troops, and made havoc till struck through with a javelin, he exclaimed, 'Methinks I see looking upon me the houris, the sight of one of whom, would cause all men to die of love; and one with an handkerchief of green silk and a cup made of precious stones, beckons me, and calls me, "Come hither quickly, for I love thee."' Such was the spirit that led the first Moslems to victory, and it is still the popular belief." It is a dispute among the Mohammedans whether Paradise be now in existence, or is as yet uncreated. The more orthodox, however, adhere to the former opinion. See HADES, HEAVEN.

PARAFRENARI, the coachmen of the higher clergy in the ancient Christian Church. They had also the care of their stables and horses. They were sometimes reckoned among the number of the clergy, but of an inferior order.

PARAMAHANSAS, a species of Sanyasi or Hindu ascetics, and, indeed, the most eminent of the four gradations, being solely occupied with the investigation of Brahm, and equally indifferent to pleasure, insensible to heat or cold, and incapable of satiety or want. In accordance with this definition, individuals are sometimes found who pretend to have reached this degree of perfection, and in token of it they go naked, never speak, and never indicate any natural want. They are fed by attendants, as if unable to feed themselves. They are usually classed among the Saiva ascetics, but Professor H. H. Wilson doubts the accuracy of the classification.

PARAMANDYAS, a portion of the dress of Caloyers or Greek monks. It consists of a piece of black cloth sewed to the lining of their caps, and hanging down upon their shoulders.

PARAMATS, a Buddhist sect which arose in the beginning of the present century at Ava. They respect only the Abhidharma, and reject the other sacred books. Kosm, the founder of the sect, with about fifty of his followers, were put to death by order of the king.

PARAMONARIOS, an inferior officer belonging to the ancient Christian Church, referred to in the canons of the council of Chalcedon. Translators and critics differ as to the meaning of the word. Some of the more ancient writers consider it as equivalent to the MANSIONARIUS or OSTIARIUS (which see). More modern critics, again, explain it by villicus, or steward of the lands.

PARANYMPH, a term used in ancient Greece to denote one of the friends or relations of a bridegroom who attended the bridegroom on the occasion of his marriage. Among the Jews there were two Peranymphe, one a relative of the bridegroom, and the other of the bride. The first was called his companion, and the other her conductor. Their business was to attend upon the parties at the marriage ceremony.

PARASCEUE, the day before our Saviour's passion. It is called by the council of Laodicea the fifth day of the great and solemn week, when such as were to be baptized, having learnt their creed, were to repeat it before the bishop or presbyters in the church. This was the only day for several ages that ever the creed was publicly repeated in the Greek churches. It is called also Holy Thursday, or MAUNDY THURSDAY (which see), and is observed with great pomp in the Romish Church.

PARASCHOTIL. It was the custom among the Jews to have the whole Law or Five Books of Moses read over in the synagogues in the course of every year. Hence for the sake of convenience the Law was divided into fifty-four sections or Paraschiot, as nearly equal in length as possible. These were appointed to be read in succession, one every week till the whole was gone over. They were made fifty-four in number, because the longest years consisted of that number of weeks, and it was thought desirable that no Sabbath, in such a case, should be left without its particular portion; but as common years were shorter, certain shorter sections were joined together so as to make one out of two in order to bring the reading regularly to a close at the end of the year. The course of reading the Paras-

chiot in the synagogues commenced on the first Sabbath after the Feast of Tabernacles; or rather on the Sabbath before that, for on the same day that they finished the last course of reading, they began the new course, in order, as the Rabbis allege, that the devil might have no ground for accusing them to God of being weary of reading the law.

PARASITI, assistants to certain priests among the ancient Greeks. The gods, to whose service parasites were attached, were Apollo, Heracles, the Anaces, and Athena of Pallene. They were generally elected from the most ancient and illustrious families, but what were the precise duties assigned to them it is difficult to discover. They were twelve in number, and received as the remuneration for their services a third part of the sacrifices offered to their respective gods. Parasites were also appointed as assistants to the highest magistrates in Greece. Thus there were both civil and priestly parasites. The term is now generally used to denote flatterers or sycophants of any kind.

PARATORIUM, a name sometimes given to the OBLATIONARIUM (which see), of the Ordo Romanus, because when the offerings were received, preparation was made out of them for the eucharist.

PARCÆ. See FATES.

PARCLOSES, screens separating chapels, especially those at the east end of the aisles, from the body of the church.

PARËIA, a surname of Athena, under which she was worshipped in Laconia.

PARENTALIA. See INFERËE.

PARISH, the district assigned by law to the care of one minister. The word parish was in use as early as the third century, but it was at that time equivalent to the term DIOCESE (which see). In primitive times the diocese of a bishop was neither more nor less than what is now called a parish; and even when the jurisdiction of bishops had become extensive, the diocese long continued to be called the parish. Afterwards the word was limited to the district attached to a single church over which a presbyter presided, who was hence called parochus. It was not until the sixth century, however, that the term parish was employed in this sense. "The fourth century," as we learn from Mr. Riddle, "witnessed the establishment of parish churches in large towns generally; a custom which had already prevailed in capitals, such as Rome and Alexandria; the chief church of the city being now called 'cathedrals,' because the bishop's seat (cathedra) was there—and the others 'ecclesie plebanae.' During this formation of the parochial system, the diocesan bishops took care that the several parish presbyters should not be bishops in their own churches, and measures were adopted to retain these churches in a state of dependence on the mother or cathedral church. The diocesans, however, were often obliged to allow the parish churches a greater degree of independence than they were of their own accord willing to concede to them. At first, the bishop appointed one of the cathedral clergy to officiate in a parish church; afterwards, presbyters were ordained especially for certain churches, their ordination and appointment being still vested in the bishop. When it became necessary to appoint several clergy to one parish, still the appointment was retained in the hands of the bishop; in some places only permission being granted to the parishes to choose their own readers and choristers. The bishops also retained the right of recalling or removing a parish priest, and transferring him back to the body of cathedral clergy. Still more effectually were the parochial clergy kept in a state of dependence upon the bishops, by regulations concerning the sphere of their duties. At their first origin, and throughout the fourth century, they were permitted only to preach, to instruct catechumens, and to administer the offices of religion to the sick and dying, but not to administer the sacraments, nor to excommunicate offenders or to absolve penitents, without special permission from the bishop. In the fifth century it had become impossible for all communicants to repair to the mother or cathedral church, and permission was granted to administer the Lord's Supper in parish churches,—the elements, however, having been previously consecrated in the cathedral, and sent thence for use to the several churches. Afterwards, the privileges of parish churches and of the parochial clergy were still further extended; full permission for the complete celebration of both sacraments was given,—the parochial clergy were authorised to pronounce the sacerdotal benediction, or to conduct the religious solemnity at marriages,—and it was even enacted that every parishioner should receive these offices at the hands of no other than his own minister. At the same time the parochial minister was qualified as penitentiarius within his own limits, certain cases only being reserved for the cognizance of the bishop. And thus the only spiritual act with respect to the laity now entirely reserved to the bishop was that of confirmation. These changes we may regard in general as having taken place during the sixth century; and in this way the rights and powers of the parochial clergy were so far enlarged, that they had become, to a considerable extent, the representatives of the bishops in their own parishes. Hence it was natural that they should seek also to become proportionally independent of the bishops with regard to their incomes; and this most important change in the diocesan constitution was also by degrees effected. For some time after the first introduction of the parochial system, the revenues of a diocese continued to be regarded as a whole, the distribution of which was subject to the bishop; that is to say, whatever oblations or the like were made in parish churches were paid into the treasury of the cathedral church, as the one heart of the body, and thence distributed among the clergy after the claims of the bishop had been satisfied. This arrangement remained generally in force until the end of the fifth century, many parish churches having in the meantime greatly increased in wealth by means of bequests and donations, and having come into the receipt of considerable oblations. At this time the payment of fees for the performance of religious offices, which was at first purely voluntary, was exacted as a legal right or due, and regular tables of such fees were set up; a practice against which the protests of councils appear to have been without effect. But in the course of the sixth century the revenues of the parochial clergy came to be considered simply as their own, the bishops being obliged to relax their hold of them."

In England there are somewhere about 10,000 parishes. The country, according to Camden, was divided into parishes by Archbishop Honorius, about A. D. 630. Others, again, allege the division to have taken place as late as the twelfth century. Each of the parishes in England is under the spiritual superintendence of a rector, vicar, or perpetual curate, and the more populous parishes are subdivided into districts, each ecclesiastical district being under the charge of an incumbent or curate.

In Scotland there are 963 parishes, each of which is bound by law to have a parish church proportioned in size to the number of inhabitants, and capable of accommodating two-thirds of the examinable population, that is of those who are above twelve years of age. The duty of building and repairing a parish church devolves upon the heritors or proprietors, each being assessed for the purpose, if in a purely landward parish, according to the valued rent of his estate, or if in a parish partly rural, partly burghal, according to the real or actual rent of the properties. Should the heritors fail in fulfilling their legal obligation, whether in repairing an old, or building a new parish church, it is the duty of the presbytery, on the report of competent tradesmen, to ordain the necessary repairs, or an entirely new building; and this decree of the presbytery sitting in a civil capacity, and issued in due form, has the force of law. By the law of Scotland, parish ministers are supported by a stipend or salary raised from a tax on land. It is raised on the principle of commuting tithes or teinds into a modified charge—the fifth of the produce of the land, according to a method introduced in the reign of Charles I., ratified by William III., and unalterably established by the treaty of Union. In addition to his stipend, the parish minister is provided with a manse or parsonage-house, a garden and offices. He has also a glebe consisting of four acres of arable land, which is its statutory extent, but in many cases the glebe is larger, and in addition there is frequently a grass glebe sufficient for the support of a horse and two cows. In royal burghs the parish ministers are provided with manses, but not in other cities and towns.

PARMENIANISTS, a party of the sect of the DONATISTS (which see) in the fourth century, who derived their name from Parmenian, a bishop of Carthage.

PARNASSIDES, a name given to the MUSES (which see) from Mount Parnassus.

PARNETHIUS, a surname of Zeus derived from Mount Parnes in Attica.

PARNOPUS, a surname of Apollo, under which he was worshipped at Athens. The word indicates an expeller of locusts.

PARSEES (RELIGION OF THE). This interesting race, which is found scattered over the western portion of Hindustan, but more especially in Bombay, is the remnant of the ancient Persians. Their name is derived from their original country, Pars, which the Greeks term Persis, and hence comes Persia. In the middle of the seventh century the Arabs invaded Persia under Caliph Omar, and that once glorious empire passed into the hands of the bigoted and intolerant Mohammedans. The consequence was, that throughout the whole country the religion of Zoroaster, which was the ancient Persian faith, was exchanged for the faith of Islam, and the fire-temples were either destroyed or converted into mosques. Those who still cleaved to the religion of their forefathers fled to the mountainous districts of Khorassan, where, for about a hundred years, they lived in the free and undisturbed exercise of their religion. At length, however, the sword of the persecutor overtook them even in these remote districts, and again they were compelled to seek safety in flight, a considerable number emigrating to the small island of Ormus, at the mouth of the Persian Gulf. Here, however, they remained only a short time, when finding that they were still within the reach of their Moslem persecutors, they sought an asylum in Hindustan, partly concealing the true nature of their religion, and partly conforming to Hindu practices and ceremonies. At length, after a long series of hardships, which they endured with the most exemplary patience, they resolved to make an open profession of their ancient faith, and, accordingly, they built a fire-temple in Sanjan, the Hindu rajah of the district kindly aiding them in the work. The temple was completed in A. D. 721, and the sacred fire was kindled on the altar.

For three hundred years from the time of their landing in Sanjan, the Parsees lived in comfort and tranquillity; and at the end of that period their numbers were much increased by the emigration of a large body of their countrymen from Persia, who, with their families, located themselves in different parts of Western India, where they chiefly engaged in agricultural pursuits. Being a peaceable and industrious people, the Parsees lived in harmony with the Hindus, though of different and even opposite faiths. Nothing of importance, indeed, occurred in their history until the beginning of the sixteenth century, when they were called upon to aid the rajah under whom they lived in resisting the aggressions of a Mohammedan chief residing at Ahmeda-bad. On that occasion they distinguished themselves by their valour and intrepidity, contributing largely to the success which at first crowned the arms of the Hindus. Ultimately, however, the Moslems were victorious, and the Hindu government was overthrown. The Parsees, carrying with them the sacred fire from Sanjan, now removed to the mountains of Baharout, where they remained for twelve years, at the end of which they directed their course first to Bansda, and afterwards to Nowsaree, where they speedily rose to wealth and influence. Here, however, a quarrel arose among the priests, and the sacred fire was secretly conveyed to Oodwara, a place situated thirty-two miles south of Surat, where it still exists, and being the oldest fire-temple in India, it is held in the highest veneration by the Parsees. Nowsaree is the city of the priests, numbers of whom are every year sent to Bombay to act as spiritual instructors of their Zoroastrian fellow-worshippers.

It is difficult to ascertain the precise time at which the Parsees arrived in Bombay, but in all probability it was in the latter half of the seventeenth century, somewhere about the time that the island passed into the hands of the British, having been given by the king of Portugal as a dowry to his daughter Catharine when she became the wife of Charles II. Ever since, this remarkable remnant of antiquity has maintained its footing in Hindustan, chiefly in Bombay and in some of the cities of Gujerat, and a few are also to be found in Calcutta, and other large cities in India, in China, and other parts of Asia. The census of 1851 rated the Parsees in Bombay at 110,544, but their number is rapidly increasing. In Surat the Parsee population was at one time more numerous than that in Bombay, but the latter city being now the chief seat of trade in Western India, and the Parsees being generally active and enterprising, have flocked thither in great numbers, leaving not more than 20,000 of their countrymen in Surat. The whole Parsee population, including 6,000 GUEBRES (which see) in Persia, is considered to amount to 150,000.

There are two sects of Parsees in India, the Shen-soys and the Kudmis, both of whom follow in all points the religion of Zoroaster, and differ only as to the precise date for the computation of the era of Yezdegird, the last king of the ancient Persian monarchy. The only practical disadvantage which arises from this chronological dispute is, that there is a month's difference between them in the time at which they observe their festivals. The Kudmis are few in number, but several of the most wealthy and influential of the Parsees belong to this sect. About thirty years ago a keen discussion, known among the Parsees by the name of the Kubeesa controversy, was carried on in Bombay, and though argued with the greatest earnestness and acrimony on both sides, the contested point in regard to the era of Yezdegird has not yet been satisfactorily settled. The difference was first observed about 200 years ago, when a learned Zoroastrian, named Jamasp, came from Persia to Surat; and while engaged in instructing the Mobeds or Parsee priests, he discovered that there was a difference of one full month in the calculation of time between the Zoroastrians of India and those of Persia. It was not, however, till 1746 that any great importance was attached to this chronological difference. In that year, however, the Kudmi sect was formed, its distinguishing tenet being an adherence to the chronological view imported by Jamasp from Persia, while the great mass of the Parsees in India still retained their former mode of calculation. At first sight this might appear a matter of too small importance to give rise to a theological dispute, but it must be borne in mind, that when a Parsee prays, he must repeat the year, month, and day on which he offers his petition, and this circumstance leads to an observable difference between the prayer of a Kudmi and that of a Shensoy, and the same difference of course exists in the celebration of the festivals which are common to both sects.

The Parsees are distinguished from the Hindus among whom they reside by several customs peculiar to themselves. When a child is about to be born, the mother is conveyed to the ground floor of the house, where she must remain for forty days, at the end of which she undergoes purification before again mingling with the family. Five days after the child is born an astrologer is called in to cast its nativity; and all the relatives assemble to learn what is to be the future fortune of the babe, and what influence it is to exert upon its parents and family. Till the child is six years old its dress consists of a single garment called the Jubbla, a kind of loose shirt, which extends from the neck to the ankles, and the head is covered with a skull-cap. When it has reached the age of six years and three months, the investiture of the child with the sudra and kusti takes place, by which it is solemnly initiated into the religion of Zoroaster. The ceremony commences with certain purifications, and the child being seated before the high-priest, after a benediction has been pronounced, the emblematic garments are put on. The sudra is made of linen, and the kusti is a thin woollen cord, consisting of seventy-two threads, representing the seventy-two chapters of the Izashné, a sacred book of the Parsees. This cord is passed round the waist three times, and tied with four knots, while a kind of hymn is sung. At the first knot the person says, "There is only one God, and no other is to be compared with him;" at the second, "The religion given by Zartosht is true;" at the third, "Zartosht is the true Prophet, and he derived his mission from God;" and the fourth and last, "Perform good actions, and abstain from evil ones."

The following interesting account of a marriage ceremony among the Parsees is given by Dosabhoj Framjee, in a work just published, entitled, 'The Parsees: Their History, Manners, Customs, and Religion: "About sunset the whole of the bridegroom's party, both males and females, repair in procession to the house of the bride. The procession is headed by a European or native band of music, according to the means of the parties; the bridegroom, accompanied by the dustoots, then follow, after whom walk the male portion of the assembly, the female company bringing up the rear of the procession. When the whole of this party is accommodated at the bride's quarters, the nuptial ceremony is commenced soon after sunset. It generally takes place in a hall or spacious room on the ground-floor of the house, where a galicha or carpet is spread. The bride and bridegroom are seated close to each other on ornamented chairs, and facing them stand the dustoots or priests, who repeat the nuptial benediction first in the Zend and then in the Sanscrit, of which the following is a short abstract,—'Know ye, that both of you have liked each other, and are therefore thus united. Look not with impious eye on other people, but always make it your study to love, honour, and cherish each other as long as both of you remain in this world. May quarrels never arise between you, and may your fondness for each other increase day by day. May you both learn to adhere to truth, and be always pure in your thoughts as well as actions, and always try to please the Almighty, who is a lover of truth and righteousness. Shun evil company, abstain from avarice, envy, and pride, for that is the road to destruction. Think not of other men's property, but try industriously, and without any dishonest means, to improve your own. Cultivate friendship between yourselves, and with your neighbours, and among those who are known to be good people. Hold out a helping hand to the needy and poor. Always respect your parents, as that is one of the first duties enjoined upon you. May success crown all your efforts. May you be blessed with children and grandchildren. May you always try to exalt the glory of the religion of Zoroaster, and may the blessings of the Almighty descend upon you.'

"The concluding ceremony of washing the toes of the bridegroom's feet with milk, and rubbing his face with his bride's chloee, as well as other trivialities, need not be mentioned here, as they are not enjoined by the Parsee religion, but are mere 'grafts of Hindooism.' When the above ceremonies are nearly concluded, bouquets of roses, or other beautiful and fragrant flowers, and little triangular packets of pan sopree, a kind of leaf and betel-nut, profusely gilded, are distributed to each member of the company. Rose-water from a golden or silver goolabdanee, is also showered upon the persons of the guests. The signal is then given for the bridegroom and his party to retire to their quarters."

The first work of the Parsees, wherever they settle, is to construct a tomb, which they call Dokhma, or tower of silence, for the reception of their dead. It is erected in a solitary place, and generally on a mountain. The body placed on an iron bier is there exposed to the fowls of the air, and when they have stripped off the flesh, the bones fall through an iron grating into a pit beneath, from which they are afterwards removed into a subterranean passage constructed on purpose.

The faith of the Parsees is that of Zoroaster, as contained in the sacred books called the ABESTA (which see), which originally extended to no fewer than twenty-one volumes, the greater number of which, however, are lost, having been destroyed, as is supposed, either during the invasion of Persia by Alexander the Great, or immediately after the conquest of that country by the Mohammedans. Those which are still in the possession of the Parsees are the Vandidad, Yagna, or Izashné, and Vispard. These three together are called Vandidad Sade, an edition of which was published by Professor Westergaard of Copenhagen, in the Zend character, in the year 1854. The entire structure of the Zend Abesta rests on three important precepts expressed by three significant terms, Homité, Hookhté, and Tarusté, meaning purity of speech, purity of action, and purity of thought. The Parsees are generally charged with idolatry, worshipping not merely the good and evil deities, under the name of Ormuzd and Ahriman, but almost every object that is named in heaven or on earth. Thus Dr. Wilson, who has many years laboured as a missionary in Bombay, remarks, in speaking of the Parsee: "He at one moment calls upon Ormuzd, at the next upon his own ghost; at one moment on an archangel, at the next on a sturdy bull; at one time on the brilliant sun, the next on a blazing fire; at one moment on a lofty and stupendous mountain, the next on a darksome cave; at one moment on the ocean, at the next on a well or spring." In reply to all such charges, Dosabhoj Framjee, in the work from which we have already quoted, remarks, "The charge of fire, sun, water, and air worship has, however, been brought against the Parsees by those not sufficiently acquainted with the Zoroastrian faith to form a just opinion. The Parsees themselves repel the charge with indignation. Ask a Parsee whether he is a worshipper of the sun or fire, and he will emphatically answer—No! This declaration itself, coming from one whose own religion is Zoroastrianism, ought to be sufficient to satisfy the most sceptical. God, according to Parsee faith, is the emblem of glory, refulgence, and light, and in this view, a Parsee, while engaged in prayer, is directed to stand before the fire, or to direct his face towards the sun as the most proper symbols of the Almighty.

"All Eastern historians have acknowledged that the Persians from the most early time were no idolaters, but worshipped one God the Creator of the world, under the symbol of fire, and such is also the present practice among their descendants in India.

"In Bombay at present there are three fire-temples for public worship. The first of these was erected in the 1153 year of Yezdegird, 1780 of the Christian era, by a wealthy Parsee named Dadyssett. The second was built about the year 1830, at the expense of the late Hormusjee Bomonjee, Esq.; and the third one was erected by the late Framjee Cowasjee, Esq., in the year 1844, at the cost of £25,000." Speaking of fire-worship, Dean Prideaux says, that "they," that is, the ancient Persians, "abominating all images, worshipped God only by fire;" and Sir William Ouseley to the same effect affirms. "I shall here express my firm belief that the first Persian altars blazed in honour of God alone; as likewise, that the present disciples of Zartosht, both in India and the mother country, Iran or Persia, have no other object when they render to fire a semblance of veneration."

Forbes, in his 'Oriental Memoirs,' thus states the view which he is disposed to take of the sacred fires of the Parsees: "These fires," says he, "are attended day and night by the Andiaroos or priests, and are never permitted to expire. They are preserved in a large chafing-dish, carefully supplied with fuel, perfumed by a small quantity of sandal-wood or other aromatics. The vulgar and illiterate worship this sacred flame, as also the sun, moon, and stars, without regard to the invisible Creator; but the learned and judicious adore only the Almighty Fountain of Light, the author and disposer of all things, under the symbol of fire. Zoroaster and the ancient magi, whose memories they revere, and whose works they are said to preserve, never taught them to consider the sun as anything more than a creature of the great Creator of the universe: they were to revere it as His best and fairest image, and for the numberless blessings it diffuses on the earth. The sacred flame was intended only as a perpetual monitor to preserve their purity, of which this element is so expressive a symbol. But superstition and fable have, through a lapse of ages, corrupted the stream of the religious system which in its source was pure and sublime." Niebuhr, also, holds a similar opinion in reference to this interesting people: "The Parsees, followers of Zerdast, or Zoroaster, adore one God only, Eternal and Almighty. They pay, however, a certain worship to the sun, the moon, the stars, and to fire, as visible images of the invisible Divinity. Their veneration for the element of fire induces them to keep a sacred fire constantly burning, which they feed with odoriferous wood, both in the temples and in the houses of private persons who are in easy circumstances."

The Parsees, having so long mingled with the Hindus, naturally adopted many of their customs and practices which for centuries they have continued to observe, and though the punchayet, or legal council of the Parsees, about twenty-five years ago endeavoured to discourage and even to root out all such ceremonies and practices as had crept into their religion since they first settled in Hindustan, their attempts were wholly unsuccessful. So recently, however, as 1852 steps have been taken for the accomplishment of the same desirable object, which are more likely to bring about the restoration of the Zoroastrian religion to its pristine purity. In that year an association was formed at Bombay, called the "Rahnumai Mazdiasna," or Religious Reform Association, composed of many wealthy and influential Parsees, along with a number of intelligent and well educated young men. The labours of this society have been productive of considerable improvement in the social condition of the Parsees. The state of the priesthood calls for some change in that body. Many of them are so ignorant that they do not understand their liturgical works, though they regularly recite the required portions from memory. The office of the priesthood is hereditary, the son of a priest being also a priest, unless he chooses to follow some other profession; but a layman cannot be a priest. That the priests may be incited to study the sacred books, an institution has been established called the "Mulla Firoz Mudrissa," in which they are taught the Zend, Pehlvi, and Persian languages. On the whole, the Parsee community in India appears to be rapidly imbibing European customs and opinions, and rising steadily in influence and importance.

PARSON, a term which properly denotes the rector of a parish church, as representing the church, and regarded as sustaining the person thereof in an action at law. The word, however, is generally used in ordinary language to denote any minister of the Church of England.

PARSONAGE, the residence of a parson.

PARTHENIA, a surname of Artemis and also of Ira.

PARTHENOS (Gr. a virgin), a surname of Athena at Athens, where the Parthenon was dedicated to her.

PARTICULAR BAPTISTS. See BAPTISTS.

PARTICULAR REDEMPTION. See REDEMPTION.

PARTICULARISTS, a name sometimes applied to CALVINISTS (which see), because they hold the doctrine of particular redemption, and a limited atonement.

PARVATI, one of the names given in Hindu mythology to the consort of Shiva. She was worshipped as the universal mother, and the principle of fertility. She is also considered as the goddess of the moon. In consequence of her remarkable victory over the giant Durgá, she was honoured as a heroine with the name of DURGA (which see), and in this form her annual festival is most extensively celebrated in Eastern India. By the worshippers of Shiva, the personified energy of the divine nature is termed Párvati, Bhaváni, or Durgá, and the Tantras assume the form of a dialogue between Shiva and his bride in one of her many forms, but mostly as Uma and Párvati, in which the goddess questions the god as to the mode of performing various ceremonies, and the prayers and incantations to be used in them. These the god explains at length, and under solemn cautions that they involve a great mystery, on no account to be divulged to the profane.

PARVISE, the name applied in England to the small room which is generally situated over the porch of a church, and which is used either as the residence of a chantry priest, or as a record room or school.

PASAGIL, or PASAGINI, a sect which arose in Lombardy towards the close of the twelfth century, springing out of a mixture of Judaism and Christianity, occasioned, perhaps, by the conquest of Jerusalem. This sect held the absolute obligation of the Old Testament upon Christians in opposition to the Manicheans, who maintained only the authority of the New Testament. Hence they literally practised the rites of the Jewish law, with the exception of sacrifices, which ceased to be offered at the destruction of the temple of Jerusalem. They revived also the Ebionite and Arian doctrines on the subject of the Person of Christ, maintaining that he was not equal, but subordinate to the Father, and, indeed, merely the highest of the creatures of God. "The name of this sect," says Neander, "reminds one of the word pasagium (passage), which signifies a tour, and was very commonly employed to denote pilgrimages to the East, to the holy sepulchre,—crusades. May not this word, then, be regarded as an index, pointing to the origin of the sect as one that came from the East, intimating that it grew out of the intercourse with Palestine? May we not suppose that from very ancient times a party of Judaizing Christians had survived, of which this sect must be regarded as an offshoot? The way in which they expressed themselves concerning Christ as being the firstborn of creation, would point also, more directly, at the connection of their doctrine with some older Jewish theology, than at that later purely Western origin."

PASCH, a term sometimes used to denote the festival of EASTER (which see).

PASCHA. See PASSOVER.

PASCHAL CONTROVERSY. See EASTER.

PASCHAL SOLEMNITY, the week preceding, and the week following, Easter.

PASCHAL TAPER, a taper used in the Roman Catholic Church at the time of Easter. It is lighted from the holy fire, and receives its benediction by the priest's putting five grains of incense in the form of a cross into the taper. This blessed taper must remain on the Gospel side of the altar from Easter-eve to Ascension-day.

PASCHAL TERM (THE), a name given sometimes to Easter-day.

PASE-BUDHAS, the Budhas who arise in the period in which there is no supreme Budha, and discover intuitively the way to Nirvéda, but are unable to teach it to others. If alms be given to a Pase-Budha, it produces merit greater by one hundred times than when given to a rahat. The peculiarities of the Pase-Budha are thus detailed by

Mr. Spence Hardy, in his 'Eastern Monachism': "He has attained the high state of privilege that he enjoys, by his own unaided exertions, as he has had no teacher, no one to instruct him; he is called pratyéka, severed or separated, and is solitary, alone, like the unioeru; thus his mind is light, pure, free towards the Pasé-Budhaship; but dull, heavy, bound, towards the state of the supreme Budhas; he has learnt that which belongs to his order, but he understands not the five kinds of knowledge that are perceived by the supreme Budhas and by no other being; he knows not the thoughts of others; he has not the power to see all things, nor to know all things; in these respects his mind is heavy. Thus a man, whether by day or night, arrives at the brink of a small stream, into which he descends without fear, in order that he may pass to the other side. But at another time he comes to a river that is deep and broad; there are no stepping-stones by which he can cross; he cannot see to the opposite bank; it is like the ocean; in consequence of these obstacles he is afraid to venture into the water, he cannot cross the stream. In the same way the Pasé-Budha is free as to that which is connected with his own order, but bound as to all that is peculiar to the supreme Budhas."

PASIPHAE, a goddess worshipped among the ancient Greeks at Thalamæ in Laconia. She was believed to give supernatural revelations or oracular responses in dreams to those who slept in her temple.

PASITHEA, one of the GRACES (which see), among the ancient Greeks.

PASSALORYNCHITES, a branch of the MON-TAXISTS (which see), who are said to have observed a perpetual silence, and hence their enemies represented them as keeping their finger constantly upon their mouth, not daring to open it even to say their prayers, grounding this practice, as was alleged, on Ps. exli. 3, "Set a watch, O Lord, before my mouth; keep the door of my lips." This sect appeared first in the second century, and Jerome states, that even in his time he found some of them in Galatia as he travelled to Ancyra.

PASSING BELL, the bell which in former times was tolled when any person was dying, or passing out of this life. It is tolled in England at the burial of any parishioner, the practice being enjoined in the sixth canon of the Church of England. See BELLS.

PASSION DAY. See GOOD FRIDAY.

PASSION WEEK, the week preceding Easter, so called from our Lord's passion or sufferings on the cross. It was called anciently HEBDOMAS-MAGNA (which see), or the Great Week, and many Christians were accustomed to fast much more strictly on this week than on the other weeks of Lent. Epiphanius says, that in his time the people confined their diet, during that week, to dried meats, namely, bread, and salt, and water. Nor were these used during the day, but in the evening. In another place, the same ancient writer says, "Some continued the whole week, making one prolonged fast of the whole; others eat after two days, and others every evening." Chrysostom mentions, that, during this week, it was customary to make a more liberal distribution of alms to the poor, and the exercise of all kinds of charity to those who had need of it. To servants it was a time of rest and liberty, and the same privilege extended to the week-following, as well as to the week preceding Easter. The emperors, also, granted a general release to prisoners at this season, and commanded all suits and processes at law to cease. The Thursday of the Passion Week, being the day on which our Lord was betrayed, was observed with some peculiar customs. In some of the Latin churches the communion was administered on this day in the evening in imitation of our Lord's last supper, a provision being made for this in one of the canons of the third council of Carthage. On this day the competentes, or candidates for baptism, publicly recited the creed in the presence of the bishop or presbyters in the church. Such public penitents, also, as had completed the penance enjoined by the church, were absolved on this day. From the canons of the fourth council of Toledo, it would appear that a general absolution was proclaimed to all those who observed the day with fasting, prayers, or true contrition. The Saturday or Sabbath in Passion Week was commonly known by the name of the Great Sabbath. It was the only Sabbath throughout the year that the Greek churches, and some of the Western, kept as a fast. The fast was continued not only until evening, but even protracted till cock-crowing in the morning, which was supposed to be the time of our Lord's resurrection. The previous part of the night was spent in religious exercises of various kinds. Eusebius tells us that in the time of Constantine this vigil was kept with great pomp; for he set up lofty pillars of wax to burn as torches all over the city, and lamps burning in all places, so that the night seemed to outshine the sun at noon-day. Gregory Nazianzen, also, speaks of the custom of setting up lamps and torches both in the churches and private houses; which, he says, they did as a forerunner of that great Light, the Sun of Righteousness, arising on the world on Easter-day. This night was famous above all others for the baptism of catechumens.

Passion Week, or Holy Week, as it is often termed, is observed with great pomp in the Romish Church. The ceremonies of this season commence on Palm Sunday (which see), when the commemoration takes place of our Saviour's triumphal entry into Jerusalem. On Wednesday of Holy Week, in the afternoon, there is the service of the TENEBRÆ, a kind of funeral service which is repeated at the same hour on the Thursday and Friday. The ceremonies of the Thursday consist principally of a representation of the burial of our Saviour. This is followed in Rome by the ceremony of the Pope washing the feet of thirteen pilgrims in imitation of our Saviour's washing the feet of his disciples; this ceremony being followed up by the same pilgrims being served by his Holiness at dinner. A singular ceremony takes place on the Thursday at St. Peter's in Rome—the washing of the high altar with wine. (See ALTAR.) On Good Friday the ceremony of uncovering and adoring the cross is observed, at the close of which a procession is marshalled to bring back the host from the sepulchre in which it was deposited on the previous day. The Pope and cardinals, also, adore the three great relics, which are glittering caskets of crystal, set in gold and silver, and sparkling with precious stones, and which are said to contain a part of the true cross; one half of the spear which pierced our Saviour's side; and the Volto Santo or holy countenance.

On the Saturday of Passion Week at Rome, converted Jews and heathens are baptized after holy water has been consecrated for the purpose. Young men also are ordained to various sacred offices. The chief employment of the day, however, consists of services in honour of the resurrection. The ceremonies of Easter Sunday have already been described under the article EASTER. Holy Week closes with an illumination and fireworks of the most splendid description.

PASSEVER, one of the great Jewish festivals. It was originally instituted by command of God himself, in commemoration of the deliverance of the Israelites from Egyptian bondage, and the sparing of the first-born on the night previous to their departure. The feast lasted for seven days, during which it was unlawful to eat any other than unleavened bread. Thus the command was given, Exod. xii. 18, "In the first month, on the fourteenth day of the month at even, ye shall eat unleavened bread, until the one and twentieth day of the month at even." Hence the festival is frequently called in Scripture, "the feast of unleavened bread." A lamb without blemish was to be killed on the first day of the feast, and this lamb being an eminent type of Christ, the Apostle Paul speaks of Christ as "our Passover sacrificed for us." The month Nisan being that on which the Israelites left Egypt, was appointed to be the first month of the sacred or ecclesiastical year; and on the fourteenth day of this month they were commanded to kill the paschal lamb, and to abstain from leavened bread. The following day, being the fifteenth, was the great feast of the Passover, which continued seven days, but only the first and seventh days were particularly solemn. Each family killed a lamb or a kid, and if the number of the family was not sufficient to eat the lamb, two families might be associated together. With the blood of the slain lamb they sprinkled the door-posts and lintel of each house, that the destroying angel, on seeing the blood, might pass over them. The lamb was roasted and eaten on the same night with unleavened bread and bitter herbs. It was to be eaten entire, and not a bone of it was to be broken. The Jews, in partaking of the Paschal lamb, had their loins girt, shoes on their feet, and staves in their hands. So strict was the command to keep the Passover, that whoever should dare to neglect it was to be condemned to death. It could only be kept in Jerusalem, and if any person arrived at Jerusalem too late for the feast, he was allowed to defer his celebration of the Passover until the fourteenth day of the following month in the evening. Sacrifices peculiar to the festival were commanded to be offered every day as long as it lasted; but on the first and last days no servile labour was allowed, and a sacred convocation was held.

Since the dispersion no sacrifices have been offered by the Jews, and hence, in this point, the Passover has undergone an alteration among the modern Jews. With those Jews who live in or near Jerusalem, the feast lasts seven days, and with Jews in all other places eight days. The Sabbath preceding the feast is called the Great Sabbath, when the Rabbi of each synagogue delivers a lecture explaining the nature of the approaching feast, and the ceremonies necessary to be observed. On the thirteenth day of the month in the evening, the most careful and minute search is made by the master of each family lest any leavened bread, or even a particle of leaven, should be in the house. Having burned all the leaven that can be discovered, they make unleavened cakes, consisting in general of flour and water only, baked into round thin cakes, and full of little holes. On the fourteenth day of the month the first-born son of each family is required to fast in commemoration of the protection afforded to the first-born of Israel when the first-born of the Egyptians was destroyed.

The special ceremonies of the Passover-festival, as observed by the Modern Jews, are thus described by Mr. Allen, in his 'Modern Judaism': "In the evening of the fourteenth day of the month, the men assemble in the synagogue, to usher in the festival by prayers and other offices prescribed in their ritual; during which, the women are occupied at home in laying and decorating the tables against their return. It is customary for every Jew to honour this festival by an exhibition of the most sumptuous furniture he can afford.

"The table is covered with a clean linen cloth, on which are placed several plates or dishes. On one is laid the shank bone of a shoulder of lamb or kid, but generally lamb, and an egg; on another three cakes, carefully wrapped in two napkins; on a third, some lettuce, chervil, parsley, and celery, wild succory or horseradish. These are their bitter herbs. Near the salad is placed a cruet of vinegar, and some salt and water. They have also a dish representing the bricks required to be made by their forefathers in Egypt. This is a thick paste composed of apples, almonds, nuts, and figs, dressed in wine and seasoned with cinnamon. Every Jew who can afford wine, also provides some for this occasion.

"The family being seated, the master of the house pronounces a grace over the table in general, and the wine in particular. Then leaning in a stately manner on his left arm, as an indication of the liberty which the Israelites regained when they departed from Egypt, he drinks a glass of wine: in which he is followed by all the company. Having emptied their glasses, they dip some of the herbs in vinegar, and eat them, while the master repeats another benediction. The master next unfolds the napkins, and taking the middle cake, breaks it in two, replaces one of the pieces between the two whole cakes, and conceals the other piece under his plate, or under the cushion on which he leans; in professed allusion to the circumstance recorded by Moses that 'the people took their dough before it was leavened, their kneading troughs being bound up in their clothes.' He removes the lamb and egg from the table. Then the plate containing the cakes being lifted up by the hands of the whole company, they unite in rehearsing: 'This is the bread of poverty and affliction which our fathers did eat in Egypt. Whosoever hungers, let him come and eat. Whosoever needs, let him come and eat of the Paschal lamb. This year we are here: the next, God willing, we shall be in the land of Canaan. This year we are servants: the next, if God will, we shall be free, children of the family and lords.

"The lamb and egg are again placed on the table, and another glass of wine is taken. The plate containing the cakes is removed, in order that the children may be excited to inquire into the meaning of the festival. If no children are present, some adult proposes a question according to a prescribed form; which is answered by an account of the captivity and slavery of the nation in Egypt, their deliverance by Moses, and the institution of the Passover on that occasion. This recital is followed by some psalms and hymns. After which—not to proceed with a detail of every particular movement—the cakes are replaced on the table, and pieces of them are distributed among the company, who, 'instead of the Paschal lamb,' the oblation of which is wholly discontinued, 'eat this unleavened bread,' with some of the bitter herbs and part of the pudding made in memory of the bricks.

"After this succeeds a plentiful supper, which is followed by some more pieces of the cakes, and two more glasses of wine: for they are required on this occasion to drink four glasses each, and every glass, according to the rabbies, commemorates a special blessing vouchsafed to their forefathers. The fourth and last cup is accompanied with some passages borrowed from the Scripture imprecating the divine vengeance on the Heathens and on all the enemies of Israel.—The same course of ceremonies is repeated on the second night.—This ceremonial, the modern Jews profess to believe, 'will be as acceptable in the presence of the Lord as the actual offering of the Passover.'

II.

The last day of the festival closes with the HABBADA (which see). They are now permitted to return to the use of leavened bread. Contracts of marriage may be made, but no marriage is allowed to be solemnized during this festival. There are four days in Passover-Week on which business may be done. Every Jew who has a seat in the synagogue, whatever the amount of his seat-rent may be, pays two shillings in the pound as a tax towards the Passover cakes, and about six weeks before the Passover a box is placed at the entrance of the synagogue, when every Jew, who is unable to procure Passover cakes for himself, signifies by a note the number of his household, and they are provided for him out of these funds.

The Passover has been observed without intermission by the Jews from the period of their return from the Babylonish captivity; and it is probable that very few changes have been introduced into the mode of its celebration. The question has frequently given rise to considerable discussion, whether or not the last Supper of our Lord was the Paschal Supper. The Western churches generally maintain the affirmative view of this subject, and the Greek Church the negative. The latter body of Christians, also, contend that, in instituting the Lord's Supper, Christ made use of leavened bread. At an early period in the history of Christianity, the Easter controversy chiefly turned upon the chronology of the Passover. In the second century a controversy arose, first between Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, and Anicetus, bishop of Rome, and afterwards between Victor, bishop of Rome, and Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus, concerning the proper time for celebrating the Easter feast, or rather for terminating the ante-paschal fast. At that time the whole of Christendom, with the exception of proconsular Asia and its immediate neighbourhood, prolonged the fast to the Sunday after the Jewish Passover. But the Christians of the proconsulate, guided by Jewish custom, ended the fast on the very day of the Paschal sacrifice. The keen controversy which ensued has already been noticed under the article EASTER.

PASTOPHORI, priests who carried the Pastos in the sacred rites of heathen antiquity. The priests of Isis and Osiris among the ancient Egyptians, who were so denominated, were arranged in incorporated colleges, which again were divided into lesser companies, each consisting of ten Pastophori, headed by an officer who was appointed every five years to preside over them. Along with the Egyptian worship, the Pastophori were long after found in Greece. The duty of this class of priests was to carry in their religious processions the PASTOS (which see), or sacred shawl, often employed in covering and concealing from public view the adytum or shrine containing the god. It was customary for the Pastophori to chaunt sacred music in the temple, and to draw aside the pastos that the people might behold and adore their deity. Generally speaking, this order of priests had the custody of the temple and all its sacred appurtenances. The Pastophori were looked upon by the Egyptians as eminently skilled in the medical art.

PASTOPHORION, a term used by the ancient Greeks to signify the residence within an Egyptian temple appropriated to the PASTOPHORI (which see). The same word occurs in the Septuagint translation of the Old Testament, where in Ezek. xl. 17. it is used for the chambers in the outward court of the temple. Jerome, in commenting upon the passage, says, that in the translations of Aquila and Symmachus it is rendered Gazophylacium and Esedra, and signified chambers of the treasury, and habitations for the priests and Levites round about that court of the temple. This explanation of the word was probably derived from the writings of Josephus, who mentions the Pastophorium as a part of the temple at Jerusalem, constituting the treasury, in which the offerings of the people were deposited. Jerome, in another passage in his Commentary on Isaiah, terms the Pastophorium the chamber or habitation in which the ruler of the temple dwelt. It is plain, therefore, that the word must have been employed under a very extensive signification.

PASTOR (Lat. a shepherd), a word often employed figuratively to express a minister appointed to watch over and to instruct a congregation, which is in the same way described as his flock. And the use of the term pastor in this connection is particularly recommended by the circumstance, that our Lord styled himself a shepherd in John x. 12. and the church his flock. The Apostle Peter, also, denominated our Lord the Chief Shepherd, in 1 Peter v. 4. The pastor is mentioned in the catalogue which the Apostle Paul has given of the extraordinary and ordinary office-bearers of the Christian Church, Eph. iv. 11, 12. "And he gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ." In this list the ordinary office-bearers are termed pastors and teachers. Two ideas are suggested by the designation of pastors—those namely of feeding and of governing the church, duties which may be performed without the supernatural endowments which were bestowed upon apostles, prophets, and evangelists. Some have supposed that the pastors and teachers were the same persons; but it is not at all probable that the apostle would have used two words in such close connection to describe the same office. The Teacher or Doctor (which see), seems not to have been employed like the pastor in preaching the gospel and in administering the sacraments, but in instructing the young, as well as candidates for baptism, and all who were not yet fully initiated in the knowledge of divine truth.

PASTORAL STAFF. See CROSTER.

PASTORATE, the office of a pastor in connection with the congregation to the charge of which he is ordained.

PASTOS, a shawl frequently used in the religious ceremonies of the ancient Egyptians as well as the heathens of Greece and Rome. It was generally figured with various symbolical representations corresponding to the particular rites in which it was used. The word pastos was also used to denote a small shrine or chapel, in which a god was contained.

PASTUSHKOE SOGLASIA, a sect of Dissenters from the Russo-Greek Church, founded by a shepherd, whose chief peculiarities were, that they held the marriage tie to be indissoluble by any human power, and that it is sinful to carry fasting so far as to injure health or destroy life.

PAT.ECI, Phœnician gods, whose images were used as ornaments to their ships.

PATALA, the hell or place of final punishment of the Hindus. See HELL.

PATARA. See ALMS-BOWL.

PATARENES, a name used in Italy during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries as a general appellation to denote sects contending against the dominant church and clergy. Different opinions have been entertained in regard to the origin of the name, some believing that it is derived from a certain place called Pataria, where the heretics, as they were considered, held their meetings. The word Pataria, however, in the dialect of Milan, signified a popular faction, and as the sects in question were generally held in high estimation by the people, it may easily be seen how the name arose. It was applied to the Manicheans, the Paulicians, and the Catharists.

PATAREUS, a surname of Apollo, derived from the town of Patara in Lycia, where he had an oracle.

PATELLA, a surname of Ops, as opening the stem of the corn plant that the ears might sprout out.

PATELLARI DII, a name sometimes given among the ancient Romans to the Lares, because offerings were made to them in patella or dishes.

PATEN, a term used to denote among the Romanists, and also in the Church of England, the plate on which the sacramental bread is placed.

PATERNIANS, a heretical sect which arose about the beginning of the fifth century, maintaining that only the upper parts of the human body were made by God, and the lower parts were the workmanship of the devil. Their name was derived from their founder Paternus, and as they lived in impurity, they were also called Venustians, from Venus, the heathen goddess, who patronised uncleanness.

PATERNOSTER (Lat. Our Father), a term sometimes used to denote the LORD'S PRAYER (which see), derived from its commencing words. The chaplet of beads worn by some Romanists, particularly monks and nuns, is occasionally called a Paternoster.

PATIS (THE FOUR). See NIRWANA.

PATRES (Lat. Fathers), a name frequently applied to the PRIMATES (which see), of the Christian Church in Africa; and there was a peculiar reason for giving them this name; as the primacy in the African churches was not fixed, as in other places, to the civil metropolis, but went along with the oldest bishop of the province, who succeeded to this dignity by virtue of his seniority, whatever place he lived in. The only exception to this rule was the Church at Carthage, where the bishop was a fixed and standing metropolitan for the province of Africa, properly so called. The term Patres was also applied to the fathers of the monasteries, as Jerome and Augustine commonly call them.

PATRES PATRUM (Lat. Fathers of Fathers,) a designation sometimes given to bishops in the ancient Christian Church. Gregory Nyssen was called by this name in the canons of the second council of Nice; and others say that Theodosius the emperor gave Chrysostom the same honourable title after death.

PATRES SACRORUM, priests of MITHRAS (which see), among the ancient Romans under the emperors.

PATRIARCH (JEWISH), the father or founder of a family or tribe. It is applied chiefly to those fathers of the Hebrew nation who lived before Moses, such as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, while the twelve children of the last-mentioned ancestor of the Jews usually receive the name of the twelve Patriarchs. The term, however, came to be used among the Jews in the later ages of their history as a title of dignity and honour. They allege that the institution of the patriarchs existed before the destruction of Jerusalem, and they explain its origin thus. Thirty years before the Christian era, Hillel arrived from Babylon, and was consulted concerning a difficulty which had arisen in regard to the celebration of the Passover, and giving a highly satisfactory answer, he was hailed the Patriarch of the nation. His posterity succeeded him in this dignity until the fifth century, when the office of Patriarch ceased in Judea. But this notion of the Jews as to the patriarchal dignity having been enjoyed by any one before the time of our Lord, is in the highest degree improbable, since had there been individuals exercising such an office during the days of our Saviour, they would have presided in the ecclesiastical courts, and our Lord would have been arraigned at their tribunal. On the contrary, the chief priest presided at the trial of Christ, imposed silence upon the apostles, commissioned Saul to go to Damascus that he might persecute the Christians, presided at the trial of Paul, and commanded him to be smitten on the face. From these facts it is quite plain, that no Patriarch could possibly have existed at that time, and, therefore, the origin of the office must have been of a later date, not probably before the reign of the Roman Emperor Adrian.

The first authentic Patriarch of the Jews was Simeon the Third, who lived in the time of Adrian, and was descended in a direct line from Hillel the Old. In that family the patriarchal dignity remained until it was abolished in A. D. 429. The office had been created for the benefit of the Western Jews, and the seat of the dignitary who held the office was at Tiberias in Galilee, which had become a kind of second Jerusalem, the residence of the most learned Jews of the time. From the imperial edicts it would appear, that there were inferior officers under the grand Patriarch, who was styled illustrious, and was honoured even by Christians. He employed envoys or legates to make an annual circuit through all the Western provinces, with full powers to decide in his name, and by his authority, the questions or disputes that arose between private individuals, or between different synagogues. The half shekel appointed by Moses to be levied from every male Jew of twenty years old and upward, was carefully collected during the whole of the Jewish dispensation, and constituted the greatest source of revenue to the Patriarchs. The grand Patriarch exacted this tribute-money from all the synagogues of the West. Epiphanius says, that the apostles of the Patriarch went as far as the province of Cilicia to levy this sacred contribution. Its collection was sometimes conducted with such severity, that the Patriarchs became odious to the people. This happened particularly in the reign of Julian the Apostate, when, in consequence of a petition from the Jews themselves, he abolished the tribute.

The Patriarch, from his office, had great authority among the Jews. "He nominated," we are told, in an interesting history of the Modern Jews, "the heads of all the synagogues; and this nomination proved a source of wealth. For the Patriarch often sold these offices, and Palladius charged the Patriarch of his time, not only with exposing to sale these dignities, but frequently deposing the heads of the synagogues for no other reason but to enrich himself by supplying their places. Thus the Greek Patriarchs at Constantinople deposed the metropolitans and bishops, to have the advantage of selling the priesthood; and the grand vizier acts the same part towards the Patriarchs. Though this power was sometimes restricted by the emperor, yet the Patriarch had also the power of erecting new synagogues. He likewise decided controversies which arose concerning questions of the law, and all disputes between particular synagogues. Origen is mistaken in asserting that the Patriarch had the power of life and death invested in his hands. The imperial laws establish the contrary; nor can one example be produced in the history of the Patriarchs of their exercising any such power.—It is granted, that their punishments were sometimes severe, and that by their commands persons had been almost whipped to death in their synagogues. But this originated from the indulgence of the emperors, and even they were often constrained to limit their power. The power of life and death indicates royalty, of which the Jews were now deprived.

"There is an edict of the Emperor Theodosius which ascertains the extent of the patriarchal jurisdiction. He forbids Gamaliel, who was then Patriarch, 'to build new synagogues, and commanded Aurelian to demolish those that were little frequented, if it could be done without occasioning commotions in the cities.' There was a general law in the empire, that none should erect new churches without an imperial grant.—One of the Christians applied to the emperor for liberty to erect Christian churches in several places in the land of Judea. Justinian cautioned the bishops to be careful that no person occupied any public place without liberty from him. In the reign of Leo, also, some monks who had consecrated places of public shows and recreations were prohibited. And it appears that the Patriarch Gamaliel having abused that power it was recalled.

"By the same edict he is prohibited from judging in disputes between Jews and Christians. Such disputes were to be tried before the civil magistrate, and the Patriarch had only the power to decide between Jew and Jew. On the contrary, Gamaliel insisted that if one of the parties was a Jew, the right of decision belonged to him; but the emperor restricted his power.

"That edict also prohibits 'the Patriarch from dishonouring any man, whether a slave or a free-man, with the mark of Judaism.' That mark was circumcision, which the Patriarch supposed that he could confer upon all who embraced the Jewish religion. But the emperor Antoninus issued a law, by which it was declared a capital crime for a Jew to circumcise any man who was not of his nation; and Theodosius went farther, and prohibited the Jews from keeping Christian slaves, because many of these under the influence of their masters embraced the Jewish faith. It appears, therefore, that the Jews enjoyed liberty of conscience, but were not permitted to make proselytes.

"The most important and the most obscure part of the edict of Theodosius remains yet to be examined. He farther commanded Aurelian 'to withdraw out of the hands of the Patriarch Gamaliel, the letters of command he had received, and to leave him only the honour he had before, since he thought he might transgress with impunity, whilst he saw himself raised to a greater dignity. The reason assigned for the restriction, was the abuse of power. That power, or those letters of command, appear to have been the honour of prefecture, which were granted to those distinguished by birth or merit, or imperial favour. The person who was distinguished by that favour, wore the insignia of his honours in public. Though this honour conferred no judicial power, yet the person who enjoyed it might sit among the judges, as a mark of distinguished honour. This favour appears to have been conferred upon Gamaliel; but on account of his haughtiness and imprudence it was recalled. Thus an examination of the different branches of that imperial law ascertains the authority of the Patriarchs.

"But to behold the utmost limits of the Patriarchal authority, let us attend to their power, with respect to deposition. As they were the heads of the nation, they appear to have been amenable to no other tribunal. The Jewish writers, however, contend, that no society can be deprived of the inherent right of deposing a head, who is either negligent, or tyrannical, or ignorant. In proof of their position, they mention that one Meir attempted to depose the Patriarch of his time: that Gamaliel was, during a short time, actually deposed; and that several to whom it belonged by birth were superseded on account of their incapacity."

The last Patriarch of the West was Gamaliel, who is mentioned by Jerome. So corrupt had this race of officers become, that they exposed to sale the dignities of which they had the patronage, in order to enlarge their revenues. Accordingly, in A. D. 415, a law was passed by the Emperor Theodosius to restrict their power, and this measure having failed to accomplish its design, the patriarchal dignity was entirely abolished, in so far as the Western Jews were concerned, in A. D. 429, after having existed for the space of 350 years. The Patriarchs were succeeded by the PRIMATES (which see), a class of officers whose jurisdiction and authority was of quite a different character.

The Patriarch of the Eastern Jews had his residence in Babylon. His proper title was RESH-GLUTHA, or ACHUMALOTARCH (which see), prince or chief of the captivity, the office being rather civil than sacred. The dignity originated while the Parthians reigned in Persia, but it continued under the new dynasty of the Sassanides, and only came to an end under the caliphs towards the middle of the eleventh century. A shadow of the office seems to have remained in the East in the twelfth century; and in Spain, among many other hereditary reminiscences of the Babylonian Jews, we find in the middle ages the Prince of the Captivity under the title of Rabbino-Mayor.

PATRIARCH (CHRISTIAN). It would appear from the writings of Gregory Nazianzen, as well as of Gregory Nyssen, that the word Patriarch was sometimes applied to all bishops of the ancient Christian Church. Among the Montanists there was a class of men who received the name of Patriarchs, and who were superior to their bishops, being regarded as a distinct order from them. The first occasion, however, on which the title is applied to any bishop by any public authority of the church, is in the council of Chalcedon, which mentions the most holy Patriarchs of every diocese, and particularly Leo, patriarch of Rome. Socrates, the ecclesiastical historian, who wrote a few years before the council of Chalcedon, mentions Patriarchs, and refers to them in language which would seem to indicate that the name had begun to be used as an appropriate title of some eminent bishops of the church. Various Romish writers, however, headed by Baronius, trace the patriarchal power as far back as the time of the apostles, deriving it from the Apostle Peter; others, again, reject this idea, and reckon the first rise of Patriarchs to have been some time before the council of Nice, A. D. 325; while some modern Greek writers allege, that Patriarchs were first instituted by that council; and some writers of our own country are of opinion, that patriarchal power was not known in the church till about the time of the second general council of Constantinople, A. D. 381. Soerates, in speaking of this council, expressly affirms, that "they constituted Patriarchs, and distributed the provinces, so that no bishop should meddle with the affairs of another diocese, as was used to be done in times of persecution." The power of the Patriarchs gradually increased, and had evidently reached its height in the time of the general councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon. From the middle of the fifth century, the title of Patriarch was given to some of the greater bishops, who exercised authority not only over the bishops of a province, but over the bishops of several provinces together with their metropolitans. These Patriarchs were the bishops of Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, and Antioch. The increase of their power arose from the circumstance, that at the council of Chalcedon in A. D. 451, the metropolitan of Constantinople was invested with authority over the provinces of Thraee, Pontus, and Asia Minor, and the bishop of Jerusalem was acknowledged as the fifth Patriarch. The Patriarchs were now empowered to consecrate all the metropolitans within their patriarchate, and in addition to this, the Patriarch of Constantinople claimed the right of consecrating not only metropolitans but bishops. Another privilege conceded to the Patriarchs by the council of Chalcedon, was the right of convening general councils; and to them lay an appeal from the decisions of metropolitans in matters of greater importance.

The patriarchates were very different from one another in size. Alexandria was the largest in point of territorial extent, but Constantinople had the pre-eminence in the number of its churches and ecclesiastical provinces, and its Patriarch, in process of time, came to be Patriarch over the Patriarchs of Ephesus, Hieraclea, and Cæsarea, and was called the œcumenical and universal Patriarch. The patriarchal system extended only to the limits of the Roman Empire eastward and westward, not to the churches which existed in Persia, Arabia, and part of Armenia. The four great patriarchates, however, were gradually made to include every part of the church. But the two Eastern patriarchates of Alexandria and Antioch eye. The Patriarch of Constantinople was much indebted for his power and influence to the favour of the Greek emperors, and at length John the Faster, towards the end of the sixth century, assumed the title of Universal Bishop. Gregory the Great, the Roman bishop, was indignant at this presumption on the part of his rival, and denounced it as unchristian, but his own immediate successor soon after prevailed upon the Greek emperor, Phocas, to confer upon him the same title, on the ground that the Roman Church was entitled to the first rank, both from political and personal considerations.

The original Patriarchs were those of Rome, Antioch, and Alexandria. Towards the close of the fourth century the bishops of Constantinople, having also become Patriarchs, extended their authority over several dioceses not subject to the other Patriarchs. In the following century the bishops of Jerusalem became independent of the Patriarchs of Antioch, and thus there were five patriarchates formed, which continued from the fifth century onward to the Reformation. In the course of the seventh century the Persian army under Chosroes made great devastation in several of the patriarchates, and subsequently the Saracens made themselves masters first of Antioch, then of Jerusalem, and finally of Alexandria. The Turks next appeared on the field, and though the progress of their invading armies was checked for a time by the Crusaders, they succeeded in maintaining possession of Syria, Egypt, and Palestine. At length, in A. D. 1453, Constantinople fell into the hands of the Turks, and from that period it has continued to be the residence of the sultans. The Turks signalized their conquest of New Rome, as Constantinople has been often termed, by converting the church of St. Sophia into a mosque. One half of the Oriental churches remained in possession of the Christians until the beginning of the sixteenth century, when the Sultan Selim appropriated as many of them as he thought needful to the use of the Mohammedans.

At present there are four Patriarchs connected with the Greek Church, those of Constantinople, Jerusalem, Antioch, and Alexandria. The three last are equal in rank and authority, but they acknowledge the superiority of the other, and submit so far to his authority as to require his consent before any important step in ecclesiastical affairs can be undertaken. The Patriarch of Constantinople is elected by the metropolitan and neighbouring bishops, and presented to the sultan, without whose consent he cannot be admitted to his office. Besides, he is obliged to pay tribute to the Mohammedan government for leave to enter on his office, and he is liable to deposition whenever such is the will of the sultan. So completely has this Patriarch been dependent on the caprice of the Ottoman Porte, that, as history informs us, between the years 1620 and 1671, the patriarchal throne was vacant no fewer than nineteen times.

As an illustration of the cruelty with which the Greek Patriarchs have been often treated by the Turkish government, we may quote from an interesting sketch of the Greek and Eastern churches, the following account of the eventful life and tragic death of Gregory, one of the latest of the Constantinopolitan patriarchs. "He was born in 1739, and educated in a town of Arcadia. Having completed his studies at Mount Athos, and filled for a while the archbishopric of Smyrna, he obtained the patriarchate of Constantinople in 1795. Three years after this, when the French were occupying Egypt, the Turks accused him of being in correspondence with the enemy, and vehemently clamoured for his destruction. The sultan fully believed him innocent, but to secure his safety sent him into temporary banishment to his old resort on the Holy Mountain. His exile was but short; he was soon restored to office, where he gained much repute for his learning, piety, charity, and humility. He gave alms to the poor without any invidious distinction as to their religious creed, promoted schools of mutual instruction, and befriended the cause of the British and Foreign Bible Society. In 1806, the appearance of an English fleet before Constantinople, and the approach of the Russian forces, revived the accusations against the Patriarch, who, though he had sedulously inculcated on his compatriots and co-religionists the duty of submission and patience, and had earnestly besought them to abstain from all hostility, was a second time banished to Monte Santo, as a suspected traitor to the civil government. A third time he ascended the oecumenical throne. But in 1821, the insurrection which broke out in the Morea involved him in renewed peril. Sympathizing with his people in their oppressed state, yet disapproving of their rebellion, his task was a hard one, and it is probable that a hope of preventing the massacre of all the Greeks in Constantinople was the inducement which made him consent to excommunicate the Russian general Ypsilanti and all the insurgents. When the excited Mussulmans had broken into the house belonging to the Russian counsellor of legation, and had beheaded Prince Constantine Morousi, the family of the latter were confided by the grand vizier to the care of Gregory. By some means, not positively known to us, and certainly unknown to the aged Patriarch, they all escaped on board a Russian vessel. He was charged, however, with having connived at, if not contrived, their flight, and the vizier resolved on his death. On the twenty-second of April, the first day of the Easter festivities, usually a high season among the members of the Oriental communion, their chief place of worship was thinly attended, the people fearing to venture out of doors in such a time of commotion. The Patriarch, however, assisted by his bishops, went through the service with the usual ceremonies, but on leaving the church, they were all surrounded and seized by the Janissaries. The latter shrank back indeed with some misgivings as they looked on the old man's venerable aspect; but their leader reminded them of the grand vizier's instructions, and their hesitation was at an end. Gregory, three of his bishops, and eight priests, without imprisonment—without a trial—were hung in their canonical robes before the church and palace gates. At the expiration of two days, their bodies were cut down, and delivered to a Jewish rabble, who, after having treated them with every species of indignity, dragged them through the streets and cast them into the sea. That of the Patriarch having been preserved from sinking, was purchased from the Jews by some Greek sailors, who conveyed it by night to Odessa, where the Russian archimandrite Theophilus gave it a very magnificent funeral. The fury of the Turks was not yet appeased; several hundred Greek churches were destroyed, and on the third of May, another Patriarch, Cyrillus, who had retired into solitude, Proesos an archbishop, and several others, were similarly put to death at Adrianople. Instead of exciting fear, these barbarous acts only inflamed the enthusiasm of the rebels; the war was carried on with increased vigour, and Greece finally became independent."

The Patriarch of Antioch has two rivals who assume the same style and dignity; the one as the head of the Syrian Jacobite Church, and the other as the Maronite Patriarch, or head of the Syrian Catholics. The Patriarch of Alexandria, who resides generally at Cairo, has also his Coptic rival, and the few who are subject to his spiritual authority reside chiefly in the villages and the capital of Lower Egypt. The Patriarchs of Antioch and Jerusalem reside chiefly at Constantinople, and possess a very limited and somewhat precarious income. The Patriarch of Constantinople has a permanent synod of bishops and notables, who act as his council and judicial court, in connection with which he is the arbitrator and judge of his people. There are three patriarchates among the Armenians, and the Patriarch receives the name of CATHOLICOS (which see). The highest of all the Armenian Patriarchs has his seat at Etchmiadzin, and has under his jurisdiction the whole of Turcomania or Armenia Major. This dignity has since 1828 been appointed by the czar of Russia, and has under him a synod and an imperial procurator. The next in rank of the Armenian Patriarchs resides at Sis, a city in Cilicia, and has a limited province in Syria and the south of Anatolia. The third Patriarch of the Armenian Church is that of Aghamar, an island in Lake Van, and holds his sway over Kurdistan. There are also some minor Patriarchs; one at Constantinople, who presides over Turkish Armenia; another at Jerusalem for the Armenians of Palestine; and another at Kamenietz for those in Russia and Poland.

The murder of the Patriarch Gregory broke asunder the last link which connected the oppressed Greeks with the Turkish government. In consequence of the rapid spread of liberal principles, the civil and judicial authority of the episcopal courts was speedily overthrown. The Greeks felt that it was inconsistent with sound principle that their church should continue dependent upon a Patriarch appointed by the sultan, and, accordingly, an assembly of bishops met at Syra in August 1833, and was directed by the Greek government to declare, that the Orthodox Church of Greece acknowledged no head but Jesus Christ, that the administration of the church belonged to the king, and was to be carried on under the directions of the sacred canons by a synod of bishops permanently appointed, but annually renewed by him. This separation of the Greek Church from the Patriarch of Constantinople gave great offence to a large portion of the people, and in 1839 a conspiracy was formed to destroy all foreign influence, and to place the church under the jurisdiction of the Patriarch Gregory VI. This prelate acted with singular imprudence, and in 1840 he was deposed. The Greek Constitution of 1844 recognized the Orthodox Eastern Church as established by law, required the successor to the throne to be a member of that church, and while it gave free toleration to other forms of worship, it prohibited all proselytizing. The ecclesiastical statute of 1845 rendered the synod much less dependent upon the government. It was recognized by the Patriarch of Constantinople, through the mediation of Russia, in 1850, on condition that the holy oil should always be obtained from the mother church, but it was itself to be chosen by the clergy, and the bishop of Attica was to be its perpetual president.

The history of the Russo-Greek Church sets before us a series of ten Patriarchs, who successively presided over and regulated its ecclesiastical arrangements. For six centuries that church was governed by metropolitans dependent on the church of Constantinople; some of them being Greeks sent direct from the Patriarch, while others were Russians who had been elected by a synod of their own bishops, but afterwards received the patriarchal sanction. In course of time the Russian Church became independent of the Patriarch of Constantinople. The Czar Theodore, having quarrelled with the Porte, formed the idea of establishing a patriarchal throne in Russia. At length an opportunity offered of accomplishing this design. In June 1588, Jeremiah II., Patriarch of Constantinople, having been deposed by the Sultan Amurath, took refuge in Russia, and the Czar having stated his wishes on the subject of a Patriarch, they were readily complied with, and Job, the metropolitan of Moscow, was forthwith consecrated to the office with great pomp. This step was warmly approved by the other Patriarchs, who ordained that the Russian should rank among the other patriarchates as the fifth and last. The inferior rank thus assigned to the new dignitary gave great offence to the Czar, who insisted that the Patriarch of Moscow should take precedence both of Jerusalem and Antioch, yielding only to Constantinople as the œcumenical Patriarch, and to Alexandria as the œcumenical judge. The Patriarch of Alexandria has, since the eleventh century, borne the title of œcumenical judge, and in token of the dignity thereby conferred, he has always worn two omophoria over his robes, and a twofold crown on his mitre.

The Russian Patriarchs, who were only ten in number, were obliged, until the middle of the seventeenth century, to obtain confirmation at Constantinople. In token of the high estimation in which the office was held, it was customary for the Czar on Palm Sunday to lead by the bridle an ass, on which the Patriarch rode through the streets of Moscow in commemoration of the Saviour's entry into Jerusalem. The most famous of the Muscovite Patriarchs were Philaret and Nikon. The former, who was father of Michael, the founder of the present Romanoff dynasty, is particularly noted for having corrected such errors as had gradually crept into the Russian Trebnik, or office-book; while the latter, who was the third Patriarch in succession from Philaret, is noted for having corrected such errors as still remained in the Slavonic version of Scripture, and in the service-books, for which he collated about a thousand old Greek manuscripts. His labours, however, instead of being appreciated, were visited with persecution, and yet it is remarkable, that the corrections which he proposed in the Trebnik were readily adopted by command of the Emperor Alexis.

The last of the Russian Patriarchs was Adrian, who died in 1700. For some time the Patriarchs had assumed a power and wielded an influence which was incompatible with the independent exercise of civil authority on the part of the government. Peter the Great, amid the other reforms which he introduced, resolved to embrace the first opportunity which should present itself of putting an end to the Patriarchal office. When the Russian bishops, accordingly, were assembled to elect a successor to Adrian, Peter unexpectedly entered the place of meeting, and with the concise but firm remark, "I am your Patriarch," arrested their proceedings, appointing in the meantime, on his own responsibility, a temporary guardian of the patriarchate, until his plans for an improvement in the government of the church should be fully matured. Having revolved the subject in all its bearings, he came to the conclusion, that the continuance of the Patriarchal power, as exercised by a single individual, was dangerous to the public interests, and, accordingly, having sought and obtained the consent of the synod of Constantinople, and the Patriarchs of the Eastern Church, he published a royal edict in 1721, to the effect, that henceforth the ecclesiastical affairs of the Russo-Greek Church should be managed by a permanent court, consisting of a certain number of bishops, several presbyters, and an imperial procurator. The presbyters sit in this assembly, which is termed the Holy Synod, and vote along with the bishops, while the procurator, who neither presides, nor is even a member of the court, is empowered merely to be present at its sittings, and to give or refuse the sanction of the civil power to its decisions. The Holy Synod is recognized as the supreme court of the church, and in all matters purely spiritual the Czar makes no pretence to interfere. See RUSSO-GREEK CHURCH—SYNOD (HOLY).

PATRICIANS, the followers of one Patricius, a heretic who is mentioned by Augustine as having belonged to the fifth century. The tenets of this sect were, that the substance of man's body was made by the devil and not by God; and, therefore, that it is lawful for a Christian to kill himself in order to be disengaged from the body.

PATRI DI (Lat. pater, a father, and Dii gods), a name applied in heathen antiquity to the gods from whom tribes were believed to be sprung, or to gods worshipped by their ancestors. Sometimes the name was given to the spirits of their deceased ancestors. Among the ancient Romans the term was sometimes used to denote the Furies or EUMENIDES (which see).

PATRIUM and MATRIUM, a name applied among the ancient Romans to children whose parents had been married according to the religious ceremony called CONFARREATIO (which see). These were generally considered as more suitable for the service of the gods than the children of other marriages.

PATRIOTS IN CHRIST, certain Wurtemberg Separatists mentioned by the Abbé Gregoire, who appeared in 1801, during the rising popularity of Buonaparte, and maintained that he was the second and true Messiah who was to destroy the spiritual Babylon, and give freedom to the nations. They formed themselves into an order of knighthood, called the Knights of Napoleon, but as the ambitious personage on whom their expectations rested made no pretensions to the dignity which they had marked out for him, they met with no encouragement, and speedily fell into oblivion.

PATRIPASSIANS (Lat. Pater, Father, and Passio, suffering), a class of MONARCHIANS (which see), originated by Praxeas in the second century, who held that the Father was in all respects identical with the Son in the blessed Trinity, and therefore may be said to have suffered on the cross as well as the Son.

PATRONAGE. In the times of ancient paganism, whoever erected to any god either a larger or a smaller temple, had the right of designating the priests and attendants on the altar, who should officiate there. And after Christianity had been established by Constantine as the recognized religion of the Roman Empire, a similar custom came to be introduced into the Christian Church, so that whoever erected a Christian place of worship came to possess the right of nominating the minister who conducted divine service in it. At first certain privileges not amounting to patronage had been granted to persons who built or endowed churches, such as the insertion of their names in the public prayers of the church, or the emblazoning of their names in some part of the building, and afterwards they were allowed some influence or share in the nomination of the officiating clergy. At length, in the course of the seventh century, the right of presentation to benefices was formally conceded, both in the Eastern and Western Church, to all patrons, whether ecclesiastical or lay. "In many cases, however," to quote from Mr. Riddle, "churches were built and endowed by laymen, with the reservation of certain rights to themselves as patrons; a reservation sometimes perhaps only of a certain portion of the proceeds of the estate conveyed to the church, but sometimes also of a certain portion, extending in some instances to one half, of the voluntary offerings or fees. That is to say, churches were built, as in modern times, on speculation, with a view to a pecuniary return. And although the impropriety of this speculation was severely felt, and the bishops perceived that it was at variance with their interests, it is doubtful whether they succeeded in entirely removing the evil during this period. The synod of Braga, A. D. 572, prohibited bishops from consecrating churches erected under these conditions.

"In the time of Charlemagne advowsons were sold, and were even divided into portions among heirs. Presentations also were often sold; but this practice was continually denounced as an abuse.

"Patrons and their heirs were formally invested with the right of exercising a kind of oversight of the churches which they had founded, and especially with power to see that the funds were appropriated to their proper purposes according to the intentions of the donor. This right even included power to proceed legally against the bishop of the diocese if he should attempt any act of spoliation or misappropriation.

"The patron could indeed only nominate to a benefice, and present his nominee to the bishop, with whom it still rested to ordain the candidate, and admit him to the benefice, with power to reject him on the ground of unfitness or unworthiness. Still this was a considerable limitation of the power of the bishops, compared with that which they had formerly possessed; not to mention the fact that the law appears to have been often evaded or infringed, so that patrons presented and instituted without the bishop's consent."

It was not until the middle of the twelfth century that popes began to interfere with the patronage of ecclesiastical benefices. Adrian IV., in A. D. 1154, sent a papal brief to Theobald, bishop of Paris, in favour of the chancellor of Louis VII., asking his appointment to a canonry—a request which was readily complied with. Under the successors of Adrian such applications were greatly multiplied, so as in a short time to equal in number the benefices in the gift of ecclesiastical patrons. The preces, as these requests were called, were soon changed into indults, and when not complied with, certain exco-

session of the benefices. So rapidly had matters reached this point, that Alexander III., the second successor of Adrian IV., proceeded in the high-handed way we have now indicated to enforce the right which he claimed over ecclesiastical benefices as they became vacant.

Succeeding popes adopted a similar line of procedure. Before the expiration of thirty years all the benefices in Germany, France, and England, the right of collation to which had been vested in bishops and chapters, were filled with papal nominees. Still, however, the form of collation was left with the ancient patrons. But with the thirteenth century even this form passed away. Innocent III., as Mr. Riddle informs us, "began not only to nominate, but to issue bulls of collation, merely giving notice to bishops and chapters that collation had been made; and, in 1210, he declared that the Pope had absolute right to dispose of all benefices in favour of persons who had rendered good service to the Roman see. From this time the popes ignored or set aside, at their pleasure, the rights of all patrons, lay as well as ecclesiastical; and from this time also they assumed the right of their legates to confer benefices, and claimed the power to dispose of bishoprics and abbeys as well as of smaller benefices."

In accordance with the right which the popes thus claimed, the glaring abuses of their patronage, which came to be notorious among the people, hastened on the Reformation of the sixteenth century. Dr. Robertson, in his 'History of Charles the Fifth,' asserts that companies of merchants openly bought the benefices of different districts from the Pope's agents, and retailed them at advanced prices. Such simoniacal practices were regarded as in the highest degree discreditable, and the warmest friends of the church lamented that her revenues should be increased by this unholy traffic. The way was thus opened up for Luther, who found a ready entrance for his doctrines among a people fully prepared for throwing off the yoke of Rome.

The right of patronage is termed in England the right of ADVOWSON (which see), which was originally founded in the building or endowing of churches. The right thus obtained became attached to the manor, and the tithes of the manor were also annexed to the church. An advowson then may be sold like any other property; hence many advowsons have become separated from the land to which they originally belonged. The greater part of the benefices in England are presentative, that is, in the hands of the patrons.

PATRONAGE IN SCOTLAND.—We possess no precise information as to the time when lay patronage was introduced into Scotland. The elder McCrie refers it to the tenth century, but it is not until the following century that we find mention for the first time of Scottish patronages and presentations in the Book of Laws of Malcolm II.

It is not improbable that these were acquired as a return for liberality in the erection and endowment of churches and monasteries. When the clergy, however, rose into great power, wealth, and influence, they became desirous of recovering the patronages which had passed into the hands of the laity. With this view they persuaded the patrons to convey their rights over to the church, by annexing them to bishoprics, abbeys, priories, and other religious houses. The benefices thus annexed were termed patrimonial, and their number was such that the government became alarmed at the vast accession which was thus made to the wealth and authority of the clergy. An attempt was, accordingly, made to check this process of annexation by a statute passed in the reign of James III. in A. D. 1471; but so little effect had the restraints imposed by the civil power, that at the Reformation, out of about 940 benefices in Scotland, only 262 were non-appropriated, and even of these a considerable number, though not annexed, were in the hands of bishops, abbots, and the heads of other religious houses. It is plain, therefore, that at the commencing period of the Reformed Church of Scotland, there were no more than about 200 strictly lay patronages. With these, viewing them as resting upon civil enactments, the church did not deem it proper to interfere.

Lay patronage became riveted still more firmly on the Scottish Church by the conduct of James VI., who prevailed upon the parliament to pass an act detaching the church lands from all connection with ecclesiastical persons, and annexing them to the crown. Having thus got these lands into his own power, he lavishly bestowed them on almost any one who sought them, conveying also along with the lands the patronages which had formerly belonged to their ecclesiastical proprietors, and which he thus converted into lay patronages. This arbitrary step on the part of the monarch met with a strong but ineffectual remonstrance from the General Assembly in 1588. "By the Act of 1592," says Mr. Dugald Stewart, in his 'Life of Dr. Robertson,' "which gave a legal establishment to the form of church government now delineated, the patron of a vacant parish was entitled to present to the presbytery a person properly qualified; and the presbytery were required, after subjecting the presentee to certain trials and examinations, of which they were constituted the judges, to ordain and settle him as minister of the parish, provided no relevant objection should be stated to his life, doctrine, and qualifications." This right of presentation, however, although conferred by the fundamental charter of presbyterian government in Scotland, was early complained of as a grievance."

For upwards of sixty years patronage, though distasteful to the Scottish people, continued in all its force, but at length, in 1649, the parliament passed an Act abolishing lay patronage in the Church of Scotland, and describing it "as being unlawful and unwarrantable by the Word of God, and contrary to the doctrines and liberties of this church." This Act of Parliament was followed up at their request by an Act of the General Assembly, entitled 'Directory for the Election of Ministers.' Shortly after the Restoration of Charles II. in 1660, however, the Act Rescissory, as it is called, was passed, annulling all the parliaments held since 1633, with all their proceedings, and thus restoring patronage along with prebacy. But the abolition of prelacy, and the final establishment of presbytery in Scotland in 1690, once more put an end to lay patronage, compensation being allowed to patrons for the loss they thereby sustained. The parliament, sympathizing with the hostility generally entertained against patronage, passed an Act "discharging, cassing, annulling, and making void the power of presenting ministers to vacant churches," and declaring, "that, in the case of the vacancy of any parish, the heritors of the said parish, being Protestants, and the elders, are to name and propose the person to the whole congregation, to be either approved or disapproved by them." The obvious intention of this Act was to abolish patronage entirely, to put an end to presentations, and to cause the voice of the people to be heard in the choice of ministers. To reconcile the lay patrons to denude themselves of their right in favour of the parish, the heritors and liferenters were held bound to pay to each of them the sum of 600 merks, or £33 6s. 8d. as an equivalent.

The treaty of Union between England and Scotland was fully completed and ratified in 1707. It was accompanied also with an Act of Security, in which the acts confirming the Confession of Faith and the Presbyterian form of church government were sanctioned and established, "to continue without any alteration to the people of this land in all succeeding generations." Notwithstanding the assurance thus solemnly given to the people of Scotland, that the constitution of their church should remain intact in all time coming, only a few years elapsed when a heavy blow was aimed at its integrity and usefulness. In the parliament of England in 1712, a bill for the restoration of church patronage in Scotland was introduced, hurried through both Houses with the utmost haste, and passed. The commissioners of the church had in their address and representation to the queen on the subject, declared the passing of the Patronage Act to be "contrary to our church constitution, so well secured by the treaty of Union." This address the Assembly embodied in an act, thus adopting its sentiments as those of the whole church. The utmost unanimity has prevailed among historians in disapproving of this famous Act of Queen Anne. Bishop Burnet very plainly declares its design to have been "to weaken and undermine the" Scottish "establishment." And Sir Walter Scott with equal candour states his own impressions on the subject. "There is no doubt," says he, "that the restoration of the right of lay patrons in Queen Anne's time, was designed to separate the ministers of the Kirk from the people who could not be supposed to be equally attached to, or influenced by, a minister who held his living by the gift of a great man, as by one who was chosen by their own free voice,—and to render them more dependent on the nobility and gentry, amongst whom, much more than the common people, the sentiments of Jacobitism predominated." The first General Assembly which met after the passing of this memorable Act, ratified and embodied in specific acts the representations which their commissioners made when in London, and issued particular instructions to the Commission of Assembly to use all dutiful and proper means for obtaining redress of these grievances,—instructions which were repeated to every succeeding Commission till the year 1784, when they were omitted, and have never since been renewed. It is somewhat remarkable that though the rights of patrons were restored by the 10th of Queen Anne, the exercise of these rights was found to be so unpopular that ministers were generally settled, till after the year 1730, not according to the Patronage Act of 1712, but in the manner prescribed by the Act of King William in 1690. About this time, however, an attempt was made to exercise the right which Queen Anne's Act conferred upon the patron, and while the people resisted with violence, "the church courts," says Mr. Stewart, "although they could not entirely disregard the law, contrived in many instances to render it ineffectual, and sanctioned by their authority the prevailing prejudices against it. They admitted it as an uncontrovertible principle in Presbyterian church government, that a presentee, although perfectly well qualified, and unexceptionable in life and doctrine, was nevertheless inadmissible to his clerical office, till the concurrence of the people who were to be under his ministry had been regularly ascertained. The form of expressing this concurrence was by the subscription of a paper termed a Call; which was considered as a step so indispensable towards constituting the pastoral relation, that the church courts, when dissatisfied with it, as an expression of the general wishes of the parish, sometimes set aside the presentee altogether; and when they did authorize a settlement, proceeded in a manner which sufficiently implied a greater respect for the call than for the presentation. Many of the clergy, considering it as a matter of conscience not to take any share in the settlement of an obnoxious presentee, refused on such occasions to carry into execution the orders of their superiors; and such was the temper of the times, that the leading men of the Assembly, although they wished to support the law of the land, found themselves obliged to have recourse to expedients; imposing slight censures on the disobedient, and appointing special committees (whom it was found sometimes necessary to protect by a military force), to discharge the duties which the others had declined."

It was in this state of matters that the principles of the moderate party in the General Assembly, headed by Principal Robertson, obtained the ascendancy in that venerable court, and from this time a steady and uniform support was given for many years to the law of patronage. But all the while the form of the call was carefully maintained, although it was reduced to an empty and almost unmeaning form. At length, however, after Principal Robertson had resigned the leadership of the General Assembly, and he had been succeeded by Dr. Hill of St. Andrews, the call began to be considered by various members of the moderate section of the church as incompatible with patronage, and therefore nugatory. The abolition of the call, however, was too strong a step to be taken by the church, and accordingly it continues, in form at least, down to the present day.

During the years 1783 and 1784 patronage engaged the chief attention of the General Assembly, in consequence of a number of overtures having been presented on the subject. Dr. Hill moved the rejection of these overtures "as inexpedient, ill-founded, and dangerous to the peace and welfare of the church." Not only was this motion carried, but another to omit the clause in the instructions annually given to the Commission, which required them to apply for redress from the grievance of patronage. The omission of this clause was nothing less than a tacit admission that the church had ceased to regard patronage as a grievance, and was prepared to yield to it an uncomplaining submission. The law of patronage was now enforced with unflinching firmness by the dominant party in the General Assembly, and the people generally began to see that opposition or even remonstrance was of no avail. From that time for many a long year the law of patronage continued in full and uncontrolled operation, while the aversion of the people generally to its unrestricted exercise seemed every year to become stronger and more inveterate.

Soon after the commencement of the present century the influence and numbers of the moderate party began gradually to decline, and in process of years the evangelical or popular party, as they are called, became an important section in the General Assembly. A decided change now took place in the spirit and policy of the proceedings of that venerable court. The subject of patronage came to be discussed. Motion after motion was made, with the view of inducing the Assembly to declare patronage a grievance, and to adopt measures for its removal. But these motions were rejected by very large majorities. The subject of the total abolition of patronage had occupied much of the attention of the public, and an anti-patronage society had been formed in the year 1825, which, by public meetings and occasional publications, excited no small interest both among churchmen and dissenters. The discussion of the subject, both within and without the church courts, led to a very general desire that some modification of patronage should take place; and hence originated a proposal to effect a constitutional limitation of patronage, by restoring the call to a proper degree of efficiency. At the meeting of the General Assembly in 1832, overtures embodying this proposal were laid on the table from three synods and eight presbyteries; but by a majority of forty-two the Assembly decided that it was unnecessary and inexpedient to adopt the measures recommended in the overtures. This refusal, on the part of the Assembly, to entertain the subject, only tended to increase the excitement of the public mind, and in the following year (1833) not less than forty-five overtures on calls were laid on the table of the Assembly. A very long and able debate ensued, in which the question in all its bearings was fully discussed, and although a positive majority of twenty ministers voted in favour of the restoration of the efficiency of the call, such was the preponderance of elders opposed to it, that the motion was again rejected by a majority of twelve. In the Assembly of 1834, however, the relative strength of the parties was found to be materially changed, and a motion was passed by a majority of forty-six, declaring that the disapproval of a majority of male heads of families being communicants should be deemed sufficient ground for the presbytery rejecting the person so disapproved of. This act on calls is generally known by the name of the Veto Act, and its chief characteristic was, that it put a check upon the law of patronage, not by giving a direct efficiency to the positive call of a majority of the people, but by rendering the dissent of the people conclusive against the presentee.

From the passing of the Veto Act dates an important era in the history of patronage in Scotland. Grave doubts were entertained by many whether it was within the power of the church to take such a step, and only a few months elapsed when a case occurred which tested its legality. A presentation to the parish of Auchterarder by the Earl of Kinnoul having been rejected by the presbytery of the bounds on the ground of the dissent of the people, the question was introduced into the courts of law. Several similar cases occurred which led to the same step being taken both by patrons and presentees. The result was, that the Veto Act was declared by the civil courts to be illegal, and ultra vires. This decision, along with several instances which had occurred of alleged interference with the spiritual independence of the church, produced the disruption of 1843, and the formation of the Free Church of Scotland. Immediately after, the Established Church repealed the Veto Act, and thus the law of patronage maintained its former position in the statute-book of the land. It was felt, however, by many that some definite expression should be given of the mind of the legislature as to the relation which existed between patronage and the call, which were in danger of being regarded, in consequence of all that had happened, as being necessarily incompatible, and indeed antagonistic. Hence originated Lord Aberdeen's bill, commonly called the Scotch Benefices Act, which declared that the presbytery shall pay regard to the character and number of objectors, and have power to judge whether, in all the circumstances of the case, it be for edification that the settlement shall take place. This declaratory enactment seemed for some time to be regarded by the Established Church as thoroughly satisfactory, but several cases having occurred in which the General Assembly declined to give effect to the objections of a reclaiming majority in a parish, a movement has again commenced on the part of a number of the lay-members of the church, who have memorialized the church courts with a view to have the question again considered, whether it may not be expedient to give complete efficiency to the positive call of a majority of the people. It remains to be seen whether the ecclesiastical courts will revive the discussion of a point of such serious import, while the generation still lives which retains a vivid remembrance of those eventful years in the church's history, reaching from 1834 to 1843.

PAULIANISTS. See SAMOSATENIANS.

PAULICIANS, a sect which arose in the seventh century in Armenia. They are said to have been a branch of the Manicheans, and to have been descended from a woman in the province of Samosata named Callinike, who lived about the fourth century, and whose two sons, Paulus and Johannes, were the first founders of the sect. But it is not improbable that the sect, drawing a distinction between the teaching of Peter and that of Paul, and having a decided preference to the latter, and even adopting it as the ground work of their own teaching, derived their name from this circumstance. The principal founder, however, of the Paulicians is considered by Neander as having been Constantine, who flourished toward the end of the seventh century, and chiefly during the reign of the Emperor Constantine Pogonatus. The perusal of the New Testament, more especially of the epistles of Paul, made a deep impression upon this man's mind, and gave a new direction to his whole thoughts and feelings, and impelled him to act the part of a reformer, and to seek after the restoration of the primitive apostolic church. For twenty-seven years, that is, from 657 to 684, did Constantine labour with untiring energy to propagate the principles of his sect. At length the emperor commenced a violent persecution of the Paulicians, and at his instigation Constantine was stoned to death by his own disciples, headed by his adopted son, Justus, who was the first to raise his hand against him. A few years after the sect was again called to endure a severe persecution at the hands of the Emperor Justinian II. In the reign of Leo the Isaurian, the Paulicians were once more accused at Constantinople, but they are alleged to have experienced on that occasion the favour and protection of the emperor.

At the commencement of the ninth century the sect was beginning to degenerate through the influence of false teachers and the effect of internal dissensions, but about this period it received a fresh impulse from the labours of Sergius, who set himself to revive the body of religionists with whom, from his early youth, he had been connected. His enemies accused him, but in all probability without foundation, of assuming the name of the Paraclete and the Holy Ghost. The Paulicians were not unlikely to give rise to this absurd accusation from the circumstance that they approached, in some points of doctrine, to the ancient Manicheans, with whom they agreed in maintaining a dualistic theory. But with this single exception the Manichean and Paulician systems were at utter variance with each other. "According to the Paulician system," says Neander, "the entire material world proceeds from the Demiurgos, who formed it out of the matter which is the source of all evil. The soul of man, however, is of heavenly origin, and has a germ of life answering to the being of the highest God. Thus human nature consists of two antagonist principles; but this union of the soul with the body, of a different nature, and in which all sinful desires have their root; this its banishment into the sensual world, a world which owes its existence to an altogether different creator, and in which it is held captive, cannot possibly be the work of the supreme and perfect God. It must be the work, therefore, of that hostile Demiurgos, which has sought to draw the germ of divine life into his own empire, and there to hold it prisoner. According to this account we must ascribe to the Paulicians an anthropogony and anthropology corresponding to these principles. They must either have deduced their theory from the doctrine of the pre-existence of the soul, connecting it with the supposition that the Demiurgos is perpetually striving to entice the souls which belong to a higher sphere into the material world; or, like the old Syrian Gnostics, they must have believed that the Demiurgos was able to drive from its original seat the germ of divine life into the visible form of the first man, created after the type of a higher world; that this germ is ever in process of development; and that hence is the beginning of human souls."

The Paulicians believed in an original relationship of the soul to God, and an enduring union with him which the Demiurgos could not destroy. Consistently with their views they could not ascribe a material body to the Redeemer, or one capable of actual suffering, and hence they can scarcely be said to have held the doctrine of an atonement through the sufferings of Christ. They desired to restore both in life and doctrine the simplicity of the apostolic age, and they called themselves, therefore, the Catholic Church and Christians. "It was the wish of these people," to quote again from Neander, "to restore an apostolic simplicity to the church. Thus they asserted, that among the varieties of outward forms and ceremonies in the dominant church, the true life of piety was lost; and they contended against every species of trust in outward things, especially the sacraments. They carried this opposition so far, that they rejected altogether the formal celebration of baptism, and the Lord's Supper. Hence they argued, that Christ never intended to institute a water baptism for all times; but that by this baptism he had signified a spiritual baptism, in which, by means of his doctrine, that living water, he imparts himself to all mankind. In the same manner they also believed, that the eating of the flesh, and drinking of the blood of Christ, consisted only in a lively communion with him by his doctrine, by his word, which are his true flesh and blood. It was not of material bread, or material wine, that he spoke, as his flesh and blood, but of his words, which ought to be for souls, what bread and wine are for the body."

The Paulicians, rejecting the Old Testament from the canon of Scripture, made their appeal on every point solely to the New Testament, with the exception, however, of the Epistles of Peter. They put away from them all the outward religious ceremonies then in use, and even baptism and the Lord's Supper they regarded as wholly spiritual acts. After the death of Sergius, which occurred in A. D. 835, no single individual was elected to preside over them, but they were governed by a council of their teachers. They patiently submitted to persecution of every kind for a time, but at length, driven to madness by the cruel treatment of the Empress Theodora, who had resolved to exterminate them, they flew to arms in self-defence. Military officers had been sent throughout Armenia with orders to massacre every member of the obnoxious sect, and on this occasion no fewer than 100,000 are reported to have fallen victims to this indiscriminate carnage. A body of nearly 5,000 Paulicians, however, escaped from this bloody outrage, and found an asylum in Melitine, a province of Armenia, then under the dominion of the Saracens, in conjunction with whom they often committed serious depredations upon the Greek Empire, and laid waste the provinces of Asia Minor. In consequence of a treaty formed with the Emperor Zimisceus, in A. D. 970, a considerable number of the Paulicians removed to Thrace, where a colony of them had been formed even in the eighth century. Under the name of EUCYTES (which see), they had become numerous among the Bulgarians, and thence they extended themselves into other parts of Europe. Small communities of BOGOMILES (which see), as they were also called, were found among the Bulgarians throughout the Middle Ages, and Paulicians, under many changes, have continued to exist in and around Philippopolis and in the valleys of the Haemus until the present day.

But it was in Asia, and more especially in Armenia and the adjacent countries, where the sect at first originated, that it continued to maintain its ground with peculiar vigour. Here, however, the Paulician doctrines underwent considerable modification, being mixed up with some of the opinions and tendencies of the Oriental PARSEES (which see). There had long previously existed in Armenia a sect called the AKI-VURDIS (which see), or children of the sun, a name which they derived from their worship of that luminary. But in addition to this older sect, the Paulicians, having imbibed some of the tenets and even practices of the Parsees, gave rise to a new sect called the THONDRACIANS (which see), from the village Thondrac, in which their founder settled. This modification of the Paulician system arose from an attempt to make a new combination of Parseeism and Christianity. The Paulicians thus mingled up with other Oriental sects, existed in Armenia till the middle of the eleventh century; and thence they spread into other countries, particularly the adjacent provinces of the Roman Empire, partly scattered by persecution, and partly desirous to diffuse their peculiar opinions.

PAULINIANS, a name sometimes applied by the Arians to the ancient Christians, from Paulinus, bishop of Antioch.

PAUPERES CATHOLICI (Lat. Poor Catholics), a Romish order which was formed in the twelfth century, and confirmed by Pope Innocent III. It consisted of Waldenses, who had conformed to the dominant church. Some ecclesiastics from the south of France, who had once been Waldensians, took the lead in the formation of this order, particularly a person named Durand de Osea. It maintained itself for some time in Catalonia. The design of this society is thus described by Neander: "The ecclesiastics and better educated were to busy themselves with preaching, exposition of the Bible, religious instruction, and combating the sects; but all the laity, who were not qualified to exhort the people and combat the sects, should occupy houses by themselves, where they were to live in a pious and orderly manner. This spiritual society, so remodelled, should endeavour to bring about a reunion of all the Waldenses with the church. As the Waldenses held it unchristian to shed blood and to swear, and the presiding officers of the new spiritual society begged the Pope that those who were disposed to join them should be released from all obligation of complying with customs of this sort, the Pope granted, at their request, that all such as joined them should not be liable to be called upon for military service against Christians, nor to take an oath in civil processes; adding, indeed, the important clause,—so far as this rule could be observed in a healthful manner without injury or offence to others; and, especially, with the permission of the secular lords. In Italy and Spain, also, the zeal of these representatives of the church tendency among the Waldenses seemed to meet with acceptance. The Pope gladly lent a hand in promoting its more general spread, and he was inclined to grant to those who came over to it, when they had once become reconciled with the church, various marks of favour. But he insisted on unconditional submission; and refused to enter into any conditional engagements." The principles of the Waldenses were too firmly rooted to be seriously affected by the society of the Pauperes Catholicæ, and, accordingly, it is said to have gradually died away.

PAUPERES CHRISTI (Lat. The Poor of Christ), a Roman Catholic order which arose in the twelfth century, formed by a zealous ecclesiastic called Robert of Arbriscelles, on whom Pope Urban II. had conferred the dignity of apostolic preacher. The religious society termed Pauperes Christi was composed of persons of both sexes, and of ecclesiastics and laymen who wished to learn the way of spiritual living under the direction of the founder of the order.

PAUPERES DE LOMBARDIA (Lat. Poor Men of Lombardy), a name applied in the twelfth century to the WALDENSES (which see), in the north of Italy, derived from the province in which they were chiefly found.

PAUSARI, an appellation given to the priests of Isis (which see), at Rome, because in their religious processions they were accustomed to make pauses at certain places where they engaged in singing hymns and performing other sacred rites.

PAVAN, a Hindu deity who is believed to preside over the winds. He was the father of HANUMAN (which see), the ape-god.

PAVOR, a personification of Fear, worshipped by the ancient Romans, as a companion of Mars, the god of war. The worship of this deity is said to have been instituted by Tullus Hostilius.

PAVORI, priests among the ancient Romans who conducted the worship of PAVOR (which see).

PAX, a personification of Peace, worshipped by the ancient Romans. A festival was celebrated annually in honour of this goddess on the 30th of April.

PAX, a small tablet of silver or ivory, or some other material, by means of which the kiss of peace was circulated through Christian congregations in ancient times. It was customary in primitive times for Christians, in their public assemblies, to give one another a holy kiss, or a kiss of peace. But when this practice was discontinued in consequence of some appearance of scandal which had arisen out of it, the pax was introduced instead, consisting of a small tablet which first received the kiss of the officiating minister, after which it was presented to the deacon, and by him again to the people, each of whom kissed it in turn, thus transmitting throughout the whole assembly the symbol of Christian love and peace.

PAX VOBIS (Lat. Peace be to you), an ordinary salutation among the ancient Christians. It was addressed by the bishop or pastor to the people at his first entrance into the church—a practice which is frequently mentioned by Chrysostom, who derives it from apostolic practice. The same form of salutation was employed in commencing all the offices of the church, but more especially by the reader when commencing the reading of the Scriptures. The custom continued in the African churches until the third council of Carthage forbade its use by the reader. This form of salutation, "Peace be with you," to which the people usually answered, "And with thy spirit," was commonly pronounced by a bishop, presbyter, or deacon in the church, as Chrysostom informs us. It was customary to repeat the "Pax Vobis" before beginning the sermon, and at least four times in the course of the communion service. It was used also when dismissing the congregation at the close of divine worship. The deacon sent the people away from the house of God with the solemn prayer, "Go in peace." In the Liturgy of the Church of England a similar salutation occurs, "The Lord be with you," to which the people reply, "And with thy spirit."

PEACE. See PAX.

PEACE-OFFERINGS, sacrifices or oblations among the ancient Hebrews, which were intended to express gratitude to God for his goodness. They were divided into three classes, thank-offerings, free-will-offerings, and offerings for vows. The first were expressive of thankfulness for mercies received; the second by way of devotion; and the third with the view of obtaining future blessings. The peace-offerings of the Hebrews were either offered by the whole congregation, or by particular individuals. The first consisted of two lambs offered at the Feast of Pentecost. The second sort were of three kinds: (1.) Those which were offered without bread—a species of peace-offerings of a festive nature at the three solemn festivals. (2.) Those which were offered with bread, that is, with unleavened cakes mingled with oil. These were peace-offerings of thanksgiving. (3.) The ram of the NAZARITE (which see). The south side of the court of the Temple was the usual place in which all peace-offerings were sacrificed, and the blood was sprinkled round about the altar. The offerer might eat his share of the sacrifice in any clean place in Jerusalem; and even, if he chose, in the Temple. The peace-offering of thanksgiving was eaten the same day; but a vow or freewill-offering might be eaten on the following day. The animals used in this kind of sacrifices were bullocks, rams, heifers, ewes, or goats; birds were not sacrificed in this way. The flesh of the sacrifice was divided between the priest and the offerer; the priest receiving for his part the breast and the right shoulder, while the offerer had all the rest. The number of peace-offerings sacrificed every year was very great.

PECTORAL. See BREAST-PLATE.

PECILIARS, a term used in England to denote parishes and places exempted from the jurisdiction of the ordinary of the diocese in which they are situated. Before the Reformation, the Pope exempted these places from the jurisdiction of the bishop of the diocese, and this peculiarity was never changed.

PECUNIA, a god worshipped among the ancient Romans as presiding over money.

PEDILAVIUM (Lat. Pes, pedis, a foot, and lavare, to wash), the ceremony of washing the feet of thirteen pilgrims, in imitation of our blessed Lord washing the feet of the apostles. The Romish Church practise this ceremony on MAUNDY THURSDAY (which see), in the following manner. After reading John xiii. the gospel for the day, the prelate or superior strips off his pluvial, and is girded with a towel by the deacon and subdeacon. Thus girded he proceeds to the ceremony of foot-washing. Those whose feet are to be washed being arranged in a line, the clerks supplying the bason and water, the prelate kneels and washes the right foot of each, one by one, the subdeacon holding it for him, and the deacon supplying the towel, he wipes and kisses the foot. While this rite is in course of being performed, several antiphones, versicles, and other pieces of sacred music are chanted. All being washed, the prelate washes his hands, and wipes them with another towel; then returning to the place where he was before, he resumes the pluvial, and standing with his head uncovered, says the Paternoster secretly, with some versicles and responsories aloud, and then concludes with the following prayer: "O Lord, we beseech thee, be present to this office of our service, and because thou didst vouchsafe to wash the feet of thy disciples, despise not the works of thy hands, which thou hast commanded us to observe; that like as here outward defilements are washed away for us, and by us; so the inward sins of us all may be washed away by thee. The which vouchsafe thyself to grant, who livest, &c. R. Amen."

The Pedilavium is practised by the Moravian Brethren. Formerly it was observed by some congregations of the Brethren before every celebration of the communion. At present it is practised only at certain seasons, as on Maundy Thursday by the whole congregation, and on some other occasions in the choirs. It is performed by each sex separately, accompanied with the singing of suitable verses, treating of our being washed from sin by the blood of Christ. The Glassites in Scotland also observe the Pedilavium.

PEEPAL TREE, an extraordinary tree of the fig tribe which grows in Hindustan. It is thus described by Mrs. Speir, in her 'Life in Ancient India': "The leaf is heart-shaped, with a long taper point and a slender leaf-stalk, rustling in the wind. The roots of the peepal spread horizontally near the surface of the ground, and old peepal-trees often exhibit a great extent of bare roots, owing to the ground having been washed away; the trunks also lose their roundness with age, and become so full of ridges as to look like several trunks united: this tree is remarkable for the facility with which its seeds germinate, springing up in every crevice of brickwork, to which, if not speedily removed, their rapid growth causes great destruction. In India, in consequence, ruins and the peepal are as much associated in the mind as ruins and ivy are in England. And not only in brickwork does it spring unbidden, but its sprouts are often seen on other trees, and especially on the summit of the palmyra, where its berries or seeds are frequently dropped by birds. The peepal then sends its roots down outside the palmyra stem, round which they gradually form a case, until at length nothing is seen of the palmyra except the head, which appears to be growing in the midst of a peepal tree. When this occurs the joint tree becomes a very sacred object, modern Hindus regarding it as a divine marriage. Trees in India also grow together by simple contact, and trees half peepal and half banyan, or half peepal and half mango, are by no means uncommon; and in some cases the union is even purposely effected,—a notion at present prevailing in the central parts of India, that the fruit of a new mango plantation must not be tasted until an imaginary marriage has been performed between the mangoes and some other tree; and money must be spent and feasting carried on to as great an extent as if the marriage were a real one."

PEGASIDES, a name given to the Muses, as well as to other nymphs of wells and brooks.

PEGASUS, according to the earlier Greek writers, the thundering horse of Zeus, but according to the later the horse of Eos. He is represented as a winged horse, and is said by his hoof to have caused the well Hippocrene to spring forth. Hence the Muses who drank of this inspiring well are sometimes termed Pegasides.

PEGOMANCY (Gr. pege, a fountain, and mantia, divination), a species of divination anciently practised with water drawn from a fountain. See HYDROMANCY.

PEIRITHOUS, one of the LAPITHÆ (which see), who was worshipped anciently at Athens, along with Theseus, as a hero.

PELAGIANS, a heretical sect which arose in the commencement of the fifth century. Its founder, by name Pelagius, is alleged to have been a British monk, and there is an English legend that his real name was Morgan. Neither the place nor the date of his nativity, however, can be ascertained. His first appearance in history is in the character of a rigid ascetic resident at Rome. Animated by no desire to form a new doctrinal system, he seems to have been chiefly anxious to oppose certain practical errors then prevalent, more especially the tendency to a worldly spirit, which was so prominent a feature of the character of Christians in his day. By this view of matters his theological views were to a great extent modified and determined. "Hence he was of the opinion," as Neander remarks, "that in all moral exhortations the great point to be aimed at was, to make men clearly see that they were in want of none of the faculties necessary for fulfilling the divine commands; to bring them to a conscious sense of the power bestowed on them by the Creator for accomplishing all good ends, as he says that he himself was accustomed to pursue this method in his exhortatory writings. Hence he appealed to the examples of virtue exhibited among the Pagans, in proof of how much nature, left to itself, could effect even among the heathen; and argued that, with the new aids and advantages possessed by Christians, the same nature would be able to do still more. On this principle, and from this point of view, he denied that there was any such thing as a corruption of human nature, which had grown out of the fall. Such a doctrine appeared to him but a means of encouraging moral indolence—a means of excuse supplied to the hands of vicious men. The question which from the first had so occupied the profound mind of Augustin—the question concerning the origin of sin in man—could not be attended with so much difficulty to the more superficial mind of Pelagius. This was no enigma for him; it seemed to him a thing perfectly natural that there should be moral evil. The necessary condition to the existence of moral good is the possibility of evil. Evil and good are to be derived alike from the free-will, which either yields to the seductions of sense, or overcomes them."

At Rome Pelagius became acquainted with Celestius, who, being of a kindred spirit with himself, renounced his profession as an advocate and embraced the monastic life, desirous of devoting himself to a strict observance of all the precepts and counsels of Christ. In A. D. 411 the two friends left Rome in company, and passed to Africa, where they took up their abode at Carthage. The rumour, however, that they had become infected with theological errors went before them, and reached the ears of Augustin, who lost no time in summoning a council on the subject. Six heretical propositions were set forth as held by Celestius, all of which, however, were grounded on the idea, that the sin of Adam had injured only himself, not the whole human family; whence was drawn the conclusion, that children still came into the world in the same state in which Adam found himself before the fall. Celestius endeavoured to obviate the imputation of heresy by alleging that the points in dispute had never been formally decided by the church, and, therefore, ought to be regarded as open questions. But such evasions were of no avail, and, accordingly, he was excluded from church fellowship.

Pelagius having quitted Africa, and passed to Palestine in A. D. 415, the controversy was renewed in that country, and Jerome, who was then resident at Bethlehem, keenly opposed the Pelagian doctrine concerning free-will, and concerning the freedom from corruption of human nature. On this latter point Pelagius was accused of maintaining that man is without sin, and can easily obey the Divine commandments if he chooses. The subject was discussed in a synod over which Bishop John of Jerusalem presided, when the simple statement of Pelagius, that he acknowledged the Divine assistance to be necessary in order that a man might be enabled to obey the law of God, was received as a satisfactory explanation. The opponents of Pelagius, however, determined to renew the assault before another bishop and a still more numerous assembly. The same year, accordingly, a synod was assembled at Diospolis in Palestine, under the presidency of Eulogius, bishop of Cæsarea. This council also, like the former one, was ready to acquit Pelagius, provided only that grace and free-will were both maintained—a point which of course was readily conceded. He agreed to condemn all that taught the contrary doctrines on condition that he was allowed to condemn them as fools, not as heretics. The result of the whole matter was, that Pelagius was recognized as a member of the Catholic Church.

Thus by the verdict of two Oriental church assemblies was Pelagius acquitted of the charge of heresy. Augustin and the North African Church, by way of counterpoise, appealed to the Roman Bishop Innocent for his opinion on the disputed points; Pelagius and Celestius also appealed to the same quarter. The decision of Innocent was condemnatory of the Pelagian doctrines; but dying soon after, he was succeeded in the papal chair by Zosimus; and Celestius having appeared in person at Rome, and presented a confession of faith, plausibly drawn up, the new Roman bishop despatched two letters to the North African bishops, in which he gave the most decided testimony to the orthodoxy of Pelagius and Celestius, reproving their accusers in the strongest terms, for raising a controversy on questions which had no connection whatever with the faith. On receiving these letters from the Roman bishop, the North African bishops summoned a council at Carthage, which unanimously protested against the decision. Zosimus, startled at the resistance thus offered to his authority, agreed to suspend the final decision of the matter until after further examination. But without longer delay the North African bishops held an assembly at Carthage in A. D. 418, at which nine canons were framed in opposition to Pelagianism.

The doctrines of this heretical system are thus sketched by Walsh: "1. Men as they now come into the world are, in respect to their powers and abilities, in the same state in which Adam was created. 2. Adam sinned, but his sinning harmed no one but himself. 3. Human nature therefore is not changed by the fall, and death is not a punishment for sin; but Adam would have died had he not apostatized. For death is inseparable from our nature, and the same is true of the pains of child-birth, diseases, and outward evils, particularly in children. 4. Much less is the guilt of Adam's sin imputed to his offspring, for God would be unjust if he imputed to us the actions of others. 5. Such imputation cannot be proved by the fact that Christ has redeemed infants; for, this redemption is to be understood of their heirship to the kingdom of heaven, from which an heirship to another's guilt will not follow. 6. Neither does the baptism of infants prove such an imputation; for they thereby obtain the kingdom of heaven, which Christ has promised only to baptized persons. 7. When children die without baptism they are not therefore damned. They are indeed excluded from the kingdom of heaven, but not from eternal blessedness. For the Pelagians held to a threefold state after death; damnation for sinners, the kingdom of heaven for baptized Christians who live a holy life and for baptized children, and eternal life for unbaptized children and for unbaptized adults who live virtuous lives. 8. Much less is human nature depraved in consequence of the fall of Adam. There is therefore no hereditary sin. 9. For though it may be granted that Adam is so far the author of sin, as he was the first that sinned and by his example has seduced others, yet this is not to be understood of a propagation of sin by generation. 10. This supposed propagation of sin is the less admissible, because it would imply a propagation of souls, which is not true. 11. Neither can such a propagation be maintained without impeaching the justice of God, introducing unconditional necessity, and destroying our freedom. 12. It is true there are in men sinful propensities, in particular the propensity for sexual intercourse, but these are not sins. 13. If sin was propagated by natural generation, and every motion of the sinful propensities and every desire therefore were sinful, then the marriage state would be sinful. 14. As man has ability to sin, so has he also not only ability to discern what is good, but likewise power to desire it and to perform it. And this is the freedom of the will, which is so essential to man that he cannot lose it. 15. The grace which the Scriptures represent as the source of morally good actions in man, Pelagius understood to denote various things. For he understood the word (a) of the whole constitution of our nature and especially of the endowment of free will; (b) of the promulgation of the divine law; (c) of the forgiveness of past sins without any influence on the future conduct; (d) of the example of Christ's holy life, which he called the grace of Christ; (e) of the internal change in the understanding whereby the truth is recognized, which he called grace and also the assistance of the Holy Spirit; (f) and sometimes grace with him was equivalent to baptism and blessedness. 16. Man is as capable of securing salvation by the proper use of his powers, as of drawing on himself damnation by the misuse of them. 17. And therefore God has given men a law, and this law prescribes nothing impossible. 18. God requires from men a perfect personal obedience to his law. 19. Actions originating from ignorance or forgetfulness are not sinful. 20. So also natural propensities or the craving of things sinful is not of itself sinful. 21. Therefore perfect personal obedience to the law on the part of men is practicable, through the uncorruptness of the powers of nature. 22. And by grace (consisting in external divine aids, the right use of which depends on men's free will) good works are performed. They did not deny all internal change in men by grace, but they confined it solely to the understanding, and controverted all internal change of the will. They also limited the necessity of this grace by maintaining that it was not indispensable to all men, and that it only facilitated the keeping of God's commandments. 23. This possibility of performing good works by the free use of our natural powers they endeavoured to prove, by the existence of virtuous persons among the pagans; and likewise—24. From the saints mentioned in the Old Testament, whom they divided into two classes—the first from Adam to Moses, who like the pagans had only natural grace; the second, from Moses to Christ, who had the grace of the law. Some of the saints who had the law were all their lifetime without sin, others sinned indeed, but being converted they ceased to sin and yielded a perfect obedience to the law. 25. The grace whereby perfect obedience becomes possible, is a consequence of precedent good works; 26. and such obedience is absolutely necessary to salvation. 27. Sins originating from a misuse of human freedom and continued by imitation and by custom were forgiven, under the Old Testament solely on account of good works, and under the New Testament through the grace of Christ. 28. Their idea of the way of salvation then was this: A man who has sinned converts himself—that is, he leaves off sinning and this by his own powers. He believes on Christ—that is, he embraces his doctrines. He is now baptized, and on account of this baptism all his previous sins are forgiven him, and he is without sin. He has the instructions and the example of Christ, whereby he is placed in a condition to render perfect obedience to the divine law. This he can do if he will, and he can either withstand all temptations or fall from grace. 29. Moreover they admitted conditional decrees, the condition of which was either foreseen good works or foreseen sin."

Through the influence of the North African bishops the Roman emperors were prevailed upon to issue several edicts against Pelagius and Coelestius, and their adherents. The Roman bishop Zosimus, perceiving that the civil authorities took so decided a part, and that a strong anti-Pelagian party had arisen, issued a circular or letter, in which he pronounced sentence of condemnation on Pelagius and Coelestius, and declared himself on the doctrines of the corruption of human nature, of grace, and of baptism, in accordance with the views of the North African Church. This circular letter was sent throughout the Western churches, and all bishops were required to subscribe it on pain of deprivation, and even excommunication. Eighteen bishops of Italy, who favoured Pelagius and his doctrines, were in consequence subjected to this severe penalty; and down to the middle of the fifth century, various offshoots from the Pelagian party were found in different parts of Italy. The eighteen bishops who had thus been deposed and driven from Italy for favouring Pelagian doctrine, chiefly repaired to Constantinople, where, becoming mixed up to a certain extent with the Nestorians, they were condemned along with them at the general synod of Ephesus, A. D. 431.

The chief, and assuredly the ablest opponent of Pelagian doctrine was AUGUSTIN (which see), who, in several works which he published on the disputed points, defended the doctrines of grace and predestination with a power of argument so strong as to rank him justly among the most skilful polemic divines of which the Christian Church can boast. In the latter part of his life, Augustin was engaged in a keen controversy with the Semi-Pelagians, a sect which arose in Gaul, and consisted of opponents of Augustin's doctrine of predestination, while the defenders of that doctrine were termed PREDESTINARIANS (which see).

PELANI, a sort of cakes used anciently in Athens in making libations to the gods. They were substituted instead of animal sacrifices by the command of Cærops.

PELLERWOINEN, the god of plants among the Fins.

PELONIA, an ancient Roman deity who was believed to ward off the attacks of enemies.

PELOPEIA, a festival held annually at Elis among the ancient Greeks, in honour of Pelops, king of Pisa in Elis, from whom the Peloponnesus is supposed to have derived its name. His sanctuary stood in the grove Altis, where the young men annually scourged themselves in his honour. The magistrates of Elis also offered there a yearly sacrifice of a black ram.

PELORIA, a festival of the Pelasgi, in which they sacrificed to Jupiter Pelor. It partook of the nature of the SATURNALIA (which see).

PELUSIOTE (Gr. from pelos, mud, a name applied by the Origenists in the third century to the orthodox Christians, denoting that they were earthly, sensual, carnally-minded men, because they differed from them in their apprehension of spiritual and heavenly bodies.

PENANCE, the infliction of punishment for ecclesiastical offences. Its introduction into the Christian Church is to be dated from the earliest times. (See CENSURES, ECCLESIASTICAL.) The history of the Primitive Church, for the first three centuries, is full of information on this subject. The apostolical fathers very frequently treat of penance as a part of church discipline, as distinguished from the spiritual grace of penitence. Tertullian devoted an entire treatise to the subject of penitence, from which it would appear, that even so early as the second century a complete system of discipline and penance existed in the church. This discipline he describes as consisting in exhortations and censures, and tokens of Divine displeasure. Penance had a reference only to those who had been excluded from the communion of the church, and its object was the reconciliation of the offender with the church. It was inflicted only for open and scandalous offences, it being a recognized maxim with the ancient Christians, that the church takes no cognizance of secret sins. It belongs to a later age to arrogate the power of forgiving sins.

When a penitent wished to do public penance in the early ages of the Christian Church, he was formally granted penance by the imposition of hands. He was then obliged to appear in sackcloth, and as Eusebius adds, sprinkled with ashes. Nor were the greatest personages exempted from this ceremony, which continued through the whole course of their penance, and they were even clothed in this humiliating garb when they appeared before the church to receive formal absolution. While penitents were obliged to wear a mourning dress, some canons enjoined male penitents to cut off their hair, or shave their heads, and female penitents to wear a penitential veil, and either to cut off their hair or appear with it dishevelled and hanging loose about their shoulders. All classes of penitents exercised themselves in private abstinence, mortification, fasting, and self-denial.

The privilege of performing public penance in the church was only allowed once to all kinds of relapsers, but not oftener; and this practice prevailed not only during the three first centuries, but for some time after that period. The ordinary course of penance often extended to ten, fifteen, or twenty years, and for some sins throughout the whole course of the natural life, the penitent being only absolved and reconciled at the point of death. If, however, in the last-mentioned case, the penitent, after having been reconciled to the church, recovered from his sickness, he was obliged to perform the whole penance which would have been required of him had he not in the peculiar circumstances procured absolution. At an early period those who had been guilty of idolatry, adultery, and murder, were refused admission to the communion of the church even at the last hour.

According to the doctrines of the Romish Church, penance is a sacrament which is necessary in order to the remission of sins committed after baptism. In the Douay version of the Scriptures, accordingly, the term penance is generally substituted for repentance. Thus, "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish," is rendered, "Except ye do penance, ye shall all likewise perish;" and in Matt. iii. 2, we have not "Repent," but "Do penance, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand;" and again in Mark i. 4,

"John was in the desert baptizing and preaching the baptism of penance for the remission of sins."

The council of Trent thus lays down the doctrine of penance in its canons: "Whoever shall affirm that penance, as used in the Catholic Church, is not truly and properly a sacrament, instituted by Christ our Lord, for the benefit of the faithful, to reconcile them to God, as often as they shall fall into sin after baptism: let him be accursed."

"Whoever shall deny, that in order to the full and perfect forgiveness of sins, three acts are required of the penitent, constituting as it were the matter of the sacrament of penance, namely, contrition, confession, and satisfaction, which are called the three parts of penance; or shall affirm that there are only two parts of penance, namely, terrors wherewith the conscience is smitten by the sense of sin, and faith, produced by the gospel, or by absolution, whereby the person believes that his sins are forgiven him through Christ: let him be accursed."

The three parts of penance, then, according to the Romish Church, are contrition, confession, and satisfaction. Contrition is described as "a hearty sorrow for our sins, proceeding immediately from the love of God above all things, and joined with a firm purpose of amendment." But this spiritual grace is not absolutely necessary to the proper reception of the sacrament of penance; imperfect contrition, or as it is termed by Romish writers, attrition, will accomplish the object. Hence the council of Trent expressly declares, that "attrition, with the sacrament of penance, will place a man in a state of salvation."

The second part of penance is confession, or as it is usually designated, auricular confession, being the secret confession of sins to a priest. The confessional, accordingly, forms an essential accompaniment of every place of worship, and the council of Lateran decrees, "That every man and woman, after they come to years of discretion, shall privately confess their sins to their own priest, at least once a-year, and endeavour faithfully to perform the penance enjoined on them; and after this they shall come to the sacrament, at least at Easter, unless the priest, for some reasonable cause, judges it fit for them to abstain at that time. And whoever does not perform this, is to be excommunicated from the church; and if he die he is to be refused Christian burial." "Once a-year then, at least," says the Rev. Dr. Andrew Thomson, in an admirable Lecture on the Confessional, "the Roman Catholic, having used a variety of prescribed expedients, in order to bring his sins to his remembrance, and to produce a right state of mind for confessing, is required to approach the tribunal of penance, which is usually a small inclosed place situated in some obscure part of the cathedral or chapel. Imagine to yourselves a priest seated on this tribunal, to receive from a professing penitent a confession of all the sins he has committed since he last confessed,—sins the most secret, and, it may be, the most impure; while sitting there in the assumed character of the vicerent of the great God, he is regarded by the trembling devotee as invested with the tremendous power of binding his sin upon him, or of absolving him from its guilt. The penitent drawing near, is required to kneel down at the side of the priest, and having made the sign of the cross, with uncovered head, with closed eyes bent towards the earth, and uplifted hands, to ask the blessing of the priest in these words: 'Pray, father, give me your blessing, for I have sinned.' Having received the blessing, he next repeats the first part of the 'Confiteor,' as follows:—'I confess to Almighty God, to the blessed Virgin Mary, to blessed Michael the Archangel, to blessed John Baptist, to the holy apostles Peter and Paul, to all the saints, and to you, father, that I have sinned exceedingly in thought, word, and deed, through my fault, through my fault, through my most grievous fault.' The penitent then proceeds with a free and unreserved acknowledgment of all his sins, mentioning the aggravating circumstances with which they have been attended, and the number of times in which they have been committed; and should he through shame or fear seem to shrink from a full disclosure, the priest, directed by books that have been provided for use in the confessional, well skilled by practice, and by his knowledge of all the crimes and pollutions of his neighbourhood, can place the individual on a sort of intellectual rack, and by means of dexterously suggestive and ensnaring questions, prompt the reluctant memory, dispel the rising blush, or drive out the fear of man by the more tremendous terrors of the spiritual world, until at length the heart of the individual is laid open and exposed to his gaze. The process of confession being ended, the penitent now concludes with this, or the like form:—'For these, and all other my sins which I cannot at this present call to my remembrance, I am heartily sorry; purpose amendment for the future, and most humbly ask pardon of God, and penance and absolution of you, my ghostly father. Therefore I beseech the blessed Mary ever Virgin, blessed Michael the Archangel, blessed John Baptist, the holy apostles Peter and Paul, all the saints, and you, father, to pray to our Lord God for me.' Then listening humbly to the instructions of the priest, and meekly accepting the penance he prescribes, the priest, should he be satisfied with the confession, solemnly pronounces his absolution in these words: 'I absolve thee in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost;' and the penitent retires from the confessional imagining himself forgiven."

The third part of the sacrament of penance is satisfaction, in explanation of which we may quote the three following canons of the council of Trent "Whoever shall affirm, that the entire punishment is always remitted by God, together with the fault, and therefore that penitents need no other satisfaction than faith, whereby they apprehend Christ, who has made satisfaction for them : let him be accursed.

"Whoever shall affirm, that we can by no means make satisfaction to God for our sins, through the merits of Christ, as far as the temporal penalty is concerned, either by punishments inflicted on us by him, and patiently borne, or enjoined by the priest, though not undertaken of our own accord, such as fastings, prayers, alms, or other works of piety : and therefore that the best penance is nothing more than a new life : let him be accursed.

"Whoever shall affirm, that the satisfactions by which penitents redeem themselves from sin through Christ Jesus, are no part of the service of God, but, on the contrary, human traditions, which obscure the doctrine of grace, and the true worship of God, and the benefits of the death of Christ : let him be accursed."

According to the Catechism of the council of Trent, "satisfaction is the full payment of a debt," or, in other words, the compensation made by man to God by doing something in atonement for the sins which he has committed. Dens, in his 'System of Divinity,' divides penances into three classes, vindictive, medicinal, or curative, and preservative. All satisfactory works he regards as included under the three kinds, prayer, fasting, and alms. "The following," says this Romish divine, "can be enjoined under the head of prayer, once, or oftener, either for many days or weeks ; namely, (1.) To say five paternosters and five Ave Marias, in memory of the five wounds of Christ, either with bended knees or outstretched arms, or before a crucifix. (2.) To recite the Rosary, or Litanies of the blessed Virgin Mary, or of the saints, &c. (3.) To read the psalm Miserere, or the seven penitential psalms. (4.) To hear mass, or praises, or preaching. (5.) To read a chapter in Thomas à Kempis. (6.) To visit churches, to pray before the tabernacle. (7.) At stated hours, in the morning, evening, during the day, or as often as they hear the sound of the clock, to renew orally, or in the heart, ejaculatory prayers, acts of contrition or charity : such as, 'I love thee, O Lord, above all things : 'I detest all my sins ; I am resolved to sin no more : ' O Jesus, crucified for me, have mercy on me ! &c. (8.) At an appointed day, to confess again, or, at any rate, to return to the Confessor.

"To fasting may be referred whatever pertains to the mortification of the body : so that a perfect or partial fast can be enjoined. (1.) Let him fast (quia sexti) on the sixth holyday, or oftener. (2.) Let him fast only to the middle of the day. (3.) Let him not drink before noon, or in the afternoon, unless at dinner or supper, though he may be thirsty ; let him abstain from wine and from cerevisia forti. (4.) Let him eat less, and take in the evening only half the quantity. (5.) Let him rise earlier from bed : let him kneel frequently and for a long period ; let him suffer cold, observe silence for a certain time, and abstain from sports and recreations, &c.

"To alms is referred whatever may be expended for the benefit of our neighbour. (1.) To give money, clothes, food, &c. (2.) To furnish personal assistance, to wait on the sick, to pray for the conversion of sinners, &c., and other works of merey, whether corporeal or spiritual." To this ample catalogue of penances may be added pilgrimages, scourging, and bodily tortures of various kinds.

The primitive regulations of the Christian Church, in regard to penance, seem to have been handed down almost entire to the eighth century, but about that time various abuses were introduced. Private came to be substituted for public penances ; and the practice commenced of allowing the priest to grant absolution immediately on confession to those who declared their readiness to fulfil the appointed penance, even although they were not prepared to partake of the communion. It was at this period, also, that the payment of a fine became one of the recognized punishments of the church ; and in many cases a prescribed penance came to be exchanged for a fine, the money thus paid being employed in alms for the poor ; in the ransom of captives ; or in defraying the ordinary expenses of the church. Several synods protested, both in the eighth and ninth centuries, against these abuses, while the edicts issued during the reign of Charlemagne endeavoured to place the subject of penance in its true light. In the eleventh century the severer exercises of penance were resorted to in Italy, chiefly through the influence of Peter Damiani, who recommended, in the strongest terms, the practice of self-scourging, representing it as a voluntary imitation of the sufferings of the martyrs as well as of the sufferings of Christ.

PENATES, the household gods of the ancient Romans. Images of these deities were kept in the penetralia, or inner parts of the house, and they were regarded as affording protection to the household. It is not certain whether all or which of the gods were venerated as Penates, for many are mentioned of both sexes, including Jupiter, Juno, Minerva, Vesta, Neptune, Apollo, and others, and every family worshipped one or more of them. The Lares as tutelary deities were sometimes confounded with the souls of deceased persons. Apuleius, indeed, alleges that the private or domestic Lares were guardian spirits. But the Penates were divinities of three classes ; those who presided over empires and states, those who had the protection of cities, and those who took the care or guardianship of private families ; the last were called the lesser Penates. According to others there were four classes : the celestial, the sea-gods, the infernal deities, and all such heroes as had received divine honours after death. A variety of opinions exists as to the origin of the Penates, but they are generally admitted to have come from Asia, and they were known as the tutelary gods of the Trojans. According to Dionysius Halicarnassus, Æneas first lodged these gods in the city of Lavinium, and when his son Ascanius built Alba, he translated them thither, but they returned twice miraculously to Lavinium. The same author says, that in Rome there still existed a dark temple in which were images of the Trojan gods, with the inscription "Denas," which signifies Penates. These images represented two young men sitting, each carrying a lance. Varro brings the Penates from Samothrace to Phrygia to be afterwards transported by Æneas into Italy.

The question has been often discussed among the learned, Who were the Penates of Rome? Some allege them to have been no other than the goddess Vesta, while others make them Neptune and Apollo. Vives, followed by Vossius, regards them as Castor and Pollux. It seems, indeed, to have been left to the master of every family to select his own Penates. Every Roman consul, dictator, and prætor, immediately after entering upon his office, was obliged to offer a sacrifice to the Penates and Vesta at Lavinium. Both the hearth and the table, but more especially the former, were sacred to the private Penates. A perpetual fire was kept burning on the hearth in honour of these divinities, and the salt-cellar and the first fruits on the table were also considered as consecrated to them. Every feast was introduced by a libation poured out to them either upon the table or the hearth. Any member of the family, on returning home after having been absent, saluted the Penates as he had done before leaving. No event occurred affecting the family, either favourably or otherwise, without being accompanied with prayer to the Lares and Penates. The images of the Penates were generally made of wax, ivory, silver, or earth, according to the wealth or poverty of the worshipper, and the only offerings which they received were wine, incense, and fruit, except on rare occasions, when lambs, sheep, or goats were sacrificed on their altars. Timæus, and from him Dionysius, says, that the Penates had no proper shape or figure, but were wooden or brazen rods, shaped somewhat like trumpets. Their most general appearance, however, is that of young men carrying lances or spears in their hands.

PENEIUS, a river-god among the ancient Thesalians, said to be the son of Oceanus and Tethys.

PENETRALIS, a surname applied to the different Roman divinities who occupied the penetralia or inner parts of a house. These deities were Jupiter, Vesta, and the Penates.

PENITENTIAL, a book prepared by Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury, for the guiding of priests in confessing penitents.

PENITENTIAL, a collection of canons appointing the time and mode of penance for every sin, the forms of prayer to be used both in first admitting penitents to penance, and in reconciling them by absolution.

PENITENTIAL PSALM, a name given in the ancient Christian Church to the fifty-first Psalm.

PENITENTIAL PRIESTS, officers appointed in many churches, when private confession was introduced, for the purpose of hearing confessions and imposing penances. The office, as we learn from Socrates, the ecclesiastical historian, originated in the time of the Decian persecution; and it existed in the church until the reign of the Emperor Theodosius, when it was abolished by Nectarius, bishop of Constantinople. Sozomen alleges the duties of the penitentiary presbyter to be partly to guide those who were under public penance as to the best mode of performing it, and partly to impose private exercises of penance on those who were not subjected to public censure. The example of Nectarius, in abolishing the office, was followed by almost all the bishops of the East, but it continued in the Western churches, and chiefly at Rome, to prepare men for the public penance of the church. The penitentiaries now in use, however, originated in the twelfth century, and the council of Lateran, A. D. 1215, ordered all bishops to have a penitentiary.

PENITENTS, the name given to those who, having fallen under ecclesiastical censure, had become impressed with a sincere sorrow for sin, and sought to be restored to the communion of the Christian Church. Even from the earliest times the utmost attention of the church was directed to such cases, but for a considerable period we find no mention of different classes of penitents. These are first spoken of by Gregory Thaumaturgus, bishop of Neocesarea, in the third century, about which time they came to be divided into four classes—the fientes or weepers, the audientes or hearers, the genuflectentes or kneelers, and consistentes or co-standers. The "weepers" took their station in the porch of the church, where they lay prostrate, begging the prayers of the faithful as they entered, and desiring to be admitted to do public penance in the church. When admitted to public penance, they received the name of "hearers," being allowed to remain in church during the reading of the Scriptures and the preaching of the sermon; but they were obliged to depart along with the catechumens before the common prayers began; and, accordingly, in the Apostolical Constitutions, the deacon is ordered to make the announcement at the close of the sermon, "Let none of the hearers, let none of the unbelievers, be present." Gregory Thaumaturgus assigns this second class of penitents their place in the narthex, or lowest part of the church. The "kneelers," again, or third class, were allowed to remain in church after the "hearers" were dismissed, and to join on their bended knees in the prayers which were offered specially for them, and to receive from the bishop imposition of hands and benediction. The station of the "kneelers" was within the nave, or body of the church, near the ambo, or reading-desk. The last class of penitents consisted of the "co-standers," so called from their being allowed, after the other penitents, energumens, and catechumens were dismissed, to stand with the faithful at the altar, and join in the common prayers, and see the oblation offered; but they were not permitted to make their own oblations, nor partake of the eucharist with them. The different classes of penitents are separately considered in the present work, under the articles Plentes, Audientes, Genuflectentes, and Consistentes.

Various duties were required of penitents suited to the different degrees to which they belonged. Penitents of the first three classes were required to kneel in worship, while the faithful were permitted to stand. Throughout the whole term of their penance, penitents were expected to abstain from all expressions of joy, to lay aside all personal decorations, to clothe themselves literally with sackcloth, and to cover their heads with ashes. The men cut short their hair and shaved their beards; the women appeared with dishevelled hair, and a penitential veil. Bathing, feasting, and sensual gratification were forbidden. Besides these negative restrictions, penitents of all classes were laid under certain positive obligations; such as, to be present and to perform their part at every religious assembly, to abound in almsgiving to the poor, to give attendance upon the sick, and to assist at the burial of the dead.

The length of time through which the penance extended varied according to circumstances, reaching from three to ten years. None was readmitted to the fellowship of the church until he exhibited evident signs of sincere and unfeigned penitence. The restoration of penitents was regarded as not only a public act, but a part of public worship; and it was performed uniformly by the same bishop under whom the penitent had been excluded from the communion of the church. The usual time for the restoration of penitents was Passion Week, which was hence called Hebdomas Indulgentiæ, or Indulgence Week. The ceremony was performed in the church during the time of divine service, and generally before the administration of the Lord's Supper. It was a deeply impressive spectacle. The penitent clothed in sackcloth, and covered with ashes, kneeling before the altar or reading desk, was readmitted by the bishop with prayer and imposition of hands. The chrism was also administered to penitent heretics, but to no other. We do not find any established form of absolution in the ancient writers. The fifty-first psalm was usually sung on the occasion of restoring a penitent, but not as a necessary part of the service; and at the close of the whole ceremony the Lord's Supper was administered in token that the penitent was reinstated in all his former privileges as a member of the church. All penitents, however, even though restored, were regarded as ever after disqualified for the sacred duties of the clerical office.

Until about the beginning of the fourth century the laity took a part in the administration of discipline, but before the middle of that century it was wholly engrossed by the clergy. From this time the bishops alone were regarded as having authority to impose penance, inflict excommunication, and grant absolution. Ecclesiastical censures were now looked upon by many as a grievance to which they were unwilling to submit. A distinction was introduced between private and public sins, and a corresponding distinction between private and public penance. The bishops were intrusted with power to modify and abridge the penitential observances enjoined by ancient canons; and this led to a considerable relaxation of discipline during the sixth century. It had been the practice, as we have seen, in the ancient church, to exclude penitents from church fellowship during a certain period before absolution. In the eighth and ninth centuries a custom was introduced of granting absolution immediately upon confession, on condition of certain acts of penance to be afterwards performed. Abuses were gradually multiplied in the matter of church discipline. One form of penance was exchanged for another; a pecuniary fine was added to prescribed penances, and at length the payment of a sum was allowed to be substituted for the penance enjoined. In the twelfth century a regular tariff was established regulating the practice of compounding for penances by money. "With the same intention," Mr. Riddle remarks, "another system of compounding for penance was adopted during this period, by admitting as an equivalent the repetition of a prescribed number of paternosters or other forms of devotion. Thus, sixty paternosters repeated by the penitent on his knees, or fifteen paternosters and fifteen misereres repeated with the whole body prostrate on the ground, were accepted instead of one day's fast. A fast of twelve days was compensated by causing one mass to be said,—of four months, by ten masses,—of a whole year, by thirty masses. A penance and fast of seven years could be despatched in one year, provided that the penitent repeated the whole Psalter once in every twenty-four hours. Sometimes the compensation consisted in repairing to a certain church on appointed days,—in a pilgrimage to some sacred spot,—or in placing a trifling offering on some privileged altar." Penitents now ceased to exercise feelings of true repentance, and the whole system of church discipline was converted into a regular traffic for the purpose of replenishing the treasury of the church.

PENTATEUCH, a term by which the Five Books of Moses are collectively designated. It is a word of Greek original, denoting five books or volumes, and it is supposed that the name was first prefixed to the Septuagint version by the Alexandrian translators. The Jews have always held the Pentateuch in the highest estimation, and hence they expend much money in procuring manuscript copies of this portion of the Scriptures. On this point Mr. Hyams, in his 'Ceremonies of the Modern Jews,' gives the following interesting details: "In many of the modern Jewish synagogues, there are as many as forty or fifty copies of the Pentateuch written on vellum, and presented to the synagogues for their use, as a voluntary offering by the opulent Jews. The cost of each of these is very great. First, the vellum must be manufactured by a Jew, and the skin must be of calf, that has been slaughtered by them; and when manufactured, if a spot or the least blemish be found thereon, it is considered defiled, and they will not use it. Upon an average a roll of the Law will take sixty skins, and for this reason; the middles are taken out into a square piece, and joined to each other: after which, they are affixed to two mahogany rollers, which generally cost not less than fifty pounds. The Pentateuch is a manuscript, and must therefore be written by a scribe. He must be married, and a man of learning and integrity; one looked upon as possessing some dignity, or he must not write the Law. The salary consequently must be adequate to his station. Those who present one of these rolls of the Law to the synagogue generally have it written under their own roof; it is written in columns about sixteen inches wide; and it is not permitted in this or any other Jewish manuscript or printed books, when they come to the end of a line, to divide a word; and therefore to prevent this, they always contrive to stretch out the word, so as to make it uniform. They consider it much more honourable to have it written under their own roof, than at any other place. It is also a law laid down by the Rabbins that the first five days in the week there shall be only a certain number of lines written each day, which is but a trifling number. Besides, their time is much occupied during their writing with a great variety of other matters; and they have certain prayers which must be said during the time. The ink they write with is also made up in a peculiar manner, and of ingredients which are not defiled by other hands. The donor of the gift, independent of having it written under his own roof, has at different periods, while it is writing, many of the Rabbins, who come to examine it, in case of any mistakes. Every time they make such visits he has to entertain them; and the task not unfrequently occupies two years. When completed, there is a superb covering for it provided, made in the following manner: it is sewed up at the sides and the top, leaving two large loop-holes for the rollers to appear; but the bottom of the said covering or mantle is quite open. The texture or quality of these mantles is superb, consisting of rich brocades and silks, and embroidered with gold, silver, and precious stones, according to the fancy of the giver. The decorations to complete it, are two sockets made of gold or silver, in the following manner; each of them is a foot in length, and is fixed on the top of the two rollers. They are made globular, and on the summit is a crown, a bird, or a flower, according to the taste of the donor: and on the globe there are a great number of little hooks and little bells attached to them, made of gold or silver. There is likewise a small gold hand formed as follows; the hand is shut, except the forefinger, which is pointing, and is fixed to a handle a foot in length, at the extremity of which is a loop, hanging down outside the mantle. When the Pentateuch is finished, a day is appointed by the chief Rabbins for the presentation of the gift. The synagogue is generally crowded on the occasion, and in the time of prayers the presentation is offered. All the other copies of the Pentateuch are taken out of the ark by the different donors, if present, or by their relations, and are carried in their arms. They walk in procession with them seven times round the desk, which is placed in the midst of the synagogue. The donor of the gift on that day leads the van. The whole ceremony has a striking appearance, particularly if it should take place in the evening, the synagogue being then brilliantly lighted. At the conclusion of the ceremony it is customary for the donor to invite the chief Rabbi and his friends to a feast. During the day there is a prayer offered up for the benefactor, and each one present offers a gift in coin, which is put into the treasury for the benefit of the poor." Folding and unfolding the Law, bearing it in procession through the synagogue, elevating it on the altar to be seen by all the people present, reading certain lessons on particular days, and other public services, are performed by various Israelites at different times. Each of these functions is regarded as a high honour, and the privilege of discharging it is put up to public auction, and sold to the highest bidder.

PENTECOST (Gr. the fiftieth), one of the great festivals of the Jews. It derived its name from the circumstance, that it was celebrated on the fiftieth day after the sixteenth of Nisan, which was the second day of the Passover. Moses calls it the Feast of Weeks, because it was fixed at the end of seven weeks from the offering of the sheaf. It was also celebrated as a thanksgiving for the harvest; hence it is called also the Feast of Harvest. Another name by which it was known was the day of First-Fruits, because on this day the Jews offered to God the first-fruits of the wheat harvest in bread baked of the new corn. The form of thanksgiving for this occasion is given in Deut. xxvi. 5—10. On the day of Pentecost was also celebrated the giving of the Law on Mount Sinai. Among the modern Jews this festival includes two days, and is celebrated with the same strictness as the first two days of the Passover. In some countries the synagogues and houses are adorned with flowers and sweet-smelling herbs. The two days are days of holy convocation. When assembled in the synagogue each one reads to himself the whole Book of Ruth. They read also that portion of the Scripture which gives an account of the delivery of the Law from Mount Sinai. The 613 precepts said to comprehend the whole Law are formally recited on this occasion. The morning service of the second day is concluded with prayers for the dead. On the evening of the second day the festival is terminated by the ceremony of Hallel, performed in the same manner as on the eighth day of the Passover.

On the first Pentecost after the resurrection of Christ, A. D. 33, the Holy Spirit was remarkably poured out on the assembled multitudes at Jerusalem. Accordingly, in the Christian Church, a festival was instituted in the close of the second century, under the name of Whitsuntide, in remembrance of Christ risen and glorified, and of the effusion of the Holy Spirit. The fifty days which immediately followed Easter, formed a season of festivity, and the last day of that period was called the Proper Pentecost. No fastings were observed during the whole fifty days; prayers were made in the standing, not in the kneeling, posture, and in many of the churches the congregations assembled daily and partook of the communion. Afterwards the celebration of Pentecost was limited to two special events, the ascension of Christ, and the effusion of the Holy Spirit.

PENTECOSTALS, oblations made by the parishioners, in the Church of England, to their priests, at the Feast of Pentecost, which are sometimes called Whitsun-farthings. The deans and prebendaries in some cathedrals are entitled to receive them, and in some places the bishop and archdeacons.

PENTECOSTARION, one of the service books of the Greek Church, containing the office of the church from Easter day till the eighth day after Pentecost, which they call the Sunday of All-Saints.

PEPLUS, a crocus-coloured garment made in honour of the goddess Athena at the festival PANATHENÆA (which see). It had figures woven into it, such as the Olympic gods conquering the giants. The peplus was not carried to the temple by men, but suspended from the mast of a ship, and this ship was moved along on land, but by what precise means is not known.

PEPUZIAN, a name given to the MONTANISTS (which see), because Montanus, it was said, taught that a place called Pepuza in Phrygia, was the chosen spot from which the millennial reign of Christ was destined to begin.

PEREANS, the followers of Euphrates of Pera in Cilicia, who was said to have believed that there are in the Trinity three Fathers, three Sons, and three Holy Ghosts. It has been alleged that, in opposition to this class of heretics, was framed the clause in the Athanasian creed, which says, "So there is one Father, not three Fathers; one Son, not three Sons; one Holy Ghost, not three Holy Ghosts."

PERAMBULATION. It is customary in England for the minister, churchwardens, and parishioners of each parish, to go round, or make a perambulation, for the purpose of defining the parochial boundaries. This ceremony is gone through once a-year in or about Ascension Week, and there is a homily appointed to be used before setting out.

PERDOLTE, an ancient Slavonic deity worshipped by mariners and fishermen, who believed that he presided over the sea.

PEREMAYANOFFSCHINS, Re-Anointers, a sect of Russian dissenters, which separated from the Russo-Greek Church about the year 1770 at Vetka. They agree in almost every respect with the Starobredsi, or Old Ceremonialists, except that they reanoint those who join them with the holy chrism.

PERFECT (THE), an appellation frequently applied in the early Christian Church, to those who had been baptized, and thereby been admitted to the full privileges of Christians, having a right to partake of the Lord's Supper.

PERFECTIONISTS, a modern sect of Christians in New England, North America, who maintain that every individual action is either wholly sinful, or wholly righteous: and that every being in the universe at any given time is either entirely holy, or entirely wicked. In regard to themselves they give out that they are wholly free from sin. In support of this doctrine, they say that Christ dwells in and controls believers, and thus secures their perfect holiness; that the body of Christ, which is the church, is nourished and supported by its Head. Hence they condemn the greatest portion of that which bears the name of Christianity as the work of Antichrist. "All the essential features of Judaism," they say, "and of its successor, popery, may be distinctly traced in every form of protestantism; and although we rejoice in the blessings which the Reformation has given us, we regard it as rightly named the Reformation, it being an improvement of Antichrist, not a restoration of Christianity." The views of this sect were supported for some time by a periodical paper published at New Haven, Connecticut, called the Perfectionist.

PERFECTIONS OF GOD. See GOD.

PERFUMES. In Oriental countries generally perfumes have been always held in high estimation, and are so at the present day. The use of perfumes was very common among the Hebrews even in the most remote ages. Moses gives the composition of two perfumes, one of which was to be offered to the Lord on the golden altar, and the other to be used for anointing the high-priest and his sons, the tabernacle and the vessels of divine service. The Hebrews, as well as the Egyptians, used perfumes for embalming the dead. The prophet Isaiah mentions (iii. 20.) "houses of the soul," which appear to have been small boxes containing rich perfumes, attached to a necklace which hung down to the waist. Professor Rosellini speaks of them as being worn by the Egyptian women in ancient times, having an image of the goddess Thmei engraved on them. Perfumes were liberally used at Oriental marriages in ancient times, and the same custom still exists. They seem also to have frequently formed a part of the oblations offered to heathen deities. Hence the king of Babylon is represented (Dan. ii. 46.) as having treated the prophet with the richest perfumes after he had predicted the future destinies of his empire. "Then the king Nebuchadnezzar fell upon his face, and worshipped Daniel, and commanded that they should offer an oblation and sweet odours unto him." Perfumes were regarded in many cases as an essential part of the religious worship of the gods.

PERGUBRIOS, an ancient Slavonian deity, who was believed to preside over the fruits. An annual festival was celebrated in his honour on the 22d of March.

PERIAMMATA. See PHYLACTERY.

PERIBOLÆON. See PALLIUM.

PERIBOLON, the outer enclosure of an ancient Christian church, being the utmost bounds allowed for refuge or sanctuary. See ASYLUM.

PERICOPÆ, specific selections from the writings of the New Testament, appointed in the ancient Christian church to be read on certain Sabbaths and special festive occasions. Considerable diversity of opinion exists in regard to the time when these selections were first made, some contending that they are of apostolic origin; others, that they originated in the fourth century; and others again trace them no further back than the eighth century. The Pericopæ of the Christian corresponded to the Parashoth of the Jewish church. See LESSONS.

PERIMAL. * See VISHNU.

PERIODEUTE, itinerating or visiting presbyters decreed by the council of Laodicea, A. D. 360, to supersede the CHOREPISCOPI (which see) in the country villages.

PERIPATETICS. See ARISTOTELIANS.

PERIRRHANTERIA, fountains placed at the entrance of the ancient heathen temples, that those who entered the sanctuary to pray or to offer sacrifices might first purify themselves.

PERIS, a race of beings, according to the Mohammedans, intermediate between men and angels, which inhabited the earth before the date of the Mosaic creation. Mussulman doctors inform us that the dynasty of the JINS (which see) lasted seven thousand years, when they were succeeded by the Peris, beings of an inferior but still a spiritual nature, whose dynasty lasted two thousand more. The sovereigns of both were for the most part named Solomon; their number amounted to seventy-two. The Jins were male, and the Peris female demons. See GENII.

PERISCYLACISMUS, the process of lustrating or purifying an army among the ancient Macedonians. A dog was cut in two pieces in the place where the army was to assemble, and one half of the dog was thrown at a distance on the right, and the other half on the left. The army then assembled in the place between the spots where the pieces had fallen.

PERISTIA, the victims sacrificed in a lustration among the ancient heathens.

PERISTIARCH, the officiating priest in a lustration or purification among the ancient Greeks when they wished to purify the place where a public assembly was held. He received this name because he went before the lustral victims as they were being carried round the boundary of the place. See LUSTRATION.

PERNOCTATIONS. See VIGIL.

PERPETUAL CURATES. See CURATES.

PERSEPHONE, the goddess among the ancient Greeks who ruled over the infernal regions. By the Romans she was called Proserpina. She was the daughter of Zeus and Demeter, and by Homer she was styled the wife of Hades, and the queen of the realms inhabited by the souls of the dead. She is said to have been the mother of the Furies. Hesiod mentions a story of her having been carried off by Pluto, and of the search which Demeter instituted for her daughter all over the earth, by torchlight, until at length he found her in the realms below. An arrangement was now made that Persephone should spend a third of every year with Pluto and two-thirds with the gods above. She was generally worshipped along with Demeter, and temples in her honour were found at Corinth, Megara, Sparta, and at Locri in the south of Italy.

PERSIANS (RELIGION OF THE ANCIENT). The original inhabitants of Persia sprung from Elam the son of Shem, from whom doubtless they received the true religion which at first existed among them in all its primitive purity. In process of time, however, they seem to have fallen, in common with the rest of the Oriental nations, into that species of Nature-worship which is known by the name of Tsabatism. Some authors have alleged that they were reclaimed from this idolatry by Abraham, who restored their religion to its original purity. But if such a reform was indeed effected among the Persians, they did not long retain their adherence to the Abrahamic creed, but relapsed into an idolatrous worship of the heavenly bodies, and more especially of the sun, with its emblem fire. And yet, amid all the corruptions which had crept into their religion; though their outward forms of worship might appear to indicate a strong tendency to polytheism, their Magi or philosophers held firm by the grand fundamental article of all true religion, the unity of God. Fire they maintained to be the appropriate symbol of deity, not the deity himself. And such a view of the element of fire is the less to be wondered at when we bear in mind the perpetual fire kept on the altar of burnt-offering in the temple of Jerusalem, that God revealed himself to Moses in a burning bush on Mount Horeb; and that he manifested his presence to the Israelites in the wilderness by a pillar of fire which went before them in all their journeyings. And it is not improbable, that the veneration of fire, and of that glorious embodiment of fire, the sun in the heavens, may have been derived by the Persians from the Chaldeans of Mesopotamia. They seem to have adopted the practice of fire-worship while renouncing the principle; and such was their intense hatred of the grosser forms of idolatry exhibited by other nations, that they cast down with indignation the statues and temples of the Greeks. Their own sun-worship, nevertheless, assumed, in course of time, a very gross and material character. And even at this day their descendants, the Parsees at Bombay, may be seen in crowds every morning and evening, in their white flowing garments and coloured turbans, hailing the rising sun with their hand laid devoutly on the breast, or paying respect by their humble prostrations to his departing rays.

The great reformer of the ancient Persian religion was Zoroaster, who originated the system which, amid various persecutions, has continued for 2,400 years down to the present day. Considerable difference of opinion has existed among the learned as to the precise time when Zoroaster lived. The great German historian, Niebuhr, hesitates not to pronounce his existence a myth. The honours due to the great Persian Reformer have been assigned to different individuals who happened to bear his name; but the generally received opinion is, that the true Zoroaster lived in the reign of Darius Hystaspes, in the sixth century before Christ; and this view has been established with great ability in a treatise published at Bombay in 1851 by Mr. Nouroojee Furdoonjee, a learned Parsee. This work is entitled 'Tareekh-i-Zurtooshtee, or Discussion on the era of Zurtoosht, or Zoroaster;' and may be considered as having set at rest a long-disputed question.

The changes which Zoroaster introduced into the religion of Persia were of great interest and importance. He taught that the sun was only to be worshipped as an emblem and exhibition of the power of Ormuzd, the original good principle, whose benevolent efforts, however, are incessantly counterworked by the exertions of Ahriman, the evil principle. This Dualistic notion appears to have pervaded the whole doctrines of Zoroaster. Above, however, and prior to these two co-equal principles is the Supreme Being, the Zeruané Akarane, or "Time without bounds," the uncreated All in All. This abstract, ideal being, wholly absorbed like the Brahman of Hinduism in the contemplation of his own excellence, is not set forth as a proper object of the worship of man. From this Being spring the two subordinate divinities, Ormuzd and Ahriman, who were destined to maintain a perpetual struggle, while Mithras, the deified symbol of light and fire, was designated the Mediator, his office being to aid in bringing about the reconciliation of the malignant Ahriman to Zeruané Akarane, and ultimately securing his submission to the divine laws.

The entire theoretical system of the ancient Persians has been already explained under the article Abesta, a work written in the Zend tongue, and hence usually known by the name of Zend-Avesta. The books thus designated are ascribed to Zoroaster, and are said to have extended to twenty-one volumes. The greater part of this voluminous work, however, is believed to have been destroyed either during the invasion of Persia by Alexander the Great, or immediately after the conquest of that country by the Arabs, who entertained a bitter hatred to the writings of the great Persian hierophant. The only remaining portions are the Vendidad, the Isashné, and the Visparad, all of which are regarded as authoritative liturgical works, by the Guebres of Persia, and the Parsees of Hindustan, both of whom claim to be the direct descendants of the ancient Persians, and have both held fast the faith of their ancestors. For 556 years after the subversion of the Persian dynasty by Alexander, the religion of Zoroaster seems to have declined until it was revived by Artashir Babekan in A. D. 226, in whose reign strenuous efforts were put forth to restore it to its original purity, when taught by the prophet himself. This reformation lasted during a period of 416 years, that is until the religion and monarchy of Persia fell into the hands of the Arabs, an event which happened in A. D. 641.

No sooner had the followers of Mohammed taken possession of the Persian kingdom than, with their usual intolerance, they sought to extirpate the ancient faith of Zoroaster; and so successful were they, by means of tyranny and oppression in the accomplishment of this object, that in less than 200 years from the date of their conquest, the greater part of the population had embraced the religion of Islam. In the tenth century, scattered and scanty remnants of the Zoroastrians were to be found only in the provinces of Fars and Kirman, and at this day their numbers do not exceed 2,000 families, or somewhere about 5,000 or 6,000 souls. The Guebres, as the Zoroastrians are now called, are limited almost exclusively to Yezd, and the twenty-four surrounding villages. They have fire-temples, thirty-four of them being situated in Yezd and its vicinity. Besides being branded as Guebres, or infidels, they are not only oppressed by the government, but treated with the utmost harshness by their fellow-subjects.

PERSONA (Lat. Person), a term used by the Latin or Western Church in speaking of the Trinity, and corresponding to what the Greek Church termed HYPOSTASIS (which see). There has been a keen controversy between the Greek and Latin churches about the use of the words Hypostasis and Persona. The Latins, maintaining that the Greek word Hypostasis meant substance, or essence, asserted that to speak as the Greeks did of three divine Hypostases, was to hold that there were three gods. The Greek Church, on the other hand, alleged that the use of the word Persona exposed the Latins to the charge of holding the Sabellian notion of the same individual Being in the Trinity sustaining three relations. Hence the two churches accused each other of heresy, and the matter in dispute was referred to the council of Alexandria, which met A. D. 362. The state of the controversy, when this council was convened, is thus laid down by Dr. Newman, in his able work entitled 'The Arians of the Fourth Century:' "At this date, the formula of the Three Hypostases seems, as a matter of fact, to have been more or less a characteristic of the Arians. At the same time, it was held by the orthodox of Asia, who had communicated with them; i. e. interpreted by them, of course, in the orthodox sense which it now bears. This will account for St. Basil's explanation of the Nicene Anathema; it being natural in an Asiatic Christian, who seems (unavoidably) to have arianized for the first thirty years of his life, to imagine, (whether rightly or not,) that he perceived in it the distinction between ousia and Hypostasis, which he himself had been accustomed to recognize. Again, in the schism at Antioch, which has been lately narrated, the party of Meletius, which had so long arianized, maintained the Three Hypostases, in opposition to the Eustathians, who, as a body, agreed with the Latins, and had in consequence been accused by the Arians of Sabellianism. Moreover, this connexion of the Oriental orthodox with the Semi-arians, partly accounts for some apparent tritheisms of the former; a heresy into which the latter certainly did fall.

"Athanasius, on the other hand, without caring to be uniform in his use of terms, about which the orthodox differed, favours the Latin usage, speaking of the Supreme Being as one Hypostasis, i. e. substance. And in this he differed from the previous writers of his own church; who, not having experience of the Latin theology, nor of the perversions of Arianism, adopt, not only the word Hypostasis, but, (what is stronger,) the words physis and ousia, to denote the separate Personality of the Son and Spirit.

"As to the Latins, it is said that, when Hosius came to Alexandria before the Nicene Council, he was desirous that some explanation should be made about the Hypostasis; though nothing was settled in consequence. But, soon after the Council of Sardica, an addition was made to its confession, which in Theodoret runs as follows: 'Whereas the heretics maintain that the Hypostases of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, are distinct and separate, we declare that according to the Catholic faith there is but one Hypostasis, (which they call Ousia,) of the Three; and the Hypostasis of the Son is the same as the Father.'

Both parties having fully explained their views to the council, it was found they were agreed in point of doctrine, but differed only about the grammatical meaning of a word, and the council came to the unanimous decision, that such expressions were not so desirable or accurate as those of the Nicene creed, the words of which they promised for the future to acquiesce in and to use. See ARIANS.

PERTH (ARTICLES OF). See ARTICLES OF PERTH.

PERUN, the god of thunder among the ancient Slavonians. His image was made of wood, with a head of silver, and golden whiskers. "The Slavonians," says Procopius, in his work 'De Bello Gothico,' "worship one God, the maker of the thunder, whom they acknowledge the only Lord of the universe, and to whom they offer cattle, and different kinds of victims." Perun, then, was the chief deity of the Slavonians.

PERUNATELE', a goddess among the ancient Lithuanians, who was at once the mother and the wife of PERUN (which see).

PESSOS, a small black stone which held the place of a statue in the temple of Cybele, the great goddess of the Phrygians. It was probably an aerolite, having been represented as fallen from heaven.

PETALUM, the golden plate which the Jewish high-priest wore upon his forehead.

PETER'S (ST.) DAY, a festival observed by the Church of Rome on the 29th of June, in honour of the Apostle Peter. The Greek Church keep a festival on the same day in honour of both the apostles, Peter and Paul.

PETER-PENCE, an annual tribute of one penny paid at Rome out of every family, at the festival of St. Peter. It was regularly paid in England from the time of the Saxon kings till the reign of Henry VIII., when it was enacted, that henceforth no person shall pay any pensions, Peter-Pence, or other impositions, to the use of the bishop and the see of Rome.

PETROBRUSIANS, a Christian sect which arose in the twelfth century in the south of France, deriving its name from Peter de Bruys, who, though deposed from the priesthood, continued to propagate his peculiar opinions. He was violently opposed to infant-baptism, the mass, and celibacy; he burned the crosses, and called upon his followers to destroy the churches, seeing God is not confined to temples made with the hands of men. It has also been maintained that he denied Romish transubstantiation, and held the bread and wine in the Lord's Supper to be signs or symbols. He is, moreover, alleged to have taught that the oblations, prayers, and good works of the living do not profit the dead. The founder of this sect laboured chiefly in Languedoc and Provence, and after having preached for twenty years against the errors of the dominant church, he was burned by an infuriated mob at St. Giles, in A. D. 1130. After the death of Peter de Bruys, his opinions continued to be promulgated by his successor Henry, whose followers received the name of HENRICIANS (which see).

PETROJOANNITES, a small sect which originated in the twelfth century, named from their leader Peter Joannis, who principally opposed the doctrine maintained by the dominant church, that grace is conferred in baptism.

PETZELIANS, or PESCHELIANS, a modern sect of a politico-religious character, who derived their name from a priest of Brenna, called Petzel, or Peschel. They held the natural and legal equality of all human beings, and maintained that they have a continual and inalienable property in the earth, and its natural productions. Their enemies charged them with offering human sacrifices, particularly on Good Friday. Congregations belonging to this sect are said to have existed in Upper Austria, but by the interference of the public authorities they have been dispersed.

PHAETHON (Gr. the shining), a Homeric epithet or surname* of HELIOS (which see), but he is generally regarded as the son of Helios. On one occasion he is said to have asked from his father permission to drive the chariot of the sun across the heavens; and being unable to restrain the horses, he was thrown so near the earth as almost to scorch it. From this time, according to mythology, dates the black colour of the inhabitants of the tropics. For this rash adventure Zeus killed him with a flash of lightning, and he fell down into the river Po,—a myth which probably originated in the circumstance, that the Greeks received the amber from the Baltic through the medium of the Venetians, who dwelt near the mouths of the Po. His sisters were changed into poplars, and their tears into amber.

PHAGESIA (from Gr. phagēin, to eat), a portion of the festivals of the Dionysia in ancient Greece, which was devoted to indulgence in eating and drinking in honour of Dionysus.

PHALLOPHORI (Gr. phallos, the phallus, and phero, to carry), the bearers of the sacred Phallus in the Dionysia of the ancient Greeks.

PHALLUS, the symbol of the fertility of nature among the ancient Greeks. It was carried in the processions of the Dionysia, and men disguised as women, called Ithyphalloi, followed immediately behind it. The Phallus, which was called among the Romans fascinum, was often used by that people as an amulet hung round the necks of children to avert evil influences. The Satyrica signa of Pliny probably referred to the Phallus, and he says that these were placed in gardens, and on hearths, to protect against the fascinations of the envious. From Pollux, also, we learn that smiths were accustomed to place figures of the Phallus before their forges for the same purpose. This symbol, which revolts us by its indecency, conveyed to the ancient Heathens, as the Lingam does to the modern Hindus, a profound and sacred meaning.

The reverence entertained for this emblem of fertility was probably introduced into Greece from Egypt, along with the mysteries of Osiris. It is the opinion of Stuhr that the worship of the Lingam, which is identical with that of the Phallus, originated after the Christian era, and arose from the powerful influence exerted upon India by Western Asia. The Hindus wrap up an image of the Lingam along with the bodies of their dead, implying, doubtless, the immortal life which is in man, and which death cannot destroy. The Greeks, also, expressed probably the same idea when they alleged that Dionysus had placed the Phallus at the gates of Uades. Diodorus Siculus, referring to the veneration in which the Phallus was held among the Greeks, tells us that by this they would signify their gratitude to God for the populousness of their country. Herodotus alleges, that the reason of the Egyptian observances connected with the Phallus was a sacred mystery.

PHANES, a mystic deity in the system of the Orphics, who is said to have sprung from the mundane egg, and to have been the father of the gods, and the forner of men.

PHANTASIASTÆ. See DOCTÆ.

PHARISEES, a powerful sect among the ancient Jews. The precise date of their origin has not been accurately ascertained, but the most general belief is, that they arose in the time of the wars of the Maccabees, about B. C. 300. The first writer by whom they are mentioned is Josephus, who speaks of them as existing under Hyrcanus about B. C. 130, and even then in great favour among the Jews. Their name is usually supposed to have been derived from the Hebrew word pharash, to separate, because they were regarded as separate and distinguished from all others by their extraordinary pretensions to piety. They were remarkably strict in their literal observance of the law of Moses. Their religious life consisted only in outward forms, which they observed from no higher principle than to be seen of men. Hence they prayed in the corners of the streets, and distributed their alms in the most public places. And as our blessed Lord said, "Verily they have their reward." So highly were they, in common with the Scribes, held in estimation by the people, that it was a current saying, that if only two men were to enter heaven, the one would be a Scribe and the other a Pharisee. "The Pharisees," says Neander, "stood at the summit of legal Judaism. They fenced round the Mosaic law with a multitude of so-called 'hedges,' whereby its precepts were to be guarded against every possible infringement. Thus it came about, that under this pretext many new statutes were added by them, particularly to the ritual portion of the law. These they contrived, by an arbitrary method of interpretation,—a method which in part tortured the letter and in part was allegorical,—to find in the Pentateuch; appending at the same time to an oral tradition, as furnishing both the key to right exposition, and the authority for their doctrines. They were venerated by the people as the holy men, and stood at the head of the hierarchy. An asceticism, alien to the original Hebrew spirit, but easily capable of entering into union with the legal sectarianism at its most extravagant pitch, was wrought by them into a system. We find among them a great deal that is similar to the evangelical counsels, and to the rules of Monachism in the later church. On painful ceremonial observances they often laid greater stress than on good morals. To a rigid austerity in the avoidance of every even seeming transgression of ritual precepts, they united an easy sophistical casuistry which knew how to excuse many a violation of the moral law. Besides those who made it their particular business to interpret the law and its supplemental traditions, there were among them those, also, who knew how to introduce into the Old Testament, by allegorical interpretation, a peculiar Theosophy; and this they propagated in their schools; a system which, starting from the development of certain ideas really contained in the Old Testament in the germ, had grown out of the fusion of these with elements derived from the Zoroastrian or Parsic system of religion; and at a later period, after the time of Gamaliel, with such also as had been derived from Platonism. Thus to a ritual and legal tradition came to be added a speculative and theosophic one."

The Pharisees were very numerous, and the members of the sect belonged to all classes of society. Such was the esteem in which they were held, and the influence which they exerted over the Jews, that the Maccabean princes viewed them with jealousy, and even with fear. So highly, indeed, did they pride themselves on their imagined superiority in religious knowledge, that they despised others. Their numbers and influence were much increased shortly before the Christian era, by the controversy which arose between the two Jewish schools of Hillel and Shammai.

As to the religious doctrines of the Pharisees, we learn from Acts xxiii. 8, 9, that they believed in the resurrection of the dead, and in the existence of angels and spirits; and in these articles of their creed they differed from the Sadducees. But Josephus informs us, that while they undoubtedly believed in the immortality of the soul, they taught the doctrine of its transmigration into other human bodies, not, however, as in the Pythagorean system of philosophy, into the bodies of inferior animals. And even the transmigration of the Pharisees was not the destiny of the whole race of man, but was allotted only to the righteous after having been rewarded for a time in a separate state. The wicked, on the other hand, were believed to pass away into everlasting punishment; and if they ever re-appeared on earth it was to afflict men with epilepsy, lunacy, and other similar diseases. The Pharisees are said by some writers to have believed in Fate, but it is difficult to reconcile this notion with the statements of Josephus, who alleges that they agreed with the Essenes in holding absolute predestination, while at the same time they agreed with the Sadducees in holding the doctrine of the free-will of man. The grand fundamental error of this great Jewish sect, however, was their placing oral tradition on a level in point of authority with the written revelation; or rather in many cases they exalted it above the Bible, actually "making the Word of God," as our Saviour declares, "of none effect by their traditions." Thus the washing of hands before meals was made a religious duty, and the Pharisees went so far as to teach that the omission of this ablution was a flagrant crime, and worthy of death. To this were added various other washings, as of cups, and pots, and tables, which came to be established as sacred duties.

The Pharisees thought themselves, and were thought by others, to be righteous, but our Lord expressly declared to all his followers, "Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven." From this passage it is evident, that the righteousness of the Pharisees was defective, whether viewed as a justifying or a sanctifying righteousness. It was defective in various respects: (1.) In its extent, inasmuch as, instead of reaching to the whole law, it was limited to a few, and these comparatively unimportant points. Thus "they tithe mint, and anise, and cummin, but neglected the weightier matters of the law, justice, and mercy, and truth." (2.) It was defective in the principle from which it arose, having regard simply to the outward conduct, without reference to the state of the heart. (3.) It was defective in its end or design, which went no farther than to be seen of men. (4.) It was defective in the spirit with which it was performed, which was uniformly a spirit of pride and self-sufficiency. Hence their righteousness being thus essentially defective, even their religious duties, actions in themselves good, were entirely vitiated and converted into actions totally unacceptable in the sight of God. If they gave alms, they did so in a public and ostentatious way, selecting the synagogues and the streets as the most public places for discharging this most important Christian duty. When they prayed, it was not in the privacy of the closet, but in the open high ways, amid passing crowds of observers. On the days set apart for fasting, the Pharisee might be seen clothed in the meanest dress, with his head and face covered with ashes, his head hanging down like a bulrush, and his face fixed upon the ground, wishing to convey, by his whole aspect and demeanour, that his soul was weighed down to the dust because of sin. In their every action, in short, the Pharisees were actuated by the all-engrossing desire to "have glory of men."

The Pharisees, though agreed in general points of doctrine among themselves, were nevertheless divided into several branches or subdivisions. Both the Jerusalem and Babylonian Talmuds speak of seven different kinds of Pharisees, of which two appear to be alluded to, though not mentioned by name, in the New Testament. Thus in Matt. xxiii. 5, 14, we may perceive an obvious allusion to the Shechemite Pharisees, or those who joined the sect from no other motive than self-interest and the love of gain. In Luke xviii. 18, also there appears to be a decided reference to another sect of Pharisees who observed a strict moral discipline, and were ready to perform every duty. Besides these two classes or divisions there was the Dashing Pharisee, as he was termed, who walked with apparent humility, moving slowly, with the heel of one foot touching the great toe of the other; nor did he lift his feet from the ground so that his toes were dashed against the stones. There was also the Bleeding Pharisee, that shut his eyes when he walked abroad to avoid the sight of women, and would press himself against the wall that he might not touch those that passed by, thus hurting his feet and making them bleed. The Talmuds speak of the Pharisee of the Mortar, who wore a loose coat in the shape of a mortar, with the mouth turned downwards; or as others say, he wore a hat resembling a deep mortar, so that he could not look upward nor on either side, but only downward or straight forward. In addition to these we have the Pharisee from Love, who obeyed the law from love of virtue, and the Pharisee from Fear, who obeyed from fear of punishment; the one observing the positive and the other the negative commandments. It appears women also sometimes voluntarily joined the sect of the Pharisees.

PHARMACIDES, an appellation signifying sorceresses or witches, which was given by the Thebans to those who delayed the birth of Heracles.

PHARMACY, a name applied to the arts of the magician and enchanter, in the early ages of the Christian church. The council of Ancyra forbids pharmacy, that is the magical art of inventing and preparing medicaments to do mischief; and five years' penance is there appointed for any one that receives a magician into his house for that purpose. Basil's canons condemn it under the same character of pharmacy or witchcraft, and assigns thirty years' penance to it. Tertullian plainly asserts that never did a magician or enchanter escape unpunished in the church. Those who practised the magical art were sometimes termed pharmaci, and their magical potions pharmaca.

PHARYGÆA, a surname of Hera, derived from the name of a town in Locris, where she was worshipped.

PHILOXION, a cloak which in the Greek church corresponds to the chasuble in the Latin church. This ecclesiastical vestment is worn by the priests, and that worn by the patriarch is embellished with triangles and crosses. This is supposed to have been the sort of garment which Paul left at Troas, and his anxiety for its restoration is to be attributed, we are told, to its sanctity as an ecclesiastical robe.

PHILADELPHIAN ASSOCIATION, a sect of Mystics which arose in the seventeenth century. It was founded by Pordage, a Royalist clergyman in England, who took to medicine under the Protectorate. This visionary was a great student and admirer of Jacob Behmen; but unlike his master, an inveterate spirit-seer. He attracted a number of followers, to whom he gave the name of the Philadelphian Association, and who professed to have seen apparitions of angels and devils in broad daylight, every day for nearly a month. One of the most conspicuous members of this association was Jane Leade or Leadley, a widow of good family from Norfolk, who, having retired from the world, gave herself up to the study of the works of Behmen. She professed to hold intercourse with spirits, and committed her revelations to writing, printing them at her own expense. She died in 1704, in her eighty-first year. Pordage died a few years before her, but he is said to have previously combined with Mrs. Leade in forming the Philadelphian Association in 1697. This remarkable woman, whose writings occupy eight volumes, carried to its practical extreme the Paracelsian doctrine concerning the magical power of faith. It was by union with the divine will, she alleged, that the ancient believers wrought their miracles, and that faith can do miracles still; the will of the soul wholly surrendered to God becomes a resistless power throughout the universe. Had any considerable number of men a faith so strong, rebellious nature would be subdued and Paradise restored. The one grand desideratum in the view of the Philadelphian Association was, that the soul of man should be committed to the internal teacher to be moulded, guided, and governed by him to the total neglect of all other doctrines, precepts, and opinions. This the members believed was the case with themselves, and that they were the only church of Christ upon the earth in which the Holy Spirit resided and reigned. They seem also to have maintained the doctrine of universal salvation, and the final restoration of all fallen intelligences. The sect, which was short-lived, embraced while it lasted a considerable number of members, drawn not only from the illiterate, but even from the well-informed classes in England. A small body of Philadelphians existed for a short time also in Holland.

PHILADELPHIAN UNIVERSALISTS. See UNIVERSALISTS.

PHILALETES. These lovers of truth, as their name implies, were a sect of infidels which arose at Kiel, in Germany, about 1847, and who wished to ignore Christianity altogether, and to use only the most general forms of piety.

PHILIP (ST.) AND JAMES'S (ST.) DAY, a festival observed in memory of the apostles Philip and James the less, on the 1st of May. In the Greek church the festival of St. Philip is kept on the 14th of November.

PHILIPPISTS. See ADIAPHORISTS.

PHILISTINES (RELIGION OF THE ANCIENT). This people are alleged to have descended from Mizraim, the second son of Ham, and to have originally inhabited the north-eastern portion of Egypt. At an early period they seem to have emigrated to Canaan, where, having dispossessed the Avites, they took possession of a small portion of territory in the south-west. This land of the Philistines was divided in the days of Joshua into five lordships or principalities, namely, Gaza, Askalon, Ashdod, Gath, and Ekron. The period at which they settled in Canaan has not been ascertained, but they had probably been located there a considerable time before Abraham appeared in their country. In their aboriginal state, and even in the days of Abraham and Isaac, they were evidently worshippers of the true God. Afterwards, however, they fell into gross idolatry, and became inveterate and irreconcilable enemies of the Israelites. Each of the five principal cities seems to have had its own favourite idol. Their chief god was Dagon, worshipped at Gaza and other cities on their coast. To him they ascribed the invention of bread-corn or of agriculture, as his name imports. He is said to have been identical with the Syrian goddess Derceto. As Dagon was the greatest and the most ancient of the Philistine deities, so he seems to have lasted longer than all the others, being mentioned in 1 Mac. x., and thus evidently existing at a late period of the Jewish history. Next to Dagon in importance was Baalzebub, the god of Ekron, who is styled the lord of flies. Another deity worshipped by the Philistines was Ashteroth or Astarte, a goddess having the head of a horned heifer. She is mentioned as the last idol worshipped by the Jews. Thus in Jer. xlv. 17. we read, "But we will certainly do whatsoever thing goeth forth out of our own mouth, to burn incense unto the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink offerings unto her, as we have done, we, and our fathers, our kings, and our princes, in the cities of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem: for then had we plenty of victuals, and were well, and saw no evil."

PHILOPOFTCHINS, a sect of Dissenters from the Russo-Greek church, who are remarkable for their abstemiousness. Their ministers are trained to the sacred office from their boyhood, not being allowed to touch animal food, or to taste strong drink, and they are doomed throughout life to celibacy. The members of this sect fast on Wednesday, because it was the day on which Jesus was betrayed; and on Friday, as being the day on which he was crucified. They celebrate three extraordinary fasts; the first, before Easter, lasts throughout seven weeks; the second, up to the commencement of August, fifteen days; and the third, before Christmas, six weeks. They drink no wine except on special occasions. They decline to take an oath, but simply use the words, "Yes, yes, in truth," with a peculiar gesture of the hand. Many of them limit their food to milk and vegetables.

PHILOPONISTS, a sect which arose in the sixth century, deriving its name from one of its warmest supporters, John Philoponus, an Alexandrian philosopher and grammarian of the highest reputation. They were Tritheists, maintaining that in God there are three natures as well as persons, absolutely equal in all respects, and joined together by no essence common to all. This sect believed also, in opposition to the Cononites, that the form as well as the matter of all bodies was corrupt, and that both, therefore, were to be restored in the resurrection.

PHILOSARCÆ (Gr. phileo, to love, and sarx, flesh), a term of reproach used by the Origenists in reference to the orthodox as believers in the resurrection of the body.

PHILOSOPHISTS. See ILLUMINATI.

PHILOTHEIA (Gr. phileo, to love, and Theos, God), a term sometimes applied by ancient Christian writers to the monastic life, because those who embraced that life professed to renounce all for the love of God. Hence Theodore entitles one of his books 'Philotheus,' because it contains the lives of the most famous ascetics of his time.

PHLEGETHON, a river in the infernal regions, according to the system of ancient Heathenism. It was one of the four rivers which the dead must cross before finding admission to the realms of Orcus. See HELL.

PHOBETOR, an attendant on Somnus, the god of sleep, in the ancient Heathen mythology. It was his office to suggest to the mind images of animated beings, and in this capacity he is mentioned by Ovid in his 'Metamorphoses.'

PHOBUS, the personification of Fear among the ancient Greeks. He is said to have been the son of Ares and Cythereia, and a constant attendant upon his father. He was worshipped by the Romans under the name of Metus.

PHŒNICIANS (RELIGION OF THE ANCIENT). This people are generally admitted to have been Canaanites by descent, and must originally have had a knowledge of the true God. In course of time, however, they degenerated into a blind idolatry. The chief of their deities, as we learn from a fragment of Sanchoniathon, preserved by Eusebius, was Balsamon, or the lord of heaven. The same name is found also in the comedies of Plautus as a Phœnician deity. The prophets and priests connected with the service of this god appear to have been numerous. Thus we read that 450 of them were fed at Jezebel's table. They conducted their idolatrous worship not only with burnt-offerings and sacrifices, but with dances and gesticulations, by which they wrought themselves up to a high state of madness, in the midst of which they cut themselves with knives and lancets. Herodotus supposes the Phœnicians to have been circumcised, but Josephus asserts that, with the exception of the Jews, none of the nations of Palestine and Syria used that religious rite.

PHŒNIX, a fabulous bird among the ancient Egyptians. It had the size and shape of an eagle, which appeared, it was alleged, on the return of certain astronomical periods, supposed to correspond to certain phases in the life of nations. This hieroglyphical bird is represented as perched upon the hand of Hercules. "A star," says Mr. Gross, "the emblem of Sirius, and a balance, significant of the summer solstice, defined and illustrated its symbolical importance. Its head is ornamented with a tuft of feathers: its wings, according to Herodotus, are partly of a gold, and partly of a ruby colour; and its form and size perfectly correspond to the contour and dimensions of the bird of heaven—the eagle: it is also recognized in the form of a winged genius in human shape. This emphatically astronomical bird, at the expiration of the great Sirius year, comprising a period of fourteen hundred and sixty-one years, used regularly to come from the East, we are told, bearing the ashes of its defunct sire, and depositing them in the temple of the sun at Heliopolis; that is, a new cycle of Sirial time commenced or succeeded the old! It is further to be observed that at the termination of the fourteen hundred and sixty-one years, and at the time of the new moon during the summer solstice, the fixed agrarian and the vague ecclesiastical year of the Egyptians, exactly coincided. This event filled all Egypt with unbounded joy, and attested the perfection and triumph of the astronomical science of the priests, especially the most erudite among them—those of Heliopolis. Owing to the facts before us, the phoenix was a leading type of the resurrection among the ancients, and regarded emphatically as the bird of time." The phoenix was said to revive from its ashes after having voluntarily built for itself a funeral pile on which it was consumed. This is supposed by Rougemont to be a myth representing that the present world must perish by fire only to revive in a new existence. The East is full of fables resembling the phoenix. Thus the Sinorg of the ancient Persians is said to have witnessed twelve catastrophes, and may yet see many more. It has built its nest on Mount Kaf, and perched upon the branches of the Gogard, or tree of life, it predicts good and evil to mortals. Similar legends are to be found connected with the Rokh of the Arabians and the Semenda of the Hindus. The Jews also have their sacred bird Tsits.

PHONASCUS, a name given in the ancient Christian Church to the individual who acted as precentor, or led the psalmody in divine service. This appellation seems to have been first used in the fourth century, and is still employed in the Greek Church.

PHORCUS, or PHORCYS, a Homeric sea-god, to whom a harbour in Ithaca was dedicated. He is said to have been the son of Pontus and Ge, and to have been the father, by his sister Ceto, of the Gorgons, the Hesperian dragon and the Hesperides. By Hecate he was the father of Scylla.

PHOSPHORIUS (Gr. light-bringer), a surname of Artemis, Eos, and Heate. This was also the name given by the Greek poets to the planet Venus when it appeared in the morning before sunrise.

PHOS and PHOTISMA (Gr. light and illumination), the names generally applied in the ancient Christian Church to baptism, from the great blessings supposed to arise from it.

PHOTA (HAGIA), the Holy Lights, a term anciently used to denote the festival of Epiphany, as being commemorative of our Saviour's baptism.

PHOTINIANS, a heretical sect which arose in the fourth century, deriving its origin and name from Photinus, bishop of Sirmium, who taught the most erroneous opinions concerning God. His views are thus stated by Walch: "Photinus had (1.) erroneous views of the Trinity. On this subject he taught thus:—The Holy Scriptures speak indeed of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit: but we are to understand by them only one person, who in Scripture is called the Father. What the Scriptures call the Word of God is by no means a substance or a person, still less is it a person begotten by the Father and therefore called the Son. For with God there can be no generation, and of course he can have no Son. Neither is the Word that person who made the world, but the Word is properly the understanding of God, which comprehends the designs of God in all his external operations and is therefore called God. The Holy Spirit also is not a person but an attribute of God. Hence followed (2.) erroneous ideas of the person of Christ. He maintained that Jesus Christ was a mere man, that before his birth he had no existence except in the divine foreknowledge, and that he began to be when he was born of Mary by the Holy Spirit. Yet he received the special influences of divine power whereby he wrought miracles. This is the indwelling of the word. On account of these excellent gifts and his perfect virtue, God took this man into the place of a son, and therefore he is called the Son of God and also God. Therefore it must be said that the Son of God had a beginning." The errors of Photinus and his followers were condemned by the council of Milan, and also by that of Sirmium, A. D. 351. He was in consequence deprived of office and sent into banishment; whereupon he appealed to the emperor, who allowed him to defend his doctrines publicly. Basil, bishop of Ancyra, was appointed to dispute with him, and a formal discussion took place, when the victory was decided to be on the side of Basil, and the sentence pronounced upon Photinus was confirmed. He died in exile in A. D. 372.

PHOTISMA. See PHOS.

PHOTISTERION, a place of illumination, being a term frequently used in the ancient Christian Church, to denote the Baptistry as the place of baptism, that ordinance being supposed to be attended with a divine illumination of the soul. This name might also be used for another reason, namely, because baptisteries were the places in which instruction was communicated previous to baptism, the catechumens being there taught the creed and instructed in the first rudiments of the Christian faith.

PHOTIZOMENOI (Gr. enlightened), a term frequently used among the early Christians to denote the baptized, as being instructed in the mysteries of the Christian religion.

PHRONTISTERIA, a name applied in ancient times to denote monasteries, as being places of education and schools of learning. Baptisteries were also called occasionally by this name, the catechumens being there educated in religious truth.

PHRYGIANS (RELIGION OF THE ANCIENT). This people, who inhabited a province of Asia Minor, were anciently reputed to have been the inventors of augury, and other kinds of divination, and were regarded as the most superstitious of all the Asiatic nations. They had many idols, but the goddess Cybele seems to have been their principal deity, who was regarded as the great mother of the gods. At stated times they carried her image through the streets, dancing round it, and after having, with violent gesticulations, wrought themselves into a frenzied state, they cut and wounded their bodies in commemoration of the grief which Cybele felt on the death of her beloved son Attis. The same event was celebrated annually by wrapping a pine-tree in wool, and carrying it with great solemnity to the temple of the goddess, the priests who conveyed it thither being crowned with violets, which were supposed to have sprung from the blood of Attis. The priests were not allowed to drink wine, or to eat bread, and after their death they were placed in a stone ten cubits high. It seems quite plain, from the slight sketch we have given of the worship of Cybele by the Phrygians, that some elements of the worship of Dionysus had come to be mixed up with those of the worship of the Phrygian mother of the gods. Cybele is so generally found on the coins of Phrygia, that her worship seems to have been universal in that country. There were, doubtless, many other deities worshipped in Phrygia, but these were regarded as completely subordinate to the great goddess of the earth.

PIITHA, or PTAH, the supreme god of the ancient Egyptians, in the first four dynasties or successions of kings, extending to about 321 years. This god, however, seems, in later times, to have been degraded from his high position, and become a secondary god. No image of this, nor indeed of any other god or goddess, is found upon the most ancient Egyptian monuments. The worship of Phthah passed from Egypt into Greece, and was altered into Hephaestus. "When in later times," says Mr. Osburn, in his 'Religions of the World,' "pictures and images of the gods made their appearance on the remains of ancient Egypt, Ptah was represented as a tall youth, with handsome features and a green complexion, denoting the swarthy, sallow hue which the burning sun of Africa had already impressed upon the skins of Phut and his descendants. He was swathed in white linen like a mummy, to denote that he had been dead, but his hands had burst through the cerements, and grasped many symbols, to denote that he has risen again. This god will be found the son of many divine parents, according to the later fablings, both of the monuments and of the Greek authors; most of them prompted by political motives; but on monuments of all epochs the image of Ptah of Memphis is enclosed in a shrine, to denote that he claimed affinity with no other god, and that his real parentage was unknown or forgotten."

PHTHARTOLATRÆ (Gr. phthartos, corruptible, and latreuo, to worship), a term of reproach applied to the SEVERIANS (which see), in the sixth century, who maintained that Christ's body was corruptible of itself, but by reason of the Godhead dwelling in it was never corrupted. See CREATICOŁÆ.

PHUNDAITES. See BOGOMILES.

PHYLACTERY. This word, which in Greek is phylacterion, denotes literally a preservative or protection, and hence is used to denote an amulet, which is supposed to preserve from unseen evils. Among the Jews, however, the phylactery was a slip of parchment, in which was written some text of Scripture. This was, and is still, worn by the more devout Jews on the forehead and left arm while at prayer, in literal obedience to the command in Exod. xiii. 16, "And it shall be for a token upon thine hand, and for frontlets between thine eyes: for by strength of hand the Lord brought us forth out of Egypt;" and Deut. vi. 6—9, "And these words, which I command thee this day, shall be in thine heart: and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. And thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes. And thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, and on thy gates." These passages are explained by the Rabbies as requiring schedules with some portions of Scripture to be affixed to the doorposts, and certain signs, tokens, and frontlets, to be fastened to the hand or arm, and between the eyes.

The phylacteries of the Jews, called in the Talmud Tephillin, are of two kinds, those designed for the head and those for the hand or arm. Mr. Allen, in his 'Modern Judaism,' thus describes both these species of phylactery: "The Tephillin for the head are made of a piece of skin, or leather manufactured from the skin, of some clean animal; well soaked and stretched on a block cut for the purpose, sewed together while wet, and left on the block till it is dried and stiffened into the requisite form. When taken off, it forms a leathern box, of equal length and breadth, and nearly equal depth; divided by partitions into four compartments; and having impressed on one side of it, the letter shin, and on the other side a character resembling that letter, only having four points or heads, as the letter shin has three. This box is sewed to a thick skin, broader than the square of the box: of this skin is formed a loop, through which passes a thong, with which the tephillin are fastened to the head.

"In the four compartments are enclosed four passages of the law, written on parchment, and carefully folded. These parchments are commonly bound with some pure and well-washed hairs of a calf or cow, generally pulled from the tail; and the ends come out beyond the outer skin, to indicate that the schedules within are rightly made. But that skin is sewed and fastened together with very fine and clean strings or cords, made from the sinews of a calf, cow, or bull; or, if none of these be at hand, with soft and thin thongs or ligaments, cut out of a calf skin.

"Through the loop of the box passes a long leather strap, which ought to be black on the outside, and inside of any colour except red. With this strap the tephillin are bound to the head, so that the little box, including the parchments, rests on the forehead, below the hair, between the eyes, against the pericranium; that the divine precepts may be fixed in the brain, which is supposed to contain the organs of thought and to be the seat of the soul; that there may be more sanctity in prayer; and that the commandments of God may at the same time be confirmed and better observed. The strap is fastened, on the back part of the head, with a knot tied in such a manner as is said to resemble the letter daleth: the ends of the strap pass over the shoulders, and hang down over each breast.

"The Tephillin for the arm, or, as they are frequently denominated, the Tephillin for the hand, are made of a piece of skin or leather, similar to that used in the tephillin for the head, and fastened together in the same manner; except that, being without any partitions, it has only one cavity; nor is the letter shin impressed upon it. The same four passages of Scripture are written on parchment, and enclosed in a hollow piece of skin like the finger of a glove, which is put into the box and sewed to the thick leather of which it consists.

"This little box is placed on the left arm, near the elbow, and fastened by a leather strap, with a noose, to the naked skin, on the inner part of the arm; so that when the arm is bent, the tephillin may touch the flesh of it, and may also stand near the heart, for the fulfilment of the precept, 'Ye shall lay up these words in your heart:' and that the heart, looking upon them, may be abstracted from all corrupt affections and desires, and drawn out into greater fervency of prayer. The strap is twisted several times about the arm, and then three times round the middle finger; by some, three times round three of the fingers: and on the end of it is made the letter jod."

The four sections or paragraphs of the law written on the phylacteries are as follows: (1.) Deut. vi. 4—6. (2.) Deut. xi. 13—21. (3.) Exod. xiii. 1—10. (4.) Exod. xiii. 11—16. These passages in the case of phylacteries for the head are written on four separate pieces of parchment, in the case of phylacteries for the arm they must be all on one piece in four distinct columns. The ink used must be made of galls. The letters must be distinct and separate; written with the right hand. Each section of Scripture must be written in four lines, and distinct regulations are laid down as to the words with which the respective lines are to begin. Before the schedules are put into the box, they are to be carefully read three times over. Every male Jew, when he reaches the age of thirteen years and a day, is considered as now personally responsible for his actions, and for the first time he assumes the phylacteries. The mode in which the Modern Jews put them on is thus described by a writer on the customs and manners of that singular people: "They first take the phylactery for the arm, and having placed it on that part of the left arm which is opposite to the heart, say the following grace: 'Blessed art thou, O Lord, our God, King of the Universe! who hath sanctified us with his commandments, and commanded us to say the Tephillin.' They then instantly, by means of a leather thong which runs through a loop of the case like a noose, fasten it on the arm that it may not slip from thence. They then take the phylactery for the head, and saying the following, 'Blessed art thou, O Lord, our God, King of the Universe! who hath so sanctified us with his commandments, and commanded us the commandment of the Tephillin,' place the case on the forehead on that part where the hair begins to grow, and fasten it by means of a leather thong, which runs through the loop, is carried round the head, and tied behind, where it remains in that position; observing also, at the same time, that it is placed exactly between the eyes. All this is understood by the commandment in the Law: 'And thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thy hand, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes.'"

Every Jew is bound, when reading the Shema in the morning, and saying the nineteen prayers, to put on the phylacteries. He is not required to wear them on the Sabbath and other festivals, the very observance of these being regarded as a sufficient sign in itself according to Exod. xxxi. 12, 13, "And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Speak thou also unto the children of Israel, saying, Verily my Sabbaths ye shall keep: for it is a sign between me and you throughout your generations: that ye may know that I am the Lord that doth sanctify you." Leo Modena says, that men ought continually to wear the phylacteries for the head, but to avoid the scoffs of the nations, among whom they live, and also because they regard these as holy things not to be used on every trivial occasion, they put them on only in the time of prayer.

Among the ancient Christians phylacteries were used, not like those of the Jews, but simply amulets made of ribands, with a text of Scripture written in them, and hung about the neck to cure diseases and ward off dangers. This custom is severely censured by the ancient canons and fathers. Thus the council of Laodicea condemns clergymen that pretended to make such phylacteries, and orders those who wore them to be cast out of the church. The council of Trullo decrees six years' penance for such offenders.

Chrysostom stamps the use of phylacteries as gross idolatry, and threatens to excommunicate every one who should practise it. The church, accordingly, to root out this superstition, which was unhappily too prevalent both among Jewish and Pagan converts, required all candidates for baptism, who wore phylacteries, to renounce the practice altogether.

PHYLLOBOLIA (Gr. phyllon, a leaf, and ballo, to throw), a custom which existed among the ancient heathen nations, of throwing flowers and leaves on the tombs of the dead. The Greek was placed on his funeral bed as if asleep, wearing a white robe and garland, the purple pall half hidden by numberless chaplets, and so was carried out to his burial before the dawn of day. The Romans, deriving the custom from the Greeks, covered the bier and the funeral pile with leaves and flowers. It is a not unfrequent custom, in various parts of England at this day, to spread flowers on and around the body when committing it to the coffin. In Wales, also, when the body is interred, females hasten with their aprons full of flowers to plant them on the grave. The practice of connecting flowers with the dead seems to have been of great antiquity, for an Egyptian of high rank was wont to be carried to his sepulchre in a sarcophagus adorned with the lotus, had his tomb decked with wreaths, and his mummy case painted with acacia leaves and flowers. The use of flowers on such occasions was, no doubt, connected with the idea of a life after death.

PIARISTS, a Romish order of religious founded in A. D. 1648, by Joseph Calasanza, a Spaniard, then residing at Rome. The monks of this order soon became the rivals of the Jesuits as the fathers of the religious schools.

PICARDS, a sect which arose in Flanders about the beginning of the fifteenth century, deriving their name from one Picard, who taught doctrines somewhat resembling those of the ADAMITES (which see). This sect endeavoured to introduce among the Hussites a paradisaic state of nature. They are said to have held their meetings during the night. They gathered a few disciples in Poland, Bohemia, Holland, and even in England, but speedily became extinct.

PICTURE-WORSHIP. See IMAGE-WORSHIP.

PICUMNUS and PILUMNUS, two brothers in the ancient Roman mythology, who presided as gods over marriage. It was customary to prepare a couch for these deities in any house in which there was a new-born child. The first-mentioned god bestowed upon the child health and success in life, while the other warded off all dangers from it during the tender years of childhood.

PICUS, a deity among the ancient Romans who was believed to be a son of Saturn and father of Faunus. According to some traditions he was the first king of Italy. Failing to return the love of Circe she changed him into a woodpecker, retaining still the prophetic powers which he had possessed in his human shape.

PIE, the table used in England, before the Reformation, to find out the service belonging to each day.

PIERIDES, a surname of the Muses, derived from Pieria in Thrace, where they were worshipped.

PIETAS, a personification of affection and veneration among the ancient Romans. She had a temple dedicated to her by Atilius the Duumvir. This goddess is represented in the garb of a Roman matron throwing incense upon an altar, and her symbol is a stork feeding her young.

PIETISTIC CONTROVERSY, a very important religious contention, which took place in Germany towards the end of the seventeenth and the beginning of the eighteenth centuries. It originated in the theological writings and earnest ministerial labours of Philip Jacob Spener, who, proceeding on the principles of Christian experience rather than on doctrinal refinements, and finding fault with the Protestant Church of his time for its dead faith, knowledge without life, forms without spirit, sought earnestly for the renovation of the church, and the infusion of true spiritual life. To accomplish this object which he had so much at heart, he set up private religious meetings first in his own house, and afterwards in the church. These, which were termed COLLEGES OF PIETY (which see), speedily led to an extensive religious awakening. Spener was joined in his pious work by a distinguished lawyer, Christian Thomasius, and devoting himself to the diligent study of the Bible, was instrumental in a high degree in giving a practical direction to the theology of the evangelical church. Francke, also, by his devotional lectures on the New Testament, which were attended by large numbers of students and citizens, aided powerfully the efforts of Spener and his associates. The movement aroused a spirit of bitter hostility in the hearts of multitudes, who branded its zealous originators as Pietists, a term by which they meant to denounce them as pious well-meaning enthusiasts. And not limiting their hatred to mere verbal reproaches, many both of the clergy and laity commenced an active persecution, which compelled Spener and his friends to leave Leipsic in 1690, and to repair to Halle, where the controversy assumed an entirely new aspect. The almost exclusively practical form which the Pietistic theology assumed to the neglect of abstract points of doctrine, roused many opponents not only among the worldly, but even the orthodox, who exclaimed against this new sect, as they termed it, denouncing its theology as an apostasy from the faith of the fathers.

The cardinal doctrine on which the Pietists were considered as deviating from the Word of God, was that of justification by faith, looking, as their opponents alleged, to the subjective, and not at all to the objective element of faith. In exhibiting a tendency of this kind they showed themselves indifferent as to the objects of knowledge, the confession of the church, and theological science. And even on the subject of the order which the Spirit follows in the work of conversion, they were also regarded as having fallen into error. Thus they asserted that the process commences with a change in the volitions of a man, while their theological opponents maintained that the teaching both of Scripture and the symbolical books of the church, declared the illumination of the understanding to be the first step. The cry of heresy now waxed louder and louder; the passions of the people were appealed to, and even the civil courts were called upon to interpose in order to put down the obnoxious Pietists. Their zeal, however, seemed only to gather strength from opposition. They now asserted that none but converted men should be allowed to undertake the ministerial office, and that religion must be regarded as consisting rather in devotional feelings than in doctrinal belief.

In their expositions of Sacred Scripture they dwelt much on the prospects which they believed to be held out of a millennial kingdom, and some of them seem even to have taught the doctrine of a final restoration of all mankind to the everlasting favour and fellowship of God. As time rolled on, the opposition offered to Pietistic theology became less violent, and about 1720 had almost lost its activity. But the system itself was undergoing, at the same time, a gradual deterioration, and at length appeared to be merely a languid religion of feeling, and, in some cases, a system of legality and ceremony. "Registers," says Dr. Hase, "were kept for souls, and many idle persons supported themselves comfortably by using the new language respecting breaking into the kingdom, and the sealing of believers, while serious-minded persons were utterly unfitted for their ordinary social duties, until in despair they committed suicide."

One of the chief seats of Pietism in Germany, throughout the eighteenth and the first half of the nineteenth century, has always been Würtemberg. The earlier leaders of this school were Bengel and Oettinger, and the more recent preachers belonging to it are the two Hofackers, Kapff, Knapp, and Bahrdt. "These Pietists of Würtemberg," says Dr. Schaff, "occupied, for a long time, a position in the Lutheran Church similar to that of the early Methodists in the Anglican communion, and the government wisely tolerated them. They held, and still hold, separate prayer-meetings, mostly conducted by laymen (the so-called Stundenhalter, a sort of class leaders, of whom the late Hoffmann and Kullen, of Kornthal, were the most able and popular); but they attended at the same time faithfully the public services, received the sacraments at the hands of the regularly ordained ministers, and, with the exception of the congregations of Kornthal and Wilhelmsdorf, never seceded from the Established Church, preferring rather to remain in its bosom as a wholesome leaven. Thus they proved a blessing to it, and kept the lamp of faith burning in a period of spiritual darkness. By and by, the church itself awoke from the cold and dreary winter of indifferentism and rationalism, introduced a better hymn-book and liturgy, and began to take part in the benevolent operations of Christianity, heretofore carried on almost exclusively by the Pietists, such as the domestic and foreign missionary cause, the support of poor houses, and orphan asylums. Since this revival of the church, the Pietists have themselves become more churchly, and given up or modified their former peculiarities, but without falling in with the symbolical Lutheranism, as it prevails now in the neighbouring kingdom of Bavaria, and in some parts of Northern Germany."

PIETISTS (CATHOLIC), a name which was applied to the Brethren and Sisters of the Pious and Christian schools founded by Nicholas Barre in 1678. They devoted themselves to the education of poor children of both sexes.

PIKOLLOS, a deity among the ancient Wends of Slavonia, who was believed to preside over the infernal regions and the realms of the dead. He was represented as an old man with a pale countenance, and having before him three death-heads. He corresponded to Pluto of the ancient Romans, and to Shiva of the Hindus. Like the latter he desires human blood, and reigns at once over the manes or souls of the dead, and over the metals in the bowels of the earth.

PILGRIMAGES, exercises of religious discipline which consisted in journeying to some place of reputed sanctity, and frequently in discharge of a vow. The idea of any peculiar sacredness being attached to special localities under the Christian dispensation was very strikingly rebuked by our blessed Lord in his conversation with the woman of Samaria, as recorded in John iv.; and nowhere is the principle on this subject more plainly laid down than in the statements of Jesus on that occasion, "The hour cometh when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father." "The hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth: for the Father seeketh such to worship him." In proportion, however, as Christianity receded from the apostolic age, it gradually lost sight of the simplicity and spirituality which marked its primitive character, and availed itself of carnal expedients for the purpose of elevating the imagination, and kindling the devotion of its votaries. Hence, in the fourth century, many, encouraged by the example of the Emperor Constantine, whose superstitious tendencies were strong, resorted to the scenes of our Saviour's life and ministry, as likely to thereby nourish and invigorate their religious feelings and desires.

Helena, the mother of Constantine, set the first example of a pilgrimage to Palestine, which was soon extensively imitated; partly, as in the case of Constantine, with a desire to be baptized in the Jordan, but still more from a veneration for the spots which were associated with the events of the history of our

Shrine of Raiwana Shah Daula, Etlichpur,

Lord and his apostles. Thus a superstitious attachment to the Holy Land increased so extensively, that some of the most eminent teachers of the church, as Jerome and Gregory of Nyssa, openly discouraged these pilgrimages. The most frequent resort of pilgrims was to Jerusalem, but to this were afterwards added Rome, Tours, and Compostella.

In the Middle Ages pilgrimages were regarded as a mark of piety, but as might have been expected, they gave rise to the most flagrant abuses. We find, accordingly, Pope Boniface, in a letter to Cuthbert, archbishop of Canterbury, in the eighth century, desiring that women and nuns might be restrained from their frequent pilgrimages to Rome. The second council of Chalons, also, which was held in A. D. 813, denounces, in no measured terms, the false trust reposed in pilgrimages to Rome and to the church of St. Martin at Tours. "There are clergymen," complains this ecclesiastical synod, "who lead an idle life, and trust thereby to be purified from sin, and to fulfil the duties of their calling; and there are laymen who believe that they may sin, or have sinned, with impunity, because they undertake such pilgrimages; there are great men who, under this pretext, practise the grossest extortion among their people; and there are poor men who employ the same excuse to render begging a more profitable employment. Such are those who wander round about, and falsely declare that they are on a pilgrimage; while there are others whose folly is so great, that they believe that they become purified from their sins by the mere sight of holy places, forgetting the words of St. Jerome, who says, that there is nothing meritorious in seeing Jerusalem, but in leading a good life there."

It was between the eleventh and the thirteenth centuries, however, that the rage for pilgrimages came to its height. About the commencement of the period now referred to, an idea extensively prevailed throughout Europe, that the thousand years mentioned in the Apocalypse were near their close, and the end of the world was at hand. A general consternation spread among all classes, and many individuals, parting with their property and abandoning their friends and families, set out for the Holy Land, where they imagined that Christ would appear to judge the world. While Palestine had been in the hands of the caliphs, pilgrimages to Jerusalem had been encouraged as affording them an ample source of revenue. But no sooner had Syria been conquered by the Turks, in the middle of the eleventh century, than pilgrims to the Holy Land began to be exposed to every species of insult. The minds of men, in every part of Christendom, were now inflamed with indignation at the cruelties and oppressions of the Mohammedan possessors of the holy places; and in such circumstances, Peter the Hermit found little difficulty in originating the Crusades, which for two centuries poured vast armies of pilgrims into the Holy Land. It was easier for the Crusaders, however, to make their conquests than to preserve them; and, accordingly, before the thirteenth century had passed away, the Christians were driven out of all their Asiatic possessions, and the holy places fell anew into the hands of the Infidels.

In almost every country where Romanism prevails, pilgrimages are common. In England, at one time, the shrine of Thomas à Becket, and in Scotland that of St. Andrew, was the favourite resort of devout pilgrims. But even down to the present day there are various places in Ireland where stations and holy wells attract crowds of devout worshippers every year.

And not only in Romish, but in Mohammedan countries, pilgrimages are much in vogue. But there is one pilgrimage, that to Mecca, which is not only expressly commanded in the Koran, but regarded by the Arabian prophet as so indispensable to all his followers, that, in his view, a believer neglecting this duty, if it were in his power to perform it, might as well die a Christian or a Jew. (See MECCA, PILGRIMAGE TO.) The Persians, however, instead of subjecting themselves to a toilsome pilgrimage to Mecca, look upon the country, of which Babylon formerly, and now Bagdad is the chief city, as the holy land in which are deposited the ashes of Ali and the rest of their holy martyrs. And not only do the living resort thither, but many bring along with them the dead bodies of their relatives, to lay them in the sacred earth. Pilgrimage is a duty binding upon all Moslems, both men and women. Inability is the only admitted ground of exemption, and Mohammedan casuists have determined that those who are incapable, must perform it by deputy and bear his charges. The pilgrimage to Mecca was interrupted for a quarter of a century by the Carmathians, and in our own day it has been again interrupted by the Wahabees, and these in turn have been defeated by Mohammed Ali, who revived the pilgrimage and attended with his court.

Among some heathen nations, also, pilgrimages are practised. In Japan, more especially, all the different sects have their regular places of resort. The pilgrimage which is esteemed by the Sintoists as the most meritorious, is that of Ise, which all are bound to make once a-year, or at least once in their life. Another class of pilgrims are the Siunse, who go to visit in pilgrimage the thirty-three principal temples of CANON (which see), which are scattered over the empire. Besides these regular pilgrimages, the Japanese also undertake occasional religious journeys to visit certain temples in fulfilment of certain vows. These pilgrims travel alone, almost always running, and, though generally very poor, refuse to receive charity from others.

Hinduism has its pilgrimages on a grand scale. Thousands and tens of thousands annually repair to the temple of Juggernaut in Orissa. And equally famed as the resort of multitudes of Hindu pilgrims is the island of Ganga Sagor, where the holiest branch of the Ganges is lost in the waters of the Indian Ocean. To visit this sacred river hundreds of thousands annually abandon their homes, and travel for months amid many hardships and dangers, and should they reach the scene of their pilgrimage, it is only in many cases that they may plunge themselves and their unconscious babes into the troubled, but, in their view, purifying waters, offering themselves and their little ones as voluntary victims to the holy river. Among the numberless sacred spots in Hindustan, may be mentioned Jumnootri, a village on the banks of the Jumna, which is so famed as a place of pilgrimage that those who resort thither are considered as thereby almost entitled to divine honours. The holy town of Hurdwar may also be noticed, to which pilgrims resort from every corner of the East where Hinduism is known; and of such efficacy is the water of the Ganges at this point, that even the guiltiest may be cleansed from sin by a single ablution.

The Buddhists, though not so devoted to pilgrimages as the Hindus, are not without their places of sacred resort. One of the most noted is Adam's Peak in Ceylon, where Gotama Budha is supposed to have left the impression of his foot. The summit of the peak is annually visited by great numbers of pilgrims. The Lamaists of Thibet also make an annual pilgrimage to Lha Ssa for devotional purposes.

PILGRIMS, those who make a journey to holy places as a religious duty, to worship at the shrine of some dead saint, or to pay homage to some sacred relics. The word is derived from the Flemish pilgrim, or the Italian pelegrino, both of which may be traced to the Latin peregrinus, a stranger or traveller.

PILGRIMS (Poor), a Romish order of religious, which originated about A. D. 1500. They commenced in Italy, but passed into Germany, where they wandered about as mendicants, barefooted and bareheaded.

PILLAR-SAINTS, devotees who stood on the tops of lofty pillars for many years in fulfilment of religious vows. The first who originated this practice was Simeon, a native of Sisan in Syria, who was born about A. D. 390. In early youth he entered a monastery near Antioch, where he devoted himself to the most rigid exercises of mortification and abstinence. Having been expelled from the monastery for his excessive austerities, he retired to the adjacent mountain, where he took up his residence first in a cave, then in a little cell, where he immured himself for three years. Next he removed to the top of a mountain, where he chained himself to a rock for several years. His fame had now become so great, that crowds of visitors thronged to see him. "Incommoded by the pressure of the crowd," we are told, "he erected a pillar on which he might stand, elevated at first six cubits, and ending with forty. The top of the pillar was three feet in diameter, and surrounded with a balustrade. Here he stood day and night in all weathers. Through the night and till nine A. M. he was constantly in prayer, often spreading forth his hands and bowing so low that his forehead touched his toes. A by-stander once attempted to count the number of these successive prostrations, and he counted till they amounted to 1244. At nine o'clock A. M. he began to address the admiring crowd below, to hear and answer their questions, to send messages and write letters, &c. for he took concern in the welfare of all the churches, and corresponded with bishops and even with emperors. Towards evening he suspended his intercourse with this world, and betook himself again to converse with God till the following day. He generally ate but once a week, never slept, wore a long sheep-skin robe and a cap of the same. His beard was very long, and his frame extremely emaciated. In this manner he is reported to have spent thirty-seven years, and at last, in his sixty-ninth year, to have expired unobserved in a praying attitude, in which no one ventured to disturb him till after three days, when Antony, his disciple and biographer, mounting the pillar, found that his spirit had departed, and his holy body was emitting a delightful odour. His remains were borne in great pomp to Antioch, in order to be the safeguard of that unwall'd town, and innumerable miracles were performed at his shrine. His pillar also was so venerated that it was literally enclosed with chapels and monasteries for some ages. Simeon was so averse from women that he never allowed one to come within the sacred precincts of his pillar. Even his own mother was debarred this privilege till after her death, when her corpse was brought to him, and he now restored her to life for a short time, that she might see him and converse with him a little before she ascended to heaven."

Another Simeon Stylites is mentioned by Evagrius as having lived in the sixth century. In his childhood he mounted his pillar near Antioch, and is said to have occupied it sixty-eight years. The example of Simeon was afterwards followed, to a certain extent at least, by many persons in Syria and Palestine, and pillar-saints were found in the East, even in the twelfth century, when the Stylites, as they were termed by the Greeks, were abolished. This order of saints never found a footing in the West, and when one Wulilaicus attempted to commence the practice in the German territory of Treves, the neighbouring bishops destroyed his pillar, and prevented him from carrying his purpose into effect.

PILLARS (CONSECRATED). From the most remote ages the practice has been found to prevail of setting up stones of memorial to preserve the remembrance of important events. The first instance mentioned in Scripture is that of the stone which Jacob set up at Bethel, and which he consecrated by anointing it with oil to serve not only as a memorial of the vision which he saw on that favoured spot, but as a witness of the solemn engagement into which he entered. We find a pillar and a heap of stones made the memorials of a compact of peace ratified between Jacob and Laban. Moses, also, at the foot of Mount Sinai, built an altar, and set up twelve pillars representing the twelve tribes of Israel, in token of the covenant which they there made with God. For a similar reason Joshua took a great stone in Shechem, and "set it up under an oak that was by the sanctuary of the Lord." This pillar of stone was designed to be an enduring monument of the great transaction in which the Israelites had just been engaged.

Sometimes stone pillars were erected to mark the burying-place of some relative, of which we have a remarkable instance in the pillar which Jacob erected over the grave of his beloved Rachel. Among the ancient Greeks and Romans the same custom appears to have existed. Among the Slavonic nations of the North such sepulchral stones, marking the resting-place of the dead, are found in great numbers. There are the rough-hewn memorial stones or cromlechs of the northern hordes, an intermediate link between the simple mound of earth and the gorgeous mausoleum of more modern days. To the rude stone pillars of earlier times succeeded the sculptured obelisks of later ages. In Egypt, in India, in Persia, such indications of a higher civilization have been found in great abundance. And what are the towering stone pyramids of Egypt but only gigantic mausoleums containing vaulted chambers, a sarcophagus, and mouldering bones?

The substitution of the rude for the sculptured pillar took place among the Israelites probably at the introduction among them of the government of kings; and it is not unlikely that the monument by which Saul commemorated his victory over the Amalekites may have been a more polished and artistic structure than the simple pillars of earlier times. Traces of such refined monuments are still found chiefly in the northern part of the Phœnician territory. It has been generally supposed that the Egyptian pillars or obelisks were dedicated to the sun. "This, however," says Sir John Gardner Wilkinson, "is a misconception not difficult to explain. The first obelisks removed from Egypt to Rome were said to have come from Heliopolis, 'the city of the sun,' which stood in Lower Egypt, a little to the south-east of the Delta; and those of Heliopolis being dedicated to Rê, the divinity of the place, the Romans were led to conclude that all others belonged to the same god. But the obelisks of Thebes were ascribed to Amun, the presiding deity of that city, and though several of those at Rome came from Thebes, and were therefore dedicated to Amun, the first impressions were too strong to be removed, and the notion of their exclusive appropriation to the sun continued, and has been repeated to the present day."

Consecrated pillars were probably the most ancient monuments of idolatry, and, accordingly, the Israelites were forbidden to set them up as objects of worship. Thus they were enjoined in Lev. xxvi. 1, "Ye shall make you no idols nor graven image, neither rear you up a standing image, neither shall ye set up any image of stone in your land, to bow down unto it: for I am the Lord your God." Vossius, in his erudite work, 'De Idololatria,' informs us, that Jacob's stone-pillar was held in great veneration in after times, and was removed by the Jews to Jerusalem. After the destruction of that city by Titus, it is alleged that the Jews were permitted, on a particular day, to anoint the stone with great lamentations and expressions of sorrow. Bochart asserts that the Phœnicians first worshipped Jacob's stone, and afterwards consecrated others, which they called Betulia, in memory of Bethel, where Jacob anointed the stone. See STONE-WORSHIP.

PIMPLEIS, a surname of the Muses derived from Mount Pimplea in Bœotia, which was sacred to them.

PINARII, a family of hereditary priests of Hercules among the ancient Romans. They were inferior to the Potitii, another family who were devoted to the worship of the same god. The Pinarii are mentioned as existing in the time of the kings.

PINCZOVIAN, a name which was given to the SOCINIANS (which see) in Poland in the sixteenth century, derived from the town of Pinczow, where the leaders of the sect resided.

PIRIT, a ceremony among the Budhists of Ceylon, which consists in reading certain portions of the BANA (which see), for the purpose of appeasing the demons called yakas, from whom all the afflictions of men are supposed to proceed. This ceremony, which is the only one that professes to be sanctioned by Gotama Budha, is thus described by Mr. Spence Hardy, in his 'Eastern Monachism:' "About sunset numbers of persons arrived from different quarters, the greater proportion of whom were women, bringing with them cocoanut shells and oil, to be presented as offerings. As darkness came on, the shells were placed in niches in the wall of the court by which the wihâra is surrounded; and by the aid of the oil and a little cotton they were soon converted into lamps. The wall around the bô-tree was similarly illuminated; and as many of the people had brought torches, composed of cotton and resinous substances, the whole of the sacred enclosure was in a blaze of light. The gay attire and merry countenances of the various groups that were seen in every direction gave evidence, that however solemn the professed object for which they were assembled together, it was regarded by all as a time of relaxation and festivity. Indeed the grand cause of the popularity of this and similar gatherings is, that they are the only occasion, marriage festivals excepted, upon which the young people can see and be seen, or upon which they can throw off the reserve and restraint it is their custom to observe in the ordinary routine of social intercourse.

"The service continues during seven days, a preparatory ceremony being held on the evening of the first day. The edifice in which it is conducted is the same as that in which the banna is read upon other occasions. A relic of Budha, enclosed in a casket, is placed upon a platform erected for the purpose; and the presence of this relic is supposed to give the same efficacy to the proceedings as though the great sage were personally there. For the priests who are to officiate another platform is prepared; and at the conclusion of the preparatory service a sacred thread called the pirit nūla is fastened round the interior of the building, the end of which, after being fastened to the reading platform, is placed near the relic. At such times as the whole of the priests who are present engage in chanting in chorus, the cord is untwined, and each priest takes hold of it, thus making the communication complete between each of the officiating priests, the relic, and the interior walls of the building.

"From the commencement of the service on the morning of the second day, until its conclusion on the evening of the seventh day, the reading platform is never to be vacated day or night. For this reason, when the two officiating priests are to be relieved by others, one continues sitting and reading whilst the other gives his seat to his successor, and the second priest does not effect his exchange until the new one has commenced reading. In the same way, from the morning of the second day till the morning of the seventh day, the reading is continued day and night, without intermission. Not fewer than twelve, and in general twenty-four, priests are in attendance, two of whom are constantly officiating. As they are relieved every two hours, each priest has to officiate two hours out of the twenty-four. In addition to this, all the priests engaged in the ceremony are collected three times in each day: viz. at sunrise, at midday, and at sunset, when they chant in chorus the three principal discourses of the Pirit, called respectively Mangala, Ratana, and Karaniya, with a short selection of verses from other sources. After this the reading is continued till the series of discourses has been read through, when they are begun again, no other than those in the first series being read until the sixth day, when a new series is commenced.

"On the morning of the seventh day a grand procession is formed of armed and unarmed men, and a person is appointed to officiate as the dēwadūtayā, or messenger of the gods. This company, with a few of the priests, proceeds to some place where the gods are supposed to reside, inviting them to attend prior to the conclusion of the service, that they may partake of its benefits. Until the messenger and his associates return, the officiating priests remain seated, but the reading is suspended.

"At the festival I attended the messenger was introduced with great state, and sulphur was burnt before him to make his appearance the more supernatural. One of the priests having proclaimed that the various orders of gods and demons were invited to be present, the messenger replied that he had been deputed by such and such deities, repeating their names, to say that they would attend. The threefold protective formula, which forms part of the recitation, was spoken by all present, in grand chorus. In the midst of much that is superstitious in practice or utterly erroneous in doctrine, there are some advices repeated of an excellent tendency; but the whole ceremony being conducted in a language that the people do not understand, no beneficial result can be produced by its performance."

Such is the ceremony attending the reading of the ritual of priestly exorcism. This ritual is called Piravānā pota. It is written in the Pali language, and consists of extracts from the sacred books, the recital of which, accompanied with certain attendant ceremonies, is intended to ward off evil and to bring prosperity.

PIRKE AVOTH (Heb. the hedge of the law), a name given by the Jewish Rabbis to the MASORA (which see), from the circumstance, that it is intended to hedge in or secure the law from all manner of change.

PISCICULI (Lat. little fishes), a name which the early Christians sometimes assumed, to denote, as Tertullian alleges, that they were born again into Christianity by water, and could not be saved but by continuing therein. Perhaps it may have a reference to the ICHTHUS (which see).

PISCINA (Lat. piscis, a fish), a name sometimes applied to the font in early Christian churches. The word is supposed by Optatus to have been used in allusion to our Saviour's technical name ICHTHUS (which see). But as piscina denoted among the Latin writers a bath or pool, it is on that account alone an appropriate name for a font. In the Romish Church the word piscina means the sink or cesspool where the priest empties the water in which he washes his hands, and where he pours out all the consecrated waste stuff. In the Church of England the piscina is explained by Dr. Hook to mean "a perforation in the wall of the church through which the water is poured away with which the chalice is rinsed out after the celebration of the Holy Eucharist."

PISCIS. See ICHTHUS.

PISTOL. See BELIEVERS.

PISTOR (Lat. the baker), a surname of Jupiter at Rome, derived from the circumstance, that while the Gauls were besieging that city, the god suggested to the Romans that by throwing loaves of bread among the enemy they might lead them to raise the siege, under the impression that the besieged were possessed of ample provisions to hold out against them.

PISTIUS, a surname of Zeus, as being the god of faith and fidelity. It corresponds to the Latin Fidius.

PISTORES (Lat. bakers), a term of reproach applied to the early Christians in consequence of their poverty and simplicity.

PITAKA, or PITAKATTAYAN (Pali, pitalan, a basket, and tāyo, three), the sacred books of the Budhists. The text of the Pitaka is divided into three great classes. The instructions contained in the first class, called Winaya, were addressed to the priests; those in the second class, Sūtra, to the laity; and those in the third class, Abhidharma, to the déwas and brahmas of the celestial worlds. There is a commentary called the Atthakathā, which, until recently, was regarded as of equal authority with the text. The text, as we learn from Mr. Spence Hardy, was orally preserved until the reign of the Singhalese monarch, Wattagamani, who reigned from B. C. 104 to B. C. 76, when it was committed to writing in the island of Ceylon. The Commentary was written by Buddhagosa in A. D. 420. To establish the text of the Pitakas, three several convocations were held. The first met B. C. 543, when the whole was rehearsed, every syllable being repeated with the utmost precision, and an authentic version established, though not committed to writing. The second convocation was held in B. C. 443, when the whole was again rehearsed in consequence of certain usages having sprung up contrary to the teachings of Budha. The third convocation took place B. C. 308, when the Pitakas were again rehearsed without either retrenchment or addition. These sacred books are of immense size, containing, along with the Commentary, nearly 2,000,000 lines. See BANA, BUDHISTS.

PITANATIS, a surname of Artemis, derived from Pitana in Laconia, where she was worshipped.

PIUS IV. (CREED OF). This document, which forms one of the authorized standards of the Church of Rome, was prepared by Pope Pius IV, immediately after the rising of the council of Trent, and is understood to embody in substance the decisions of that council. The Creed bears date November 1561, and was no sooner issued than it was immediately received throughout the Romish Church, and since that time it has been always considered as an accurate summary of their faith. It is binding upon all clergymen, doctors, teachers, heads of universities, and of monastic institutions, and military orders, with all reconciled converts. This authoritative document, with the oath or promise appended, runs as follows:—

“ I. I most steadfastly admit and embrace the Apostolical and Ecclesiastical Traditions, and all other observances and constitutions of the same church.

“ II. I also admit the Sacred Scriptures, according to that sense which Holy Mother Church has held, and does hold, to whom it appertains to judge of the true sense and interpretation of the Holy Scriptures; neither will I ever take and interpret them otherwise than according to the unanimous consent of the Fathers.

“ III. I also profess that there are, truly and properly, seven Sacraments of the new law, instituted by Jesus Christ our Lord, and necessary for the salvation of mankind, though not all for every one; to wit, Baptism, Confirmation, Eucharist, Penance, Extreme Unction, Orders, and Matrimony, and that they confer grace; and that of these Baptism, Confirmation, and Orders, cannot be reiterated without sacrilege; and I also receive and admit the received and approved ceremonies of the Catholic Church used in the solemn administration of all the aforesaid Sacraments.

“ IV. I embrace and receive all and every one of the things which have been defined and declared in the Holy Council of Trent concerning original sin and justification.

“ V. I profess, likewise, that in the Mass there is offered unto God a true, proper, and propitiatory sacrifice for the living and the dead; and that in the most holy Sacrament of the Eucharist, there are truly, really, and substantially the body and blood, together with the soul and divinity, of our Lord Jesus Christ; and that there is made a conversion of the whole substance of the bread into the body, and of the whole substance of the wine into the blood; which conversion the Catholic Church calls Transubstantiation.

“ VI. I also confess, that under either kind alone, Christ is received whole and entire, and a true Sacrament.

“ VII. I constantly hold that there is a Purgatory, and that the souls therein detained are helped by the suffrages of the faithful.

“ VIII. Likewise, that the saints, reigning together with Christ, are to be honoured and invocated; and that they offer prayers to God for us, and that their Relics are to be venerated.

“ IX. I most firmly assert that the Images of Christ, and of the Mother of God, ever Virgin, and also of other saints, are to be had and retained; and that due honour and veneration are to be given to them.

“ X. I also affirm that the power of Indulgences was left by Christ in the church, and that the use of them is most wholesome to Christian people.

“ XI. I acknowledge the Holy Catholic and Apostolic Roman Church, to be the mother and mistress of all churches; and I promise and swear true obedience to the Bishop of Rome, successor to St. Peter, Prince of the Apostles, and Vicar of Jesus Christ.

“ XII. I likewise undoubtedly receive and profess all other things delivered, defined, and declared by the sacred Canons and general Councils, and particularly by the holy Council of Trent; and I condemn, reject, and anathematize all things contrary thereto, and all heresies which the church has condemned, rejected, and anathematized.

“ I, N. N., do at this present freely profess and sincerely hold this true Catholic faith, out of which no one can be saved; and I promise most constantly to retain and confess the same entire and inviolate, with God's assistance, to the end of my life. And I will take care, as far as in me lies, that it shall be held, taught, and preached by my subjects, or by those, the care of whom shall appertain to me in my office; this I vow, promise, and swear—so help me God and these Holy Gospels of God!"

PLACEBO, an office or service in the Romish Church, performed for the health and good estate of some soul or souls; so called from the word Placebo, being the first word of the office.

PLANET-WORSHIP. See ISABIANS.

PLANETA, a gown, the same as the chasuble, worn by the Romish priesthood; a kind of cape open only at the sides, worn at mass.

PLENARY INDULGENCES, those indulgences which, according to the Romish Church, release the individual from all the pains and penalties incurred by him on account of sin up to the time of receiving the boon. The exact date of the introduction of these indulgences has not been ascertained; but Pope Urban II., at the council of Clermont in A. D. 1095, declared that to every one who should join the crusades for driving the Saracens out of Palestine, his doing so should be reckoned as a full discharge of all the penances which he might have incurred, and he should also acquire the remission of all the punishment to which he might have become subject by the sins of his whole life. When the crusades, however, had ceased, plenary indulgences by no means ceased with them, but the system came to be applied to other cases. If a bishop wished any work to be accomplished, as, for instance, a church to be repaired, an episcopal palace to be built, or the like, he simply proclaimed a plenary indulgence, and immediately he found abundance of willing labourers. The most trifling services were often purchased with indulgences, and in this way the ancient discipline and system of penance was completely relaxed. The abuses which had thus arisen called for some remedy, and, accordingly, Gregory VII. and Urban II. pointed the attention of the clergy to the distinction between true and false penitence; while Innocent III., by a special decree, endeavoured to restrain the bishops from the indiscreet granting of indulgences.

The system of plenary indulgences was no sooner introduced than it was adopted by many successive popes. Thus we find it resorted to by Calixtus II. in A. D. 1122; by Eugenius III. in A. D. 1145; by Pope Clement III. in A. D. 1195. Boniface VIII., in the Bull which announced the Jubilee of A. D. 1300, granted not only a plenary and larger, but a most plenary remission of sins to those who should visit the churches of the apostles. "It is worth while," says Dr. Stillinger, "to understand the difference between a plenary, larger, and most plenary, indulgence; since Bellarmine tells us, that a plenary indulgence takes away all the punishment due to sin. But these were the fittest terms to let the people know that they should have as much for their money as was to be had; and what could they desire more? And although Bellarmine abhors the name of selling indulgences, yet it comes all to one: the popes give indulgences, and they give money; or they do it not by way of purchase, but by way of alms. But commend me to the plain honesty of Boniface IX., who, being not satisfied with the oblations of Rome, sent abroad his jubilees to Cologne, Magdeburg, and other cities, but also sent his collectors to take his share of money that was gathered, without which, as Gobelius saith, no indulgences were to be had; who also informs us, that the preachers of the indulgences told the people, in order to encourage them to purchase, that they were not only a pœna, but a culpa, that is, they not only delivered from temporal, but from the fault itself which deserved eternal punishment. This made the people look into them, and not finding those terms, but only the words 'a most plenary remission,' they were dissatisfied, because they were told that the fault could be forgiven by God alone; but if they could but once find that the Pope would undertake to clear all scores with God for them, they did not doubt but they would be worth their money. Whereupon he saith, those very terms were put into them. Then the wiser men thought these were counterfeit, and made only by the pardon-mongers; but, upon further inquiry, they found it otherwise. How far this trade of indulgences was improved afterwards, the Reformation, to which they gave rise, will be a lasting monument." Dr. Lingard, the Roman Catholic historian, endeavours to explain away these plenary indulgences, by alleging them to be merely exemptions from certain canonical penances to which their sins would have otherwise exposed them. See INDULGENCE.

PLENARY INSPIRATION, an expression used to denote the full inspiration of the Sacred Writings, as extending not only to the thoughts of the writers, but even to the very words in which their thoughts are expressed. See INSPIRATION.

PLOUGHING FESTIVAL. See AGRICULTURE (FESTIVAL OF).

PLUNTERIA, a festival anciently celebrated at Athens every year in honour of Athena. It was believed to be an unlucky day, because the statue of the goddess was covered over and carefully concealed from the view of men. A procession was held on this day, and a quantity of dried figs was carried about. If any undertaking was commenced on the day of the Plunteria, the belief was that it must certainly fail.

PLURALIST, an ecclesiastic who holds more than one benefice with cure of souls. In the early Christian Church the existence of pluralities was unknown. St. Ambrose, indeed, expressly declares, that it was not lawful for a bishop to have two churches; and although, in some cases, the paucity of ministers might render it necessary for a presbyter or deacon to officiate in more than one parochial church, he was not on that account entitled to draw the revenues of these churches. Thus there might be in those early ages a plurality of offices in the same dioceses, but there could not be a plurality of benefices yielding separate sources of income to the same officiating minister. The council of Chalcedon has a peremptory canon forbidding all such pluralities, not only in the case of churches, but also in the case of monasteries. This rule continued in force long after the council of Chalcedon, and was renewed in the second council of Nice, as well as in other later councils.

The system of pluralities which prevails so extensively in the Church of England had its origin in an obsolete law which empowered a poor clergyman, with the consent of his bishop, to hold two or more livings under the nominal value of £8 sterling. By the canon law no two livings could be held conjunctly, if the distance between them exceeded thirty miles; but for a century past the distance has been regarded as extending to forty-five miles. In consequence of the operation of this system more than 2,000 parishes in England have been deprived of the right of possessing resident incumbents.

Pluralities have seldom been permitted to any great extent in Presbyterian churches. The only form, indeed, in which the question ever came before the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, was that of a professorship being joined to a parochial charge near the seat of a University. In this shape the subject was discussed in three successive Assemblies, commencing with that of 1824, and although a majority decided in favour of the double office, the University Commission having expressed their opposition to pluralities as injuriously affecting the interests of education, the system, without any express enactment on the part of the church, has been dropped, except in a very few cases of parish ministers at University seats, who act as professors.

PLUTON, the deity among the ancient Greeks who was believed to bestow wealth. It was also a name given to the god of the infernal regions.

PLUTUS, the personification of riches among the ancient Greeks, who had a legend that Zeus had blinded him in order that he might give riches without regard to merit.

PLUVIUS, a surname of Jupiter among the ancient Romans as the deity who sends rain, and hence they worshipped him specially in times of drought.

PNEUMATOMACHI, a name given to the MACEDONIANS (which see), as denying the divinity of the Holy Spirit.

PODONIPTE, (Gr. pous, podos, a foot, and nipto, to wash), a term used to designate a party of the MENNONITES (which see), because they believed that it was imperative upon the disciples of Christ in every age to wash the feet of their guests in token of their love.

PCENA, a personification of punishment among the ancient Romans, and allied to the Furies.

POLAND (EASTERN CHURCH OF). The empire of Lithuania in Poland, included from the thirteenth century a large population which had been converted to Christianity in connection with the Greek Church. This population, inhabiting the Western Russian principalities, had been added to the empire by conquest, and were allowed to retain the undisturbed enjoyment of their religion, language, and local customs. The Lithuanian sovereigns appointed as governors of these provinces princes of the reigning family, who themselves became converts to the Eastern or Greek Church. This was particularly the case with the sons of Ghedimin in the fourteenth century, who were intrusted with these provinces. Their father remained throughout life a Pagan idolater, but his son, Olgherd, who succeeded him, was baptized into the Greek Church. He attended Christian worship at Kioff and other towns of his Russian possessions, built churches and convents, and was prayed for by his Christian subjects as a believer in the orthodox faith; and yet, with a strange inconsistency, when at Wilna, the capital of Lithuania Proper, he sacrificed to the national idols, and adored the sacred fire. Several of his sons were baptized and educated in the tenets of the Greek Church, but Jaghellon, his successor on the throne, was brought up in the Pagan idolatry of his ancestors. He became a convert, however, in 1386 to the creed of the Western church, but Paganism lingered in Lithuania for a considerable time after the conversion of its sovereign. This was particularly the case in Samogitia, where the last sacred grove was not cut down, and idolatry finally abolished, before 1420.

The union between the Eastern and Western churches, which was completed at Florence in 1438, was resisted by the Lithuanian churches, though it was urged upon them by several of their own prelates. The difficult task was intrusted to the Jesuits of inducing the Eastern Church of Poland to submit to the supremacy of Rome. To accomplish this work they published various writings in favour of the union of Florence, and used every effort to gain over to their cause the most influential of the clergy. They found a ready tool to serve their purposes in a Lithuanian noble, called Michael Rahoza, who, though trained by themselves, had taken orders in the Greek Church, and at their recommendation had been appointed archbishop of Kioff. This dignitary of the Greek Church was supplied by the Jesuits with written instructions how he was most effectually to bring about the desired union of his church with Rome. Thus trained for his work the archbishop of Kioff, in 1590, convened a synod of his clergy at Brest in Lithuania, and urged upon them, with every argument he could command, the importance of submitting to the Roman see. The clergy were strongly impressed in favour of the proposal, but it met with the most strenuous opposition on the part of the lity. Another synod was convened at Brest in 1594, which was attended with greater success. The subject having been fully discussed, the archbishop and several bishops declared their agreement with the union concluded at Florence in 1433, admitting the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father and the Son, the doctrine of purgatory, and the supremacy of the Pope; while they declared their determination to retain the use of the Slavonic language in the celebration of public worship, and the retention of the ritual, as well as the discipline of the Eastern Church. The only condition they made was, that in their worship they might retain the Slavonic language, and observe the ceremonies of the Slavonic ritual. This party received the name of Uniates or United Greeks, and about 3,500,000 are still to be found in the Austrian dominions. The announcement that the union had been accomplished was received by Pope Clement VIII. with the highest satisfaction. Another synod was convened at Brest by royal edict in 1596 for the purpose of inaugurating the union. At this synod the event was solemnly proclaimed, and all who had opposed the union were excommunicated. The laity, however, headed by Prince Ostrogki, palatine of Kioff, declared against the measure, and a numerous meeting took place of the clergy and laity opposed to Rome, at which the archbishop and those bishops who had brought about the union were excommunicated. The party of the union, supported by the king and the Jesuits, commenced an active persecution against their opponents, depriving them of numerous churches and convents. In consequence of the union, the Cossacks of the Ukraine, who were zealous friends of the Greek Church, became irritated and disaffected, without, however, exhibiting any very serious departure from their wonted loyalty. The most important result of the union, however, was, that the Eastern Church of Poland was divided into two opposite and hostile churches, one acknowledging the authority of the Pope, and the other declining it. Those of the former, who resided in Little Russia to the number of 2,000,000, returned to the Russo-Greek Church.

POLAND (MINOR REFORMED CHURCH OF), an Antitrinitarian Church organized in 1565. The peculiar opinions of the sect, which chiefly consisted of a denial of the divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ, began to be openly broached in Poland in a secret society formed in 1546 for the discussion of religious subjects. At one of its meetings a priest called Pastorius, a native of Belgium, attacked the mystery of the Trinity as being inconsistent with the essential unity of God. This doctrine, new at that time in Poland, was adopted by several members of the society, and having spread among the people, by the circulation of the works of Servetus, and the arrival of Laelius Socinus in 1551, led to the formation of a regular sect of Socinians. The same views were still further promoted by the teaching of Stancari, a learned Italian, who held the office of professor of Hebrew in the University of Cracow, and who openly maintained that the divine nature of Christ had no part in his mediation. But the first individual in Poland who reduced Antitrinitarian opinions to a system, was Peter Gonesius or Goniondzki, who had come from Switzerland professing to adhere to the Calvinistic or Genevese Confession. This man, at a synod held in 1556, rejected the doctrine of the Trinity as it is usually understood, and maintained the existence of three distinct Gods, but that the true Godhead belonged only to the Father. He still further developed his sentiments at the synod of Brest in Lithuania in 1558, on which occasion he denied the validity of infant baptism, adding that there were other things which had crept from popery into the church. The synod imposed silence on Gonesius, threatening him with excommunication; but he refused obedience, and found a large number who adhered to his opinions. Among these was John Kiszka, commander-in-chief of the forces of Lithuania, who, being possessed of both wealth and influence, lent material assistance in the establishment of churches, on what has sometimes been called the Subordinationist system, that is, maintaining the supremacy of the Father over the Son.

The followers of Gonesius soon increased in numbers, drawing converts from the ranks of the wealthy and the learned; and so rapid was the spread of the Socinian and Arian doctrines, that the Reformed churches in which they originated were thereby seriously endangered. But a goodly number of able divines arose in the bosom of these churches, who manfully contended in behalf of the proper divinity of our blessed Lord, against many, even of the most eminent of their brethren, who had unhappily embraced the Socinian heresy. At length a disruption seemed inevitable, and though an earnest struggle was made to prevent it, the breach was completed in 1562; and in 1565 a Socinian Church was set up in Poland, which took to itself the name of the Minor Reformed Church. It had its synods, churches, schools, and a complete ecclesiastical organization. This sect published a Confession of Faith in 1574, in which they explicitly declared their peculiar tenets. "God," they said, "made the Christ, that is, the most perfect Prophet, the most sacred Priest, the invincible King, by whom he created the new world. This new world is the new birth which Christ has preached, established, and performed. Christ amended the old order of things, and granted his elect eternal life, that they might after God the Most High believe in Him. The Holy Spirit is not God, but a gift, the fulness of which the Father has granted to his Son." These doctrines, which were completely subversive of the doctrine of the Trinity, received a definite form from Faustus Socinus, who arrived in Poland in 1579, and settled there, becoming connected by marriage with some of the first families in the land. This eminent individual proved a most important accession to the Antitrinitarian churches, over whose members he acquired an extraordinary influence. He was invited to assist at their principal synods, and took a leading part in them. At the synod of Wengrow in 1584, he successfully maintained the doctrine that Jesus Christ ought to be worshipped. He also urged the rejection of millenarian doctrines which were held by some of the Antitrinitarian divines. His influence, however, reached its height at the synod of Brest in Lithuania in 1588, when he succeeded in giving unity to the doctrinal belief of their churches, by moulding their to some extent discordant opinions into one regular connected system.

The Minor Reformed Church of Poland maintained the unlawfulness of oaths and of lawsuits among Christians. The church reserved to itself the exclusive right of excommunicating refractory members. Baptism they held was to be administered to adults, and to be regarded as a sign of purification, which changes the old Adam into a heavenly one. They agreed with the church of Geneva as to the spiritual presence of Christ in the sacrament of the Supper. Great diversity of opinion prevailed among the members of the church on various theological points, but they all agreed in maintaining the Subordination theory of the Trinity. Their rules of morality were exceedingly strict, and they endeavoured, like the Pharisees of old, to observe many precepts of Scripture in the letter without any regard to the spirit. Socinius himself taught the doctrines of passive obedience and unconditional submission, and he condemned the resistance made by the French Protestants to their oppressors. Such sentiments, however, were not held by the Polish Socinians generally; on the contrary, their synods of 1596 and 1598 sanctioned the use of arms when required in self-defence. Among the lower classes, indeed, there were not a few Socinians who maintained passive resistance to be a Christian duty; and chiefly through their influence the synod of 1605 declared that Christians ought rather to abandon their country than kill an enemy who might happen to invade it. Such a doctrine could not possibly be maintained by the great mass of the Polish Socinians, many of whom not only took up arms, but distinguished themselves by their valour in fighting the battles of their country.

The Socinian sect in Poland published an exposition of their religious principles in an authoritative document well known by the name of the Racovian Catechism. A smaller Catechism first appeared in German in 1605, and a larger also in German in 1608. Both were exclusively composed by Smalcius, but the latter was translated into Latin by Moskorzewski, a learned and wealthy Polish nobleman. The Socinian congregations in Poland were never numerous; but they numbered among their members many eminent scholars and authors, particularly on points of theology. A collection of their divines, under the name of the Bibliotheca Fratrum Polono- rum, is found in almost all theological libraries of any extent.

One unhappy element in the history of the Socinian churches of Poland was the prevalence of dissensions among them, which, instead of being diminished, seemed rather to increase after their organization into a regularly constituted church. The principal sects which branched off from them were the Badnecans and the Farnovians. The former, not contented with avowing Socinian doctrines, went so far as to deny the inspiration and authority of Sacred Scripture, and were on that account cast out of the church. The latter, who were allowed to remain in connection with the church, held Arian rather than Socinian opinions, maintaining that, before the foundation of the world, Christ was either begotten or produced out of nothing by the Supreme God. Though treated with the utmost indulgence, Farnovius or Farnowski left the Minor Reformed Church in 1568, and attracted around him a large party of adherents, distinguished both for influence and learning. On the death of their leader in 1615, the Farnovians quickly dispersed and became extinct.

The Socinian Church in Poland now rapidly declined. It was viewed with the most virulent hatred and jealousy both by Protestants and Roman Catholics, but more especially by the latter body, who embraced every opportunity of insulting and even maltreating the Socinians. An incident occurred which gave rise to open hostilities. In 1638 some students of the Socinian College at Racow threw down a wooden crucifix which stood at the entrance of the town. The Roman Catholics, enraged at the insult thus offered to their religion, brought the matter before the courts of law, demanding that summary punishment should be inflicted, not only upon the offenders, but upon the whole church to which they belonged. The vindictive proposal thus made by the Romanists was listened to, notwithstanding the strongest protestations of innocence on the part of the Socinians, and by a decree of the diet of Warsaw, the College at Racow was destroyed, the professors banished, the printing-office belonging to the Socinians was levelled with the ground, and their churches closed. A train of persecutions followed, and in every part of the country the Socinians were subjected to insult and oppression. At length, in 1658, the diet of Warsaw decreed their summary expulsion from the kingdom, and denounced capital punishment against all who should in future embrace their opinions, or give shelter and countenance to those who did so. In fulfilment of this severe decree the Socinians were ordered to leave Poland within three years, but this term was afterwards reduced to two years. This edict was repeated in 1661, and forthwith the whole body was driven from the kingdom, and scattered throughout different countries of Europe. Thus, in the course of little more than a hundred years, the Socinians, with the exception of a few persons here and there who secretly held their principles, were rooted out of Poland.

POLAND (PROTESTANT CHURCH OF). Poland seems to have first received Christianity from Great Moravia in the ninth century, and so rapidly did it spread among all classes, that in the following century it reached the palace; and the sovereign, Mieczyslaw the First, was baptized in A. D. 965, chiefly through the influence of the native Christians of Poland. About the same time he married Dambrowska, a Christian Bohemian princess. Having thus obtained a firm footing in the country, the cause of Christianity received a considerable impulse from the arrival in Poland of a number of Christian fugitives from Moravia. The neighbouring churches of Germany soon acquired a great influence over the Poles, while priests and monks flocked from Italy and France, but particularly from Germany, to Poland, crowding the convents, and occupying the parochial churches, and at the same time using the Romish ritual in opposition to the simple worship of the Polish national churches, which, however, maintained their ground till the fourteenth century. The HUSITES (which see), from Bohemia, found a favourable field in Poland for the propagation of their peculiar tenets, and the Romish clergy in consequence took active measures for the purpose of checking the spread of the obnoxious doctrines. With this view the parish priests were ordered to seize and bring before the bishops all who were suspected of holding Hussite sentiments. Severe enactments were passed for the punishment of the heretics. But in the face of all opposition the new doctrines were embraced by some of the most influential families in the land, and the reforming party, indeed, was very numerous, when their leader was slain on the field of battle. But although the doctrines of Huss had found many supporters in Poland, the national feeling was still in favour of the dominant church.

In the commencement of the fifteenth century a powerful impulse was given to the cause of Polish education and literature by the establishment of the University of Cracow and the encouragement given in that seminary to native scholars. Already a goodly number of accomplished literary men had issued from the University of Prague, some of whom were chosen to fill the chairs at Cracow; these again were generally selected to supply the vacant episcopal sees, and thus in a short time there were found in the Polish Church not a few prelates distinguished alike for their piety and learning. The enlightened views which some of these ecclesiastical dignitaries entertained were speedily manifested in various projects started for reforming the church. Thus Martin Tromba, the primate of Poland, ordered the liturgical books to be translated into the national language, that they might be understood by the great mass of the people. But the boldest step in the direction of church reform at this period was taken by Ostorog, palatine of Posen, who presented to the Polish diet of 1459 a proposal for introducing improvements of such a vital character, that had they been adopted, a separation of the Church of Poland from Rome would have been the immediate result. "In this plan," says Count Krasinski, "of reforming the Church of Poland he maintained that, Christ having declared that his kingdom was not of this world, the Pope had no authority whatever over the king of Poland, and should not be even addressed by the latter in humble terms unbecoming his dignity; that Rome was drawing every year from the country large sums under the pretence of religion, but, in fact, by means of superstition; and that the bishop of Rome was inventing most unjust reasons for levying taxes, the proceeds of which were employed, not for the real wants of the church, but for the Pope's private interests; that all the ecclesiastical lawsuits should be decided in the country, and not at Rome, which did not take 'any sheep without wool;' 'that there were, indeed, amongst the Poles people who respected the Roman scribblings furnished with red seals and hempen strings, and suspended on the door of a church; but that it was wrong to submit to these Italian deceits.' He further says—'Is it not a deceit that the Pope imposes upon us, in spite of the king and the senate, I don't know what, bulls called indulgences? He gets money by assuring people that he absolves their sin; but God has said by his prophet—'My son, give me thy heart, and not money.' The Pope feigns that he employs his treasures for the erection of churches; but he does it, in fact, for enriching his relations. I shall pass in silence things that are still worse. There are monks who praise still such fables. There are a great number of preachers and confessors who only think how to get the richest harvest, and who indulge themselves, after having plundered the poor people. He complains of the great number of monks unfit for the clerical office, saying, 'After having shaven his head and endowed a cowl, a man thinks himself fit to correct the whole world. He cries, and almost bellows, in the pulpit, because he sees no opponent. Learned men, and even those who possess an inferior degree of knowledge, cannot listen without horror to the nonsense, and almost blasphemy, uttered by such preachers.'"

These sentiments avowed by a Polish senator in the assembly of the states, plainly indicated that public opinion, even in the fifteenth century, was prepared for the great ecclesiastical reformation which commenced a century later in Germany and Switzerland. And as if still further to pave the way for that important movement, treatises were at every little interval issuing from the press in Poland containing opinions which Rome has always been accustomed to brand as heresies. One work, in particular, was published at Cracow in 1515, which openly advocated the great Protestant principle, that the Holy Scriptures must be believed, and all merely human ordinances may be dispensed with. The date of the appearance of this treatise was two years before Luther publicly avowed his opposition to Rome. No sooner, accordingly, did the German Reformer commence his warfare with the Pope than he was joined by many Poles, more especially belonging to the towns of Polish Prussia; and so rapidly did the principles of the Reformation spread in Dantzic, the principality of that province, that, in 1524, no fewer than five churches were occupied by the disciples of the Wittenberg Reformer. A very large part of the inhabitants of Dantzic, however, still adhered to the old church, and anxious to restore the ancient order of things, they despatched a deputation to Sigismund the First, who at that time occupied the throne of Poland, imploring his interposition. The monarch, moved by the appeal made by the deputation, who appeared before him dressed in deep mourning, proceeded in person to Dantzic, restored the former state of things, and either executed or banished the principal leaders of the new movement. But while for purely political reasons Sigismund in this case acted in the most tyrannical and oppressive manner, he allowed the doctrines of Protestantism to spread in all the other parts of his dominions without persecuting those who embraced them. And even in Dantzic itself, when Lutheranism, in the course of a few years, began to be again preached within its walls, he refused to take a single step to check its progress, so that in the subsequent reign it became the dominant creed of that city, without, however, infringing upon the religious liberty of the Roman Catholics.

The works of Luther found many readers, and even admirers, in Poland, and a secret society, composed of both clergymen and laymen, met frequently to discuss religious subjects, including those points more especially which the rise of the Reformation brought prominently before the public mind. It was in connection with this society that Anti-Trinitarian opinions were first adopted as a creed by several individuals, and the foundation laid in Poland for that sect whose members were afterwards known by the name of SOCINIANS (which see). The spread of this heresy, however, was limited to the upper classes of society, while among the great mass of the people the Scriptural views of the Reformers found ready acceptance; a result, in no small degree owing to the arrival of Bohemian Brethren, to the number of about a thousand, who had been driven from their own country, and found a home in the province of Posen. This event happened in 1548, and the public worship of the Brethren being conducted in the Bohemian language, which was intelligible to the inhabitants of Posen, attracted towards them the sympathies of multitudes. The Romish bishop of Posen, alarmed at the influence which the Brethren were exercising over the people of his diocese, applied for, and obtained, a royal edict for their expulsion from the country. This order they immediately obeyed, and proceeded to Prussia, where they found full religious liberty. Next year, however, some of them returned to Poland, where they had formerly received so much kindness, and continued their labours without being molested in any form. Their congregations rapidly increased, and in a short time they reached the large number of eighty in the province of Great Poland alone, while many others were formed in different parts of the country.

A circumstance occurred about this time which was providentially overruled for the still wider diffusion of Protestant principles in Poland. The students of the University of Cracow, having taken offence at some real or imagined affront offered them by the rector, repaired to foreign universities, but particularly to the newly erected University of Königsberg, from which the great majority of them returned home imbued with Protestant principles. The Reformed doctrines now made extraordinary progress, particularly in the province of Cracow. In vain did the Romish clergy denounce the growing heresy; all their remonstrances were unavailing, and at length they convened a general synod in 1551 to consider the whole subject. On this occasion Hosius, bishop of Ermland, composed his celebrated Confession, which has been acknowledged by the Church of Rome as a faithful exposition of its creed. The synod not only decreed, that this creed should be signed by the whole body of the clergy, but petitioned the king that a royal mandate should be issued ordering its subscription by the laity. It was now resolved that a violent persecution should be commenced against the heretics, and this determination was strengthened by an encyclical letter from Rome, recommending the extirpation of heresy. Several cases of bloody persecution occurred, but the nobles, aroused to jealousy by the high-handed measures of the clergy, openly declared their wish to restrict the authority of the bishops, and the people were unanimous in expressing a similar desire.

Such was the state of matters in Poland when the diet of 1552 was convened; and scarcely had its deliberations been commenced, when a general hostility was evinced by the members to episcopal jurisdiction. The result was, that, at this diet, religious liberty for all confessions was virtually established in Poland. At the diet of 1555 the king was earnestly urged to convoke a national synod over which he himself should preside, and which should reform the church on the basis of the Holy Scriptures. It was proposed, also, to invite to this assembly the most distinguished Reformers, such as Calvin, Beza, Melancthon, and Vergerius. But the expectations of the Protestants in Poland were chiefly turned towards John à Lasco or Laski, who had been instrumental in promoting the cause of the Reformation in Germany, Switzerland, and England. For a long time he remained within the pale of the Romish

Church, in the hope that it would be possible to effect a Reformation without seceding from her communion. In 1540 he declared his adherence to the Protestant Church on the principles of Zwingli. The high reputation which Laski had already gained, both as a scholar and a Christian, attracted the marked attention of the Protestant princes in various parts of Europe, several of whom invited him to take up his residence in their dominions. The sovereign of East Friesland, anxious to complete the reformation of the church in that country, prevailed upon Laski to allow himself to be nominated superintendent of all its churches. To carry out the object of his appointment was a matter of no small difficulty, considering the extreme reluctance which prevailed to the entire abolition of Romish rites, but by energy, perseverance, and uncompromising firmness, he succeeded, in the brief space of six years, in rooting out the last remains of Romanism, and fully establishing the Protestant religion throughout the whole of the churches of East Friesland. In 1548 Laski received an earnest invitation from Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, to join the distinguished Reformers, who had repaired to England from all parts of the Continent, that they might complete the Reformation of the church in that country. Having accepted Cranmer's invitation, the Polish Reformer left Friesland and went to England, where he was appointed, on his arrival in 1550, superintendent of the foreign Protestant congregation established at London. In this important sphere he continued to labour with much comfort and success until the demise of Edward the Sixth and the accession of Mary arrested the progress of the Reformation in England, and compelled Laski with his congregation to leave the country. This little band of exiles, headed by the Polish Reformer, were driven by a storm upon the coast of Denmark, where, on landing, they were received at first with hospitality and kindness, but, through the influence of the Lutheran divines, they were soon obliged to seek an asylum elsewhere. The same hatred on the part of the Lutheran clergy was shown to the congregation of Laski at Lubeck, Hamburg, and Rostock. At length the remnants of the congregation found in Dantzic a peaceful asylum, while Laski himself retired to Friesland, where he was received with every mark of respect and attachment. In a short time, however, finding his position by no means so comfortable as at first, he removed to Frankfort-on-the-Maine, where he established a church for the Belgian Protestant refugees, and made various attempts, without success, to unite the Lutheran and Protestant churches.

Throughout all his wanderings Laski's thoughts were habitually turned towards Poland, and he maintained a constant intercourse with his countrymen, and also with his sovereign, Sigismund Augustus, who entertained a high regard for him. He returned to Poland in 1556, and no sooner did his arrival become known than the Romish clergy, taking the alarm, hastened to implore the king to banish from his dominions a man whom they described as an outlawed heretic, and the source of troubles and commotions wherever he went. To this representation the king paid no regard; and to the annoyance of the bishops and the papal nuncio, Laski was soon after intrusted with the superintendence of all the Reformed churches of Little Poland. Through his influence the tenets of the Swiss Reformers were extensively adopted by the higher classes of his countrymen. The chief objects, however, which he kept steadily in view were the union of all Protestant sects, and the ultimate establishment of a Reformed National Church modelled on the plan of the Church of England, for which he had conceived a high admiration. But his exertions in the cause of reform were much weakened by the rise of Antitrinitarian sentiments in some of the churches which he superintended. He struggled hard, and not without success, to check the progress of these opinions. In the public affairs of the church he took an active part, and assisted in preparing the version of the first Protestant Bible in Poland. In the midst of his unwearied labours in the cause of the Polish Reformation, Laski was cut off in 1560, before he had an opportunity of fully maturing his great designs.

One of the last objects on which the Polish Reformer had set his heart, was the speedy convocation of a national synod. This proposal, however, met with violent opposition from Rome and its partizans. The Pope, Paul IV., despatched a legate to Poland with letters to the king, the senate, and the most influential noblemen, promising to effect all necessary reforms, and to call a general council. Lippomani, the papal legate, was an able man, and a devoted servant to the see of Rome. The Romish clergy were much encouraged by the presence of this dignitary in the country, who endeavoured, but without effect, to prevail upon the king to adopt violent measures for the extirpation of heresy. The crafty emissary of the Pope succeeded also by his intrigues in fomenting discord among the Protestants. He assembled a synod of the Polish clergy, which, while it lamented the dangers which threatened the church, both from within and from without, passed many resolutions for improving its condition, and coercing the heretics. The extent to which the synod, instigated by Lippomani, pushed their jurisdiction may be seen from their proceedings in a case of alleged sacrilege recorded both by Romish and Protestant writers. "Dorothy Lazecka, a poor girl, was accused of having obtained from the Dominican monks of Sochaczew a host, feigning to receive communion. It was said that she wrapped that host in her clothes, and sold it to the Jews of a neighbouring village, by whom she had been instigated to commit this act of sacrilege by the bribe of three dollars and a gown embroidered with silk. This host was said to have been carried by the Jews to the synagogue, where, being pierced with needles, it emitted a quantity of blood, which was collected into a flask. The Jews tried in vain to prove the absurdity of the charge, arguing, that as their religion did not permit them to believe in the mystery of transubstantiation, they never could be supposed to try a similar experiment on the host, which they considered as a mere wafer. The synod, influenced by Lippomani, condemned them, as well as the unfortunate woman, to be burned alive. The iniquitous sentence could not, however, be put into execution without the exequatur, or the confirmation of the king, which could not be expected to be obtained from the enlightened Sigismund Augustus. The Bishop Przerembski, who was also vice-chancellor of Poland, made a report to the king of the above-mentioned case, which he described in expressions of pious horror, entreating the monarch not to allow such a crime, committed against the Divine Majesty, to go unpunished. Myszkowski, a great dignitary of the crown, who was a Protestant, became so indignant at this report, that he could not restrain his anger, and was only prevented by the presence of the king from using violence against the prelate, the impiety and absurdity of whose accusation he exposed in strong language. The monarch declared that he would not believe such absurdities, and sent an order to the Starost (chief magistrate or governor) of Sochaczew to release the accused parties; but the vice-chancellor forged the exequatur, by attaching the royal seal without the knowledge of the monarch, and sent an order that the sentence of the synod should be immediately carried into execution. The king, being informed of this nefarious act of the bishop, immediately despatched a messenger to prevent its effects. It was, however, too late; and the judicial murder was perpetrated." This atrocious affair excited, of course, a great sensation throughout Poland, and awakened such feelings of hatred against Lippomani, that he lost no time in quitting the country, a step which was absolutely necessary, indeed, as his life was in danger.

The Polish Reformation went steadily forward in spite of all the opposition of Rome and its emissaries. In Lithuania particularly, it received a strong impulse from the influence exerted in its favour by Prince Radziwill, who had been intrusted by the monarch with almost the sole government of that province. Taking advantage of the facilities which he thus possessed for advancing the good work, he succeeded in establishing the Reformed worship both in the rural districts and in many towns. He built also a splendid church and college in Vilna, the capital of Lithuania. To this enlightened and pious nobleman, besides, is due the merit of having caused to be translated and printed, at his own expense, the first Protestant Bible in the Polish language. It was published in 1564, and is usually known by the name of the Radziwillian Bible. The death of Radziwill the Black, as he was termed, which happened in 1565, was a severe loss to the Protestant cause in Lithuania; but happily his cousin and successor, Radziwill the Red, was also a zealous promoter of the Reformed religion, and founded a number of Protestant churches and schools, which he endowed with landed property for their permanent support.

The king of Poland was strongly urged, by a portion of the clergy, to reform the church by means of a national synod, but he was of too irresolute a character to take a step so decided. He adopted, however, a middle course, and addressed a letter to Pope Paul IV. at the council of Trent, demanding the concession of the five following points: (1.) The performance of the mass in the national language. (2.) The dispensation of the communion in both kinds. (3.) The toleration of the marriage of priests. (4.) The abolition of the annates or first fruits of benefices. (5.) The convocation of a national council for the reform of abuses, and the union of different sects. These demands, of course, were rejected by his Holiness. But the Protestants in Poland, far from being discouraged by the conduct of the Pope, became bolder every day in their opposition to the Romanists. At the diet of 1559 a proposal was made to deprive the bishops of all participation in the affairs of the government, on the ground that they were the sworn servants of a foreign potentate. This motion, though strenuously urged upon the acceptance of the diet, was not carried; but a few years later, in 1563, the diet agreed to convoke a general national synod, composed of representatives of all the religious parties in Poland—a measure which would, in all probability, have been carried into effect had it not been prevented by the dexterity and diplomatic craft of Cardinal Commendon, who succeeded in dissuading the king from assembling a national council.

The establishment of a Reformed Polish Church was much impeded by the dissensions which divided the Protestants amongst themselves. At that time, in fact, no less than three parties existed in Poland, each adhering to its own separate Confession. Thus the Bohemian or Waldensian Confession had its own ardent admirers, chiefly in Great Poland; the Genevese or Calvinistic Confession in Lithuania and Southern Poland; and the Lutheran or Augsburg Confession in towns inhabited by burghers of German origin. Of these the Bohemian and the Genevese Confessions were so completely agreed on almost all points, that their respective supporters found no difficulty in forming a union in 1555, not, indeed, incorporating into one body, but holding spiritual fellowship together, while each church retained its own separate hierarchy. This union being the first which took place among Protestant churches after the Reformation, caused great joy among the Reformers in different parts of Europe. The two churches thus united wished to include the Lutherans also in the alliance, but the doctrine of the Augsburg Confession on the subject of the eucharist seemed likely to prove an insuperable obstacle in the way of any union with the Lutheran churches. An attempt, however, was made to effect so desirable an object. For this purpose a synod of the Bohemian and Genevese churches of Poland was convoked in 1557, and presided over by John Laski. At this synod overtures were made to the Lutherans to join the union, but to no effect, and they still continued to accuse the Bohemian church of heresy. The obstacles thus thrown in the way of a union among the Protestants of Poland, only roused the Bohemians to exert themselves still more actively for its attainment. They forwarded copies of their Confession of Faith to the Protestant princes of Germany, and to the chief Reformers, both of that country and of Switzerland, and received strong testimonials of approval, so strong, indeed, as to silence for a time the objections of the Lutherans. Shortly, however, the good understanding which had begun was interrupted by the unreasonable demands of some Polish Lutheran divines, that the other Protestant denominations should subscribe the Confession of Augsburg. The Bohemians, therefore, in 1568, submitted their Confession to the University of Wittenberg, and received from that learned body a strong expression of their approbation, which so operated upon the minds of the Lutherans that from that time they ceased to charge the Bohemian Church with heresy.

The long-desired union was at length effected in 1570. A synod having assembled in the town of Sandomir, in April of that year, finally concluded and signed the terms of union under the name of the CONSENSUS OF SANDEMIR (which see). This important step excited the utmost alarm among the Romanists, who endeavoured to bring it into discredit. But the union itself was essentially hollow and imperfect. The Confessions, between which a dogmatic union had been effected, differed on a point of vital importance,—the presence of Christ in the eucharist. The union, accordingly, was rather nominal than real; and many Lutherans directed their whole efforts towards bringing about a disruption of the alliance which had been established at Sandomir. This hostility of the Lutherans to the other Protestant Confessions was very injurious to the interests of Protestantism in general, and a number of noble families, followed by thousands of the common people, disgusted with the bitter contentions which raged among the Protestants of different denominations, renounced the principles of the Reformation, and returned to the Church of Rome. Another circumstance which tended to weaken the Protestant Church of Poland, was the rise and rapid spread of a party who denied the divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ. Some learned divines of the Reformed churches combated these Antitrinitarian doctrines, and at length, in 1565, the professors of these doctrines seceded from their brethren, forming themselves into a separate ecclesiastical organization, called by its members the Minor Reformed Church of Poland. The arrival of Faustus Socinus in Poland in 1579, led to the tenets of the Antitrinitarians being thrown into a definite form, and to the formation of Socinian congregations, chiefly composed of nobles, among whom there were many wealthy landowners.

When the Consensus of Sandomir was concluded in 1570, Protestantism in Poland had reached its highest state of prosperity. Many churches and schools, belonging to Protestants of various denominations, had been established; the Scriptures had been translated and printed in the national language; and religious liberty was enjoyed in Poland to a degree unknown in any other part of Europe. These favourable circumstances attracted great numbers of foreigners who sought an asylum from religious persecution. Among these, besides many Italian and French refugees, there were also a great number of Scotch families settled in different parts of Poland, whose descendants are found there at this day.

At the period at which we have now arrived Romanism had, to a great extent, lost its hold of the Polish nation. The most influential portion of the nobility were on the side of Protestantism, whilst many powerful families, and the population generally, of the eastern provinces belonged to the Greek Church. Nay, even within the national church itself, not only was the primate favourable to Reformed principles, but many even of the inferior clergy, and a considerable proportion of the laity, would have welcomed any proposal to correct the flagrant abuses which had in course of time crept into the church. In the senate, also, the great proportion of the members were either Protestants or belonged to the Greek Church; and even the king himself showed a decided leaning towards the adherents of the Protestant faith. The Roman Catholic Church in Poland, indeed, was on the verge of utter ruin, but in this hour of its extremest danger, it was mainly saved by the exertions of Cardinal Hosius, one of the most remarkable men of his age. This zealous Romish dignitary had early made himself conspicuous by his hostility to the Protestants, and now that he had been nominated a cardinal, he used every effort to check the progress of the Reformation in Poland. Finding, however, that his own church was fast losing ground, and that Reformed principles were almost certain ere long to obtain the ascendancy, he called to his aid the newly established order of Jesuits, several of whom arrived from Rome in 1564, and by their intrigues and agitation the whole country was made for a long period the scene of the most unseemly commotions.

During the life of Sigismund Augustus, the Protestants indulged the hope that, although naturally of a wavering and undecided character, he might possibly decide on the establishment of a Reformed National Church; but the death of that monarch without issue, in 1572, put an end to all such expectations. The Jaghellonian dynasty, which had governed Poland for two centuries, was now extinct. An earnest struggle commenced, therefore, between the Protestants and Romanists, each party being anxious that the vacant throne should be filled by a zealous supporter of their church. The Romanists, headed by Cardinal Commendon, were anxious to confer the crown upon the Archduke Ernest, son of the Emperor Maximilian the Second, and were even ready to secure their object by force. Coligny and the French Protestants had for some time, even before the death of Sigismund Augustus, entertained the project of placing Henry of Valois, duke of Anjou, on the Polish throne; and Catharine de Medicis, the mother of the duke, eagerly lent her approbation to the proposal.

The diet of convocation assembled at Warsaw in January 1573, for the purpose of taking steps for the maintenance of the peace and safety of the country during the interregnum. At this diet, notwithstanding the opposition of the Romish bishops, instigated by Commendon, a law was passed establishing a perfect equality of rights among all the Christian Confessions of Poland, guaranteeing the dignities and privileges of the Roman Catholic bishops, but abolishing the obligation of church patrons to bestow the benefices in their gift exclusively on Roman Catholic clergymen. The election of a new monarch was arranged to take place on the 7th April at Kamien, near Warsaw. The principal competitors for the throne of Poland were the two princes already mentioned; and although meanwhile the horrid massacre of St. Bartholomew had rendered the Polish Protestants somewhat afraid to commit their interests to a French prince, yet being unwilling to involve their country in a civil war, they accepted Henry, Duke of Anjou, who was accordingly elected king of Poland.

A deputation of twelve noblemen were immediately despatched to Paris, to announce to Henry his election, and on the 10th September 1573 the ceremony of presenting the diploma of election took place in the church of Notre Dame. The circumstances attending the presentation are interesting as manifesting the intolerant spirit of the Polish Romanists. "The Bishop Karnkowski, a member of the Polish embassy, at the beginning of the ceremony, entered a protest against the clause for securing religious liberty, inserted in the oath which the new monarch was to take on that occasion. This act produced some confusion, the Protestant Zborowski having interrupted the solemnity with the following words, addressed to Montluc: 'Had you not accepted, in the name of the duke, the conditions of religious liberty, our opposition would have prevented this duke from being elected our monarch.' Henry feigned to be astonished, as if he did not understand the subject in dispute; but Zborowski addressed him, saying, 'I repeat, sire, that if your ambassadors had not accepted the condition of liberty to the contending religious persuasions, our opposition would have prevented you from being elected king; and that if you do not confirm these conditions, you shall not be our king.' After this, the members of the embassy surrounded their new monarch, and Herbert, a Roman Catholic, read the formula of the oath prescribed by the electing diet, which Henry repeated without any opposition. The Bishop Karnkowski, who had stood aside, approached the king after he had sworn, and protested that the religious liberty, secured by the royal oath, was not to injure the authority of the Church of Rome; and the king gave him a written testimony in favour of that protest."

Henry set out for Poland, but after what had passed, the fears of the Protestants were far from being allayed, and they resolved carefully to watch the conduct of the new monarch at his coronation. Firley, the leader of the Protestant party, insisted that on that solemn occasion, the oath taken at Paris should be repeated; and even in the midst of the ceremony, when the crown was about to be placed on Henry's head, Firley boldly advanced forward and interrupted the proceedings, declaring in name of the Protestants of Poland, that unless the Parisian oath was taken the coronation would not be allowed to go forward. The scroll of the oath was put into the king's hand as he knelt on the steps of the altar, and Firley, taking the crown, said to Henry with a loud voice, "If you will not swear, you shall not reign." The intrepid conduct of the Protestant leader struck the whole assembly with awe, and the king had no alternative but to repeat the oath. Thus the religious liberties of Poland were saved from utter overthrow, and the nation delivered from an impending civil war.

The Polish Protestants were naturally suspicious of their new king, knowing that having taken the oath by compulsion, he was not likely to respect their rights. The Romish bishops, on the other hand, supported by the favour of the monarch, formed projects for extending their influence, and an impression rapidly spread through the country, that Henry had become a ready tool in the hands of the priests. This feeling, combined with disgust at his profligacy, rendered him so unpopular, and his subjects so discontented, that the country would undoubtedly have been speedily plunged into a civil war, had not the king fortunately disappeared, having secretly left Poland for France on learning that the death of his brother, Charles IX., had opened the way for his succession to the throne of France. The crown of Poland was now conferred upon Stephen Batory, prince of Transylvania, who had earned so high a reputation, that although an avowed Protestant, his election met with no opposition from the Romish clergy. The delegation which announced to Stephen his election to the throne, was composed of thirteen members, only one of whom was a Romanist, but this man, Solikowski by name, succeeded in persuading the new monarch, that if he would secure himself on the throne, he must profess the Roman Catholic religion. Next day, accordingly, to the dismay of the Protestant delegates, Stephen was seen devoutly kneeling at mass. During his reign, which lasted ten years, he maintained inviolate the rights of the Anti-Romanist Confessions, while, at the same time, through the influence of his queen, who was a bigoted Romanist, he openly encouraged and patronized the Jesuits, by founding and endowing various educational institutions in connection with their order.

Stephen Batory died in 1586, and was succeeded by Sigismund III., in whose reign the Romish party acquired much strength, while many of the Protestants had become dissatisfied with the general Confession, and sought to renew the former controversies which had so much weakened their influence in the country. Poland was unhappily subjected to the rule of this infatuated monarch from 1587 to 1632, and throughout the whole of that long period his policy was uniformly directed towards the promotion of the supremacy of Rome. The Jesuits exercised an unlimited influence over the government; and all the offices of state and posts of honour were exclusively bestowed upon Romanists, and more especially upon proselytes, who, from motives of interest, had renounced the principles of the Reformation. The whole country was covered with Jesuit colleges and schools, thus enabling the disciples of Loyola most effectually to exercise dominion over all classes of the people. "The melancholy effects of their education," says Count Krasinski, "soon became manifest. By the close of Sigismund the Third's reign, when the Jesuits had become almost exclusive masters of public schools, national literature had declined as rapidly as it had advanced during the preceding century. It is remarkable, indeed, that Poland, which, from the middle of the sixteenth century to the end of the reign of Sigismund the Third (1632), had produced many splendid works on different branches of human knowledge, in the national as well as in the Latin language, can boast of but very few works of merit from that epoch to the second part of the eighteenth century, the period of the unlimited sway of the Jesuits over the national education. The Polish language, which had obtained a high degree of perfection during the sixteenth century, was soon corrupted by an absurd admixture of Latin; and a barbarous style, called Macaronie, disfigured Polish literature for more than a century. As the chief object of the Jesuits was to combat the Anti-Romanists, the principal subject of their instruction was polemical divinity; and the most talented of their students, instead of acquiring sound knowledge, by which they might become useful members of society, wasted their time in dialectic subtilties and quibbles. The disciples of Loyola knew well, that of all the weaknesses to which human nature is subject, vanity is the most accessible; and they were as prodigal of praise to partizans as
